He also reported that construction starts in the country between January and August of this year, compared to the same period of 1980, rose by 54.7 percent in terms of the total area under construction.

The number of housing starts increased from 24,160 between January and August 1980, to 39,507 during the first 8 months of this year, a 63.5 percent rise.

Industrial Production

Industrial production, meanwhile, grew by 5.3 percent during the first 8 months of this year, compared to the same period last year. There were declines in six of the 20 groups included in this index.

The groups registering negative growth were: machinery construction (except for electrical machinery), -39.3 percent; textile products, -6.3 percent; tobacco, -9 percent; basic metal industries, -1 percent; food products, -0.4 percent; and leather and leather products, except for shoes, -0.2 percent.

Unemployment

The unemployment rate in Greater Santiago dropped from 10.9 percent to 8.2 percent, on the average, between the August-October quarter of last year and the same period of 1981.

This information was released yesterday by the director of the National Statistics Institute, Sergio Chaparro.

The figure, which represents a total of 111,600 unemployed persons, out of a total work force of 1.353 million people, breaks down into 6.4 percent compulsorily retired and 1.8 percent first-time job seekers.

The number of employed rose during the above-mentioned period, from 1.191 million to 1.241 million, a 4.27 percent increase, according to the survey by the state institution.

The information does not contain details about the sectors where unemployment is highest.

In the earlier quarter, July-September of this year, unemployment went from 8.1 percent to 8.2 percent.

According to the tables preserted, the total population of Greater Santiago is 3.965 million people, of whom 1.352 million make up the labor force. The others are under 12 years of age, students, housewives or retired.

PRESIDENT INSPECTS, PRAISES IQUIQUE FREE TRADE ZONE

Santiago LA TERCERA DE LA HORA in Spanish 5 Nov 81 p 7

[Article by Raul Rojas]

[Text] Iquique--President Augusto Pinochet spent 2 hours and 41 minutes visting the facilities of the Iquique Free Trade Zone (ZOFRI) and saw that 6 years after its creation it has become the greatest merchandising center in the Southern Cone of the Americas, and is an important international trading center as well.

The chief of state expressed his great pleasure at ZOFRI's role in regional and national development.

The president of the Administration and Control Board, Maj Gen Juan Guilermo Toro Davila, and General Manager Patricio Pina were the main participants in the presentation on the achievements and plans of the zone.

Among the most important figures cited by the president was a truly spectacular statistic: At this time ZOFRI is investing $269 million in a program that will be completed by the end of 1982. It involves the expansion of the walled area for sheds and industrial plants, sewerage and paving in the industrial area, the construction of an administration building, the purchase of a computer, the maintenance of structures, supplies for projects, and improved water and electricity services.

Automobiles

With the expansion of the walled area, there will be 128 warehouses for storage and industrial processing; furthermore, a new parking lot for 10,500 automobiles is already in service. A service area will also be built in that place for banking, insurance and transportation offices, as well as offices for foreign trade-related activities.

The construction of new warehouses will also require the expansion of the area devoted to retail sales.

The investment program, which will end in 1982, as the chief of state learned, will have the following results: 1) 2,000 new direct jobs; 2) 46,000 additional square meters of private sector storage space; 3) 307 million pesos of private investment in construction; 4) the installation of 50 new businesses; 5) the incorporation of 24 hectares of urbanized property into ZOFRI's assets; 6) the connection of the free trade zone to the railroad network; and 7) the stimulation of regional economic activity.

Objectives

In their presentation to the president, the ZOFRI executives recalled that the zone was created in order to streamline foreign trade, provide timely supplies at lower costs to the national market, and establish a market for economic integration with the countries of the area, particularly Peru, Bolivia and Northwest Argentina.

Then they cited statistics to illustrate the degree of development attained. They pointed out, for example, that the purchases and sales of goods by ZOFRI increased from $249 million to $984 million between 1977 and 1980, a 300 percent jump.

Furthermore, in the first 2 weeks of October this year, the total amount of purchases and sales for all of 1980 was exceeded. By the end of December a total of $1.3 billion is expected. The directors predicted that by 1983 the transactions will total $2 billion.

ZOFRI transactions amounted to 5.4 percent of Chile's foreign trade in 1977, compared to 9.2 percent today. Inventories soared from $37 million to $191 million between 1977 and 1980.

Sales abroad grew from $1.3 million to $60.2 million, a clear indication that ZOFRI has become a real center for the reexportation of goods.

Economic Development

The regional intendent and president of the Administration and Control Board, along with the general manager of ZOFRI, stated that 5 years after the zone was created, its operations have succeeded not only in doing away with the economic depression of this region, but have also promoted sustained economic development, even beyond the limits of Tarapaca.

The chief of state was more than pleased when he learned that in the past 4 years, ZOFRI activities have resulted in 4,950 new jobs, of which 2,777 correspond to direct absorption of manpower. In addition, the 37 businesses that existed in 1977 have multiplied sixfold, totaling 224 today.

In 1980, Iquique was the fastest growing port in the nation. The total tonnage unloaded from ships went from 61,075 to 190,592 tons; 10,180 containers were unloaded, compared to only 1,030 in 1977. The number of ships coming into the port jumped from 235 to 390. In the last 4 years, the consumption of electricity has grown 41 percent, while that of gasoline grew by 48 percent. According to the ZOFRI executives, these indicators clearly show the widespread progress in Iquique.

Tourism also benefited from these advances. The number of hotels went from 4 to 23, with beds rising from 280 to 1,346 in number. The number of passengers using the Iquique Airport surged by 68 percent between 1977 and 1980, surpassing 75,000 people already.

Investments

President Pinochet was informed that the Administration and Control Board invested $274.6 million between 1976 and 1980. Between 1981 and 1982, however, investments will total $289 million. This means that in 2 years it will invest much more than in the 4 previous years.

During his visit, the chief of state examined panels, posters, statistical tables and photographs. He was also presented with a beautiful color photograph depicting ZOFRI at night with the port of Iquique in the background.

Later, he went to the outbuildings, where an exhibition displayed products of the industries that are already functioning here.

Four Projects

In the final part of the tour, the president was informed that ZOFRI has four projects on the drawing board. The first one is to build an electricity plant capable of producing electricity at international rates, since power is very expensive in this region now, and it is essential for industrial development.

Another interesting initiative was the construction of a wharf for ZOFRI's foreign trade across from the industrial area, to prevent overcrowding of existing facilities at the port of Iquique.

Finally, the president learned that a study is being done on the construction of a large refrigerated warehouse for the storage and exportation of perishable goods, and another or improvements to the infrastructure of the Diego Aracena Airport to permit it to operate as an international airport.

At the end of his visit, the president of the republic congratulated the ZOFRI executives and left the following message as he made the first entry in the book for visiting dignitaries: "With best wishes for the progress and prosperity of the Iquique Free Trade Zone, Augusto Pinochet Ugarte."

ACC'S TORRES DISCUSSES SCIENTIFIC RESEARCH

Havana JUVENTUD TECNICA in Spanish Jul 81 pp 16-19

[Report on interview with Dr Wilfredo Torres, member of the Central Committee of the PCC and president of the Academy of Sciences of Cuba, by Jose Ramon Garcia; date and place not given]

[Text] In recent years and especially in 1980, the scientific and technical activity visible in the country points to the existence of even greater potential, as required by the circumstances of our development.

Many of the results obtained by the institutions, experts and scientists of the Academy of Sciences of Cuba and other scientific institutions in the country, such as those pointed out in the report by Comrade Fidel Castro to the Second Congress, are recognized for their interest and value to the national economy, even those promoting the conservation and improvement of the material resources that the people create to improve their standard of living.

On these and other aspects, Dr Wilfredo Torres, member of the Central Committee of the party and president of the Academy of Sciences, reports to the readers of JUVENTUD TECNICA.

"During the 5-year period from 1976 to 1980, an effort was made to plan and organize scientific and technical activity and there was an increase in the efficiency of a large number of research centers.

"Several institutions," Torres pointed out, "have joined the network of scientific and technical units, particularly in 1980. We are witnessing the opening of the National Animal Health Center and the Jorge Dimitrov Agricultural Research Institute, the first in the country ever opened outside of Havana.

"Activities have gone forth in over 100 research units and nearly 23,000 workers are participating.

"Applied research and development work represent over 80 percent of all research."

More Significant Results

On this matter, the president of the Academy of Sciences of Cuba explained:

"In drawing up the balance sheet of work completed during the 5-year period and especially this past year, we see that the most important results include, in the field of agriculture, the obtention of new varieties of sugar cane, rice, tubers, vegetables and citrus fruits.

"In fishing, a specific technique and more efficient equipment were recommended for bonito. In addition, regulations were handed down for shrimp and lobster fishing, along with other scientific and technical advice.

"Our main source of foreign currency," Torres pointed out, "had the development and introduction into the sugar cane industry of the DTC-600 clarifier, which halves the time it takes to purify juices. Continuous crystallization equipment was also introduced, which helps to increase industrial recovery.

"At the same time, technologies have been developed in the nickel industry making greater recovery of nickel and cobalt possible.

"Outstanding among all the tasks taken up in recent years and especially in 1980 is one far-reaching achievement of Cuban science: the joint Soviet-Cuban space flight as part of the Intercosmos Program. Work on the design and planning of the program of experiments and research conducted during the flight took nearly 3 years. Despite the difficulty of the task, the flight took place with the required scientific and technical quality and precision."

In speaking about cooperation between Cuba and the socialist countries, the president of the Academy of Sciences said:

"The most important work has been the final preparation and signing of the General Agreement on the Plan for the Accelerated Development of Science and Technology in the Republic of Cuba until 1990, subscribed during the 34th session of CEMA, and the drafting and discussion of the bilateral agreements that were signed before the end of the first quarter of 1981.

"Another important aspect is the beginning of cooperation with Nicaragua and the continuation of work with the Bureau of Overseas Scientific and Technical Research (ORSTOM) and the National Center for Scientific Research (CNRS) of France, among other international organizations."

Training

Concerning advanced training for our scientific personnel, Torres emphasized that the 5-year period came to a close with 80 qualified scientists. The work of the rank committee was intensified on an organizational level and committees were set up based on sections of science. In addition, 14 postgraduate courses were given, along with a special study with an initial registration of 300 graduate students.

"At the present time, we can see moderate progress in certain fields of scientific and technical activity, as well as a certain accumulation of experience and knowledge that enable us to see the real scope of work done and the limitations facing us.

"Over 100 scientific institutions and centers of higher learning are doing research or work in scientific and technical development, constiting a network that covers a whole range of activity such as the sugar industry, agriculture, health, mining and metallurgy, chemistry, mechanics, electronics, food and others. However, our work is notably inadequate in areas such as construction, energy, light industry, transport, natural resources and the environment.

"As our Commander in Chief Fidel Castro pointed out in his speech at the official opening of the Animal Health Center in September (1980), 'research will naturally not be the field of everyone, but it will be the field of those with the greatest dedication, the greatest vocation, the greatest discipline and the greatest ability.' He continued: 'The research scientist must have the vocation, the clear consciousness of serving his country and at the same time, logically enough, the need for improvement, progress and success of any human being.'

"Guided by the points and resolutions of the First Congress of the party and the resolutions of the Second Congress, as well as specific directives emanating from our higher organs, we have tried to put together, continuing the experience that we consider to be positive from all of these years, a whole series of fundamental guidelines for the work of the organization during the coming year, by means of a document that will synthesize the main tasks that must be accomplished by the different organizational units, with the aim that the document will help channel the year's work and at the same time, serve as a control tool for Academy officials."

New Period

There are many complex tasks in the institutional and organizational fields that must still be performed so that science and technology may develop under more rational conditions and improve their efficiency, based on their connection with the economic objectives stemming from the construction of socialism in Cuba.

"Our first fundamental guideline for 1980," the president of the Academy of Sciences said, in referring to work underway and the future activity of the organization, "is aimed at compliance with the matters under the responsibility of the Academy, emphasizing the achievement of objectives set forth and a critical analysis of deficiencies detected.

"Based on the principle of concentrating our efforts on those matters that are vital to the economy, we have approved 49 principal government problems for this 5-year period, while other matters remain under study and may give rise to new proposals of main government problems, which would in turn provide greater coverage of the objectives of scientific and technical progress.

"In activities that are the responsibility of the organizations, we must carry out and enforce provisions guaranteeing the maintenance and strengthening of the principles of socialist law, and ensure and oversee the execution and completion of tasks related to the Science and Technology Plan for the 5-year period now beginning."

COOPERATION, SOLIDARITY WITH MOZAMBIQUE DESCRIBED

Havana CUBA INTERNACIONAL in Spanish Aug-Sep 81 pp 10-11

[Article by Miguel Rivero, special correspondent of CUBA INTERNACIONAL]

[Text] Maputo--The cooperation and solidarity of the people of Cuba with the people of Mozambique date back to the harsh, difficult years of the war waged by the African nation against the Portuguese colonialists.

The first bilateral contacts to apply Cuban assistance to the immediate tasks of national reconstruction took place following the proclamation of independence in 1975. As early as 1976 the first group of Cuban internationalists was in Mozambique; it consisted of 10 specialists in livestock raising.

In mid-1977 the two countries signed the first basic agreement for cooperation, together with various complementary agreements between individual governmental entities. This made it possible for cooperation quickly to be broadened and diversified to include a substantial number of Mozambican economic sectors.

The First Cuban-Mozambican Intergovernmental Conference, held in Maputo from 13 to 23 October 1978, agreed to institutionalize the Joint Commission for Cooperation, while new agreements were signed that substantially increased the already existing ties.

The second meeting of the Joint Commission was held in Maputo from 22 to 29 October 1980, by which time the bilateral trade already consisted of cooperation with, or assistance to, a total of 15 ministries and governmental entities relating to the economy, public health, education and the public services.

Better than any chronological history or mere enumeration of meetings and conferences, however, is the story that the protagonists themselves can tell.

Advisers Tell Their Story

The interview with the Cuban internationalists took place in the "estate" (apartment house) in Maputo in which a number of technicians and specialists reside.

Eduardo Sanchez Blanco is 30 years of age. A veterinarian, he has worked for 2 consecutive years in Mozambique and is carrying out his first internationalist assignment.

Sanchez explained that his basic task has been to advise the Mozambican side concerning measures that should be adopted to maintain health inspection on Mozambique's borders.

He stated that the internationalists have simultaneously assisted in founding a school in Zambezi Province for the training of intermediate-level technicians.

At this center the Cubans are teaching classes in stock raising and animal health. The specialists in veterinary science and stock raising have also cooperated in drafting the comprehensive development plan for the decade 1981-1990.

After almost 2 and one-half years in Mozambique Dr Esperanza Figueroa Silva, specialist in psychiatry, has become one of the best-known Cuban women in the field of medicine. She is working in three hospitals in Greater Maputo; serves as clinical director in two of these hospitals; and offers her services in the outpatient clinic of the Central Hospital in this city.

Last year Esperanza also taught classes in psychiatry at Eduardo Mondlane University. "The majority of cases I took care of during that period," she said, "reflected the traumas of the colonial war or the exploitation to which this country was subjected by the Portuguese. These traumas, and their consequences, have left lasting scars among the population."

To have an idea of what the colonial period was like, suffice it to say that when the war ended only one specialist in psychiatry (a Portuguese national) was left in Maputo, because in more than 4 centuries of rule not a single Mozambican had been trained in that branch of medicine.

Dean of the Cubans

Adalberto Diaz Gonzalez, a specialist in the art of fishing, is regarded as the "dean" of the Cubans who work in Mozambique. He has been in this country since August 1977 and is currently serving as adviser to the Secretariat of State for Fishing.

"When I arrived in Mozambique," Diaz said, "there were four other Cubans working here; today we have 59 technicians in the fishing sector alone. A new group will join us very soon, moreover, and we believe the number of specialists in this sector will total more than 100."

The "dean" also disclosed that a center for training boat captains, technologists and drivers is already in operation; financed by the FAO, it offers intensive courses taught by Cuban teachers.

Here too, however, the grievous heritage left by colonialism is having an impact with its sequel of illiteracy and low level of culture, which have the effect of limiting the work of the specialists.

"We have students who from the practical standpoint can already be regarded as boat captains," Diaz said, "but they have difficulty in assimilating the theory of navigation in a short time, inasmuch as a specific cultural base is a prerequisite."

The school offers a 1-year course in which the students receive 6 months of classes in the theory and 6 months of practice. A total of 92 young people have graduated at this center to date.

The Cubans also impart instruction in the techniques for canning shrimp, and seven advisers serve as brigade leaders in the maintenance and repair of the fishing fleet.

In only 10 months on the job, Ubaldo Acuna Despaigne has already toured all the country's provinces in his capacity as national adviser for agricultural mechanization.

Cuban cooperation has also made itself felt in the agricultural sector. The mechanization technicians are based in seven of the 10 provinces; they have assisted in the creation of an agricultural management unit together with other units charged with working in the livestock, copra and tea sectors. At the same time, nine Cuban advisers are working in the headquarters section of the agricultural administration.

"We have prepared 10 projects for Mozambique's agricultural development that are already in process of implementation," Ubaldo said.

The Cubans have also assisted in the organization of a national seminar on mechanization; it was held in Manica Province with the participation of representatives of all the nation's enterprises.

Teachers from the Caribbean island are also working in a school for tractor drivers, intermediate-level technicians and mechanics; it is located in Tete Province.

The last Cuban to be interviewed was Isidro Diez, likewise a "veteran," who since 1977 has served as economic adviser in the Cuban Embassy in Maputo.

Isidro stated that more than 4,000 Mozambicans have been trained to date as technicians or skilled workers under the direction of personnel from his country who are working in Mozambique, while other Mozambicans have traveled to the Caribbean island as students, on scholarships awarded by the Cuban Government.

He explained that at the present time this cooperation extends to 25 sectors of the Mozambican economy, and that during 1981 it will be broadened to include the specialty of geodesy and cartography. Moreover, contacts were initiated this year with the State Committee for Prices of Cuba.

This Cuban cooperation, which began in 1976 with the aforementioned 10 livestock technicians, is today being provided on an infinitely broader scale. Hundreds of experts are working in the sectors of agriculture, fishing, the sugar industry, education and public health as an expression of a friendship that has been strengthened, and as an expression of the ties that exist between the Cuban Revolution and the process of national liberation which in Mozambique is directed by Samora Machel.

U.S. PLANS FOR CARIBBEAN REGION SCORED

Havana CUBA INTERNACIONAL in Spanish Aug-Sep 81 p 12

[Article by Jose Bodes Gomez: "New Plan Concerning the Caribbean"]

[Text] Preparations have begun in Washington for creation of a new "Alliance for Progress" which would be similar in its objectives to the one that failed in the 1960's but would this time be restricted to the Caribbean region.

The publicity campaign for this incipient program was timed to coincide with the visit to the U.S. capital by Venezuelan Minister of the Interior Rafael Andres Montes de Oca, who has thereby been transformed into the official spokesman for the plan.

Montes de Oca met recently with U.S. Vice President George Bush, Secretary of Defense Caspar Weinberger and high officials of the State Department, following which he spoke with the press to report on the projected new "Alliance."

The publicity campaign presents this initiative as a joint action by the governments of the United States and Venezuela whereas in reality it is the United States' idea, the weekly NEWSWEEK has disclosed.

According to the NEWSWEEK report, the administration of President Ronald Reagan has proposed to consult with various governments of the region with a view to supporting Washington in its new "Alliance for Progress."

The objective of the program (according to the U.S. magazine and also the Venezuelan cabinet minister) is to contain the "advance of communism" in the Caribbean by encouraging economic development.

The previous "Alliance"--which pursued the same objective--was launched shortly after the victory of the Cuban Revolution.

In the present case, the "Alliance" proposal surfaced following the people's victories in Nicaragua and Grenada and also the consolidation of the Cuban revolutionary process.

Although there were various reasons for the failure of the first program, two of the principal causes were the lack of funds (because Washington never provided financial assistance in the amount promised) and the inability of many of the governments of the region to introduce the partial reforms proposed by the "Alliance."

Washington's preoccupation with the changes which are occurring in the Caribbean region and Central America is not a new development; the previous administration had already attempted to counteract this situation by means of a series of measures ranging from the economic to the military.

The creation of a special force in Florida for possible intervention in the Caribbean--together with the holding of large-scale military maneuvers such as "Solid Shield 80"--were among these measures.

The Carter administration promised to increase financial assistance in the economic sphere, and during his term in office there was created--under the aegis of the World Bank--a so-called "cooperation group" for the economic development of the Caribbean.

The results yielded by these measures have not satisfied the present U.S. rulers, and a new campaign is now being planned to support those governments of the region which Washington regards as its allies.

One of the plan's more vulnerable points is the fact that it cannot be presented as a comprehensive program intended to cope with the problem of underdevelopment in the region, for Washington's decision to suspend all forms of aid for the reconstruction of Nicaragua is still of very recent date.

Nor can this plan be presented as one based on the economic needs of the countries of the Caribbean, because there are an equal number of other countries in Latin America that are in the same situation, as is proved by the statistics on illiteracy, malnutrition and poverty in Paraguay, Bolivia, Colombia, Peru and so on.

The U.S. administration is currently in the midst of a delicate situation with respect to its domestic economy and has already invited its allies in Western Europe to share the burden of the future loans, as for example on the occasion of the visit of West German Chancellor Helmut Schmidt.

These negotiations serve to confirm that in addition to its operations of harassment and destabilization against the democratic governments of the region, Washington would also like to commit other Western powers to its policy toward the Caribbean.

RIZO NOTES REASONS FOR HIGHER AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTIVITY

Havana TRABAJADORES in Spanish 7 Oct 81 p 4

[Speech by Julian Rizo Alvarez, member of the Secretariat of the Central Committee of the PCC, at Agricultural Workers Day at Bay of Pigs Victory Citrus Fruit Enterprise in Jaguey Grande; date not given]

[Text] Comrades, fellow speakers, comrade agricultural workers:

Today we commemorate Agricultural Workers Day, the day of those who work the land and raise livestock, the day of the most important producers of food for the people.

We have arrived at this day with encouraging achievements and truly promising productive and economic results.

The rate of achievement for commercial production was 102 percent, costs were reduced to 86 percent of what had been planned, productivity attained 105 percent and the average wage attained 104 percent.

Thanks to the dedicated efforts of all our workers, who day after day learn the secrets of the soil and extract its best fruits, we produced over 5.7 million quintals of potatoes, an increase of over 750,000 quintals, making a national record yield of 5,940 quintals per caballeria [1 caballeria = 33.2 acres]. In this great effort, Matanzas was the real champion, with 6,910 quintals per caballeria, while Ciego de Avila, Pinar del Rio and Sancti Spiritus also exceeded the 6,000 mark. Particular mention should be made of Havana, which obtained 5,949 quintals per caballeria on the respectable figure of 559 caballerias planted, by far the highest in the country.

Many other achievements could be noted during this period, all contributing to this commemoration of Agricultural Workers Day and helping it to reach a high level of recognition.

The achievements for other tubers and types of produce were 108 and 127 percent respectively. Vegetable yields in Matanzas were over 5,500 quintals per caballeria; in Havana, over 4,900; and in Villa Clara and the Isle of Youth, over 4,000 quintals.

We are also producing more rice: From the figure of 700 quintals that we obtained in 1975, we managed yields of 1,366 quintals per caballeria. In rice growing, we must emphasize the yields achieved by Granma, which exceeded 1,400 quintals per caballeria, with the Fernando Echenique Enterprise leading the way with 1,868 quintals per caballeria. Citrus fruits continued their ascent, with a plan completion rate of 118 percent. During this 5-year period, we shall reach the figure of 1 million tons, with over 500,000 for export.

Milk Production

In the cattle raising field, we should point out a number of results: Milk production is 13 million liters higher than last year, despite the drought early in the year that caused the plan to fall below its projected figure by some 9 million liters. One should mention the results of the Havana provinces, which in peak months months obtained daily figures of some 1.2 million liters, and Camaguey, which produced 500,000 liters a day. Swine workers have also made progress. Far from discouraging workers, the underhanded practices of the imperialists, consisting of waging bacteriological war on us by introducing various viruses into our country, including the African swine fever virus, strengthened them. All the swine enterprises completed their plan for this phase of the year, with national results of 107 percent. Fowl raising continued its progress, with a completion rate of 109 percent for meat and 102 percent for eggs. Our chicken farmers are steadily moving toward the figure of 100,000 tons of meat.

Beekeepers are also marching in the vanguard of the agricultural army and their plan completion rate was 127 percent. Their brigades are working hard to be in the vanguard and to produce 100 tons of honey. In this enumeration of meritorious production achievements, we have left tobacco for the last. Our most recent harvest achieved a historic record, with the production of over 1.16 million quintals. Pinar del Rio Province achieved a special record with over 800,000 quintals.

Here also, the imperialist maliciousness receiving a resounding reply. The previous year, they decimated tobacco plantations with rust and this year, tobacco growers achieved the highest record of all time.

Within the context of so many production achievements, so many successes, I believe it is proper to render homage to the farmers of Matanzas Province.

I must add that this year, seven provinces vied to host this magnificent event: Matanzas, Havana, Havana City, Ciego de Avila, Santiago de Cuba, Villa Clara and Cienfuegos. Camaguey and Holguin could not stay with them to the end. Unfortunately, the results of the rest of the provinces were far lower.

The Havana farmers were even somewhat unhappy at not being able to host this event. They made a great effort and obtained meritorious results given the largest area planted in the country. That is true and we must recognize it publicly. But we had established the principle that results must be rewarded over efforts and preferably, quality results.

Here, the Matanzas farmers were unquestionably in the lead, being the most efficient. Matanzas completed its commercial production plan with a rate of 110 percent, the average wage of 103 percent. To produce 1 peso, it cost them 81 cents and their earnings were over 10 million pesos.

This was a true manifestation of economic efficiency. In this respect, we believe that all the provinces have the conditions for reaching such levels of efficiency and even for overcoming Matanzas, which has won the right to host the Agricultural Workers Day event 3 years in a row. We believe that we would all ask the same question: What is the reason for the success of Matanzas, which has once again won the right to host this event? I believe that the first achievement of the Matanzas farmers was to bring about an identification between the workers and their plans, their enterprises.

In that province, they talk about potato families, tuber families, other families, and this is not a mere phrase, a pretty play on words lacking in meaning. Here, saying "productive family" means unity, cooperation, the contribution of everyone and a fight for the same production objective, a production objective that begins to be won in the discussion of the plan, in which all enterprises, all lots, all mechanics, all irrigators, technicians and officials participate. It is a production objective for which specific figures are set in every place, figures that the workers themselves establish, figures that everyone applauds because everyone feels a part of them, because they see in them the reflection of their ideas, experiences, intelligence and efforts. How many times have they come out of a meeting with figures far over those of the plan? These production objectives continue to be achieved in the respectful application of farming techniques, with true discipline and zeal, where shoddy work and routine practices have no place, where nothing is skipped, where superficial triumphal boasting is not accepted.

This achievement is confirmed when one sees that the enterprises objectively analyze and practice exigency as a method. Trade union sections encourage and channel the emulation of workers and party cells oversee and worry about the tiniest detail of the workers' problems. That is the secret of Matanzas. There is nothing mysterious, nothing magic about it! It simply means involving the workers in the plan, guiding them in their techniques, overseeing and meeting the needs and concerns of the workers!

Emulation

Comrades:

In every production objective, which is at the same time an ideological objective, emulation plays an essential role. On occasion, we see that emulation is viewed as a formal matter, something that is guided and that has to be put into practice, even if only bureaucratically. This is an unfortunate confusion. Emulation is an ideological problem. Emulation is a practical way of seeing that moral incentives are accompanied by material incentives. Emulation lives and grows among men; that is its environment. It is born of the ideas and enthusiasm of men and nothing is more foreign to the spirit of the agricultural workers' emulation than bureaucracy. Emulation dies when taken away from the workers collectives, when it is reduced to figures and models. Emulation must be dynamic, agile and lively among men, when they translate it into their work every day with greater productive efficiency, when each individual and the collective as a whole makes a commitment.

Emulation related to man, identified with him, is without a doubt a relationship of success, of productive and ideological successes.

A great deal could be written or said about the importance in socialism of seeing that moral and material incentives are creatively linked, but it is enough to start a real emulation to understand its scope. A man who emulates is capable of reaching all goals, of achieving the greatest quality. A man who emulates is capable of generating valuable ideas, of making discipline a normal activity. Emulation is an inseparable weapon in the building of socialism. That is why the party recognizes with such great satisfaction the different emulative movements being developed by the agricultural union. To a great extent, they have been the boost given to the productive desire we mentioned a short while ago. The movement of model units was an injection of enthusiasm into livestock breeding. The movement of socialist work units is a new force in the fowl and swine branches. The movement for efficiency in machinery, the emulation in breeding, the silo campaign, the individual and collective emulation in all branches of the sector are the driving forces that will carry production and the productivity of agricultural workers very far.

We have great tasks ahead. We commented only a moment ago that already this year, seven provinces fought to host this event. We can imagine what will happen next year. What will the other six provinces do that fought with Matanzas until the last minute? How will the productive shame of the other provinces that were left behind and the special Isle of Youth municipality react? How will the hard-working, fighting Havana farmers or those of courageous Santiago, which is taking giant steps, react? What will Camaguey and Holguin do to avoid remaining among the least efficient?

I am sure that next year, many of the figures mentioned will be erased. I am sure that it will even be hard for the Matanzas farmers to maintain their position as the vanguard leaders.

We are awaiting the development of a new, strong phase involving hard work, a phase in which there will be great enthusiasm and interest in becoming more efficient daily.

Not Efficient Enough

Comrades:

We appreciate the progress that has been made by agriculture in many places. We congratulate you for it and recognize it with great satisfaction. However, we must honestly say that we still have a long way to go to achieve the parameters of efficiency to which we aspire and which we can obtain. Our production is still below what we need for socialism. It is enough to compare these figures in order to realize the amount of agricultural yield we must still discover. Yields in tubers and root plants for the period analyzed were 2,700 quintals per caballeria, while Matanzas achieved 5,100 and Havana 4,900. In other words, these provinces obtained nearly double the country's yields.

If we analyze the difference in potato yields in the different provinces, the difference in vegetable yields, the difference in rice yields of the Fernando Echenique Enterprise in Granma and other enterprises, we realize the productive potential that is not being used, how many poor techniques are used, how much better management must be in certain places. We must say that the very enterprises that are now successful, those that are now outstanding, still have great reserves to develop.

This means that that important production movement, the "Revolution for High Yields" of which we have talked so much and of whose importance we are so convinced, is scarcely beginning. It has a great future ahead and must be built on the basis of the principle of combining all efforts and wills to turn our agriculture into a veritable emporium of riches.

We must emphasize the optimum use of the agricultural land we have available. Our island cannot grow. This is the land we have, but the population does grow and we need food.

Furthermore, every day there will be more highways, more buildings, more towns, because development requires this, but we shall always have the same land area and there will perhaps be less land to cultivate. Consequently, it is indispensable to get the most out of our land, make it produce more, not think about crops covering vast areas, but crops that produce high yields. At the present time, studies are being made of the productive potential of the different farm areas, chemical soil studies that will enable us to learn what our potential yield is, which are the best areas for certain crops. We shall then have to make our enterprises efficient because along with technical and scientific knowledge, discipline and determination are decisive, irreplaceable, for making the soil produce. In making soil produce, we must pay attention to the way the land is divided. It may appear that this is not very important, but because of a lack of population, because of many fences, roads or unnecessary paths, we are wasting hundreds of caballerias.

We referred to the importance of observing the proper growing techniques for each crop as a means of achieving productivity, but I believe that we have to go a little further back. Good results for every crop are, in addition to knowledge and proper care of the soil, planting and the development of plantations, closely related to another principal element: seed. With poor quality seed that is a mixture and not healthy, we will never obtain high productivity. This seems basic since everyone understands in practice how much it is hurting us.

There are places where we are thinking of a large plan, of volumes of planting, of the mobilization of huge amounts of resources, but we think little about seed, in the amount that will be required, in the preparation of seedbeds, the purity of seed, its development or conservation. The large plan may be planted, but few plants will grow, they will be unhealthy and spindly and from the very beginning, we are ruining the high yield to which we aspire. Paying attention to the quality of seed is a basic factor in agriculture. Another problem that we must face now is broadening the range of tubers and vegetables and extending the harvesting period.

These products are the basis of our diet. The people like and need them, but we cannot only offer sweet potatoes and yams to the people because they reject them and they are wasted. We must offer a wide variety of tubers and produce that will satisfy the wants of the people and permit us to aspire to better prices and less waste.

In this matter of the range of tubers and the extension of the harvesting period, the banana is a product that plays a vital role, but we have not yet achieved substantial results. The Revolution for High Yields has a vast field of work in the promotion and stabilization of banana crops. One of the best ways to intensify production in agriculture is irrigation.

To a great extent, development of rice growing, promotion of citrus crops, improved productivity of tubers and produce and the expansion of harvesting periods, as well as the development of pasture, depend on better and greater dissemination of irrigation systems.

A constant concern of every enterprise must be attention to plant and animal health.

Nor must we forget that in addition to the natural contingencies of insects and diseases that a tropical country must face, we have the perversity of the neighboring imperialist enemy which, powerless to defeat us militarily and economically, now tries to make us yield by means of hunger and the exportation of insects and viruses. Whence the additional importance of plant and animal health under the current circumstances, although its role has always been decisive.

Milk Producers

Comrade agricultural workers:

At this important meeting of agricultural producers, we cannot fail to mention, however briefly, agricultural machinery. We have over 30,000 tractors in agriculture. It is an indicator of the efforts of the revolution to improve work productivity and free man from hard physical labor. But in 1980, those tractors worked only 4.6 hours a day in agriculture and 5.6 hours in livestock raising. Some 20 percent of those tractors' time was used for unproductive labor. How much productivity was lost in that manner? How much economic inefficiency does this signify? We are confident that the movement for efficiency in machinery being promoted by the union will be a decisive factor in the correction of this situation.

Comrades:

A few moments ago, we were praising the movement of model units in livestock raising, saying how it had contributed to progress in livestock raising. We mentioned achievements in the production of milk, the advances that some provinces have made in some areas. It was interesting to learn how "Ubre Banca," a product of the work of the revolution in the genetic improvement of our cattle, led to a world milk production record. This example not only serves as an inspiration, but also constitutes one more boost for our livestock raising.

We are convinced that the day will come when there will be hundreds and thousands of large milk producers. We still have many tasks ahead of us in order to make our livestock raising operation efficient. We must devote great attention and efforts to that endeavor. In periods of drought, our animals still go hungry. Despite the progress in the production of hay and silage, we are still not keeping all the grass that grows abundantly in the spring and we sometimes preserve it poorly. Industrial by-products are wasted that would be ideal for livestock feed.

The birth rate continues to be low and the mortality rate high, meaning that the size of our herd remains stagnant.

These are the problems that must be faced by livestock breeders and although our future in this area looks brighter thanks to the enthusiasm and zeal that are being converted into a tradition at every enterprise, on every ranch, in every cattleman, we cannot rest or be overconfident until we manage to have a highly productive herd for both meat and milk.

Organization

Finally, comrades, in speaking about the tasks of the 5-year period, we must emphasize the importance of consolidating the status of the enterprise as the organizational unit capable of adequately planning and overseeing work.

The socialist principle of "from each according to his ability, to each according to his work" must govern our administrative and trade union work. We must work every day to find new forms helping to improve the ability of workers.

Promoting the obtention of the ninth grade and improving our technical level, backing greater mastery of every activity and, at the same time, using forms of pay based on output, relating the individual to his work, paying for the amount of land finished and developing integrated brigades: These are new forms of organizing work in keeping with the transformation of forms of agricultural production. The activity of the Ministry of Agriculture and the Union of Agricultural and Forestry Workers is aimed in this direction: in the fight for efficiency, for higher production figures each day, based on the proper use of management and inspection methods in keeping with our economic policy and our revolutionary principles. On this happy day, a day on which we have the satisfaction and honor of paying homage to agricultural workers, we want to extend warm congratulations to the 119 national vanguard workers and the 17 Lazaro Pena medal winners, along with the representatives of the 45 national vanguard enterprises who are honoring this event with their presence. What an example of productivity, of the correct care of machinery, inventions and innovations, of efficiency at work, we find in this group of workers and vanguard enterprises! May we express to all of you the recognition and homage of the party and all the revolutionary people!

To all the agricultural workers, who on this day receive the stimulus and recognition of the people for the services they render to their nation, go the congratulations of the party in well-deserved recognition from all society, which knows well that it has in you a powerful bulwark and army of revolutionaries. Congratulations, my beloved agricultural workers and thank you!

DEVELOPMENT, USE OF NEW CANE VARIETIES NOTED

Havana JUVENTUD TECNICA in Spanish Jul 81 pp 20-21

[Article by Lucy Gispert]

[Text] In the past 5 years, the country's scientific institutions related to the study of sugar cane have arrived at surprising results, both with respect to the search for new varieties as well as innovative concepts about growing techniques.

The possibility of having technical personnel capable of undertaking the development of sugar cane agriculture and industrialization has enabled us to begin recovery programs in areas affected by insects and diseases and to have more ambitious objectives such as the search for varieties more resistant to drought. This goal is aimed at balancing growth and development in the conditions of our tropical climate, whose rainfall is so varied and unpredictable.

Many factors gave rise to the discovery or creation of more resistant varieties. This required hard work lasting months, years and even decades. To be more precise, we would say that it is a continuing task that combines the experience of research workers of other phases.

Research was channeled along different paths. In Havana City, for example, the Academy of Sciences Sugar Cane Research Center is located.

In addition, the Institute for Basic Research in Tropical Agriculture (INIFAT) is also conducting important studies on the subject, relating its work to meteorological factors resulting from Cuba's geographic position on the globe.

From a broader, national standpoint, the Academy of Sciences is heading up experimental geographic work in the different provinces. The latter are conducting laboratory studies in the field of climatic and ecological conditions of every region, which means that the laboratory is taken to the very scene of events.

By these means, it has been possible to provide answers to phenomena of great scientific interest such as the environmental genotype -- that is, the influence of the environment on organic nature and on the behavior of plants.

At the Second Exhibition of Achievements in Science and Technology, interesting subjects were presented with respect to varieties of cane. For example, the Matanzas Experimental Station showed studies on the inhibition of flowering on the variety Mayari 5464 through gamma rays. It also exhibited other research on sources of resistance to rust bacteria.

Holguin Province developed valuable research on varieties to be substituted for the Barbados 4362, which has caused such great damage because of its susceptibility to rust.

Results of the variety Mayari 5465 on the Guatemala Cane Enterprise constituted another serious study done by technicians within the framework of the Second Exhibition.

Others, such as the Jaronu 60-5, B. 42231 and My 54129 and their application in the eastern provinces, were seen and discussed in studies of varieties.

It should be pointed out that in the field of the practical application of research results, the success of the studies is obvious.

The recommendations of varieties for the different provinces include:

C 16-68	Las Tunas and Holguin (all)
My 5715	All provinces except Havana
My 54 129	All provinces
C 3 2368	All provinces
Ja 6419	All provinces
Ja 6411	Havana, Matanzas, Villa Clara, Tunas and Holguin
C 88967	Havana and Holguin
C 147 66	Ciego de Avila, Camaguey and Las Tunas
C 334 64	Matanzas, Camaguey and Holguin
C 166 67	Havana Province

SUGAR INDUSTRY ACCIDENTS SEEN AS AVOIDABLE

Havana JUVENTUD TECNICA in Spanish Jul 81 pp 62-64

[Article by Jose R. Garcia Gonzalez]

[Text] Unfavorable microclimatic conditions exceeding acceptable limits are the most frequent cause of accidents in the sugar industry.

Five work posts have been labeled as so-called "hot spots," based on research done: oven cleaners and helpers, boiler operators, puntistas [translation unknown] and boiler helpers.

In these areas, the heat of the environment, combined with that produced by the process of producing sugar, the old equipment that is inadequately insulated, and the poorly designed and ventilated premises cause high temperatures that result in discomfort and changes in physiological parameters.

Consequently, in most cases, workers involved in the processes refuse to wear or use individual protective gear, arguing that it gets in the way of their work. Over half fail to use helmets, boots, aprons or gloves, which results in an unfortunate number of easily avoided incidents.

It has also been found that in some cases, the safety violation is not committed directly by the workers. Rather, the risk of accident stems from the failure to comply with Resolution 35 of the Ministry of the Sugar Industry as a result of the lack of safety equipment in warehouses, late delivery and the fact that workers not not accustomed to following safety measures.

How To Be Safe

Studies made by specialists and experts from the Work Safety Institute in several sugar enterprises where a large number of accidents had occurred in the so-called "hot spots" led to the following recommendations: using safety goggles NS-627B and asbestos aprons during the cleaning of ovens; improving the microclimate in the hot spots (ventilating systems and better insulation) so as to promote the use of individual safety gear; paying special attention to the promotion of work safety habits; improving the training of industrial safety officials and improving environmental hygiene in sugar enterprises.

The life of the individual is a basic aspect of our society. The correct and constant use of safety equipment is not only a duty, but an obligation.

AMBASSADOR DISCUSSES TRADE RELATIONS WITH SPAIN

Managua EL NUEVO DIARIO in Spanish 31 Oct 81 p 9

[Text] Nicaragua's ambassador to Spain Orlando Castillo considers trade relations, which the revolutionary government is developing with the private and government sectors in Spain, to be of great significance to Nicaragua.

The ambassador said that a mixed company has already been established, made up of Spanish businessmen and the government of Nicaragua, through the Ministry of Foreign Trade.

In addition to Ambassador Castillo, Alejandro Castillo Martinez, commercial counsellor of the Nicaraguan Embassy in Madrid, also attended the interview.

Alejandro noted that this company will try to enlarge the area of negotiations. He said that it is hoped that 8 percent of the coffee output will be exported to Spain this year; on the other hand, consumer products will be purchased and this is now being worked out through the line of credit granted by the Spanish Foreign Trade Bank.

The line of credit runs up to the sum of $25 million which will be given at a moderate interest rate, such 7.5 and 8.25 percent, according to the items involved.

He said that the line of credit will be used for the purchase of agricultural machinery, construction equipment, and consumer goods.

The latter will include items worth $5 million and a portion of these purchases will be sold approximately on 15 November, consisting of toys and other products for Christmas trade.

Twenty-Two Businessmen Coming

Ambassador Orlando Castillo Estrada announced that 22 businessmen would arrive in the country in November from the province of Saragoza, headed by Jose Luis Martinez Cardial, president of the Chamber of Commerce and Industry.

He said that they represent 20 industrial enterprises producing all kinds of agricultural machinery and construction machinery. This, said Ambassador Castillo, reflects the work that is being done along these lines by the embassy.

During his stay, he added, he will talk to Dr Sergio Ramirez Mercado, member of the National Reconstruction Government Junta.

Some of the businessmen have been in the country before and are fully aware of the effort that is being made to promote economic development; this is why they have expressed their desire to negotiate on a level favorable to our people.

The ambassador indicated that they also talked to officials from the Planning Ministry, including Dr Edmundo Jarquin who explained the country's economic situation to them in further detail.

They also talked to Foreign Trade Minister Alejandro Martinez Cuenca and members of the board of directors of enterprises under that ministry.

They likewise conferred with the vice ministers of the MIDINRA, transportation, and construction. The program includes visits to the agricultural center and the geothermal projects.

He said that the Spanish-Nicaraguan chamber might be established by the end of the year; it will be an organization that will try to broaden trade relations. Its headquarters will be in Madrid.

Jose Esteban

Questioned as to the participation of Jose Esteban Gonzalez in the seminar on human rights, sponsored by the Council of Europe, to be held in Spain, he explained that the Council of Europe is made up of parliamentary representatives from the European countries and that a commission of members of parliament in the Christian Democratic delegation invited them.

In his remarks, Jose Esteban Gonzalez--said the ambassador--asked that a commission be appointed to visit Nicaragua to analyze the situation regarding the implementation of human rights for the purpose of getting the European economic community to suspend aid to Nicaragua.

This reproachable step was rejected by the delegates from Amnesty International of Jurists and the Inter-American Human Rights Council as well as by other European personalities invited to attend the seminar.

This is why the remarks by Jose Esteban Gonzalez had no repercussions whatsoever.

The representatives from Amnesty International of Jurists and from the Inter-American Human Rights Council recalled the resolutions passed 2 months ago on the case of Nicaragua which are entirely contrary to the statements made by Gonzalez.

An example of Jose Esteban's failure is that the seminar's resolutions do not mention Nicaragua but rather El Salvador, Guatemala, and South American countries that systematically violate human rights.

Ambassador Castillo noted that it was well known that Gonzalez was always seen together with the delegate from El Salvador.

The ambassador also noted that the mission from the FSLN [Sandinist National Liberation Front] stressed that the human rights violations, of which the Nicaraguan people is a victim, come from outside the country, involving some bad sons of Nicaragua.

On the other hand, Ambassador Orlando Castillo Estrada said that it was quite logical for the delegation, headed by Commander of the Revolution Carlos Nunez Tellez was very useful; one of the purposes was directly to inform the government, European political personalities, and the Spanish people about the true situation in Nicaragua.

The ambassador repeated that publications manipulated by the transnational news agencies are still being put out in Spain but that the media publish comments and analyses favorable to the Sandinist People's Revolution.

The Spanish people continues to be optimistic and sympathetic toward the people of Nicaragua and the solidarity houses are growing with each passing day.

He said that there was a great eagerness to learn more about the progress of the Central American peoples, a phenomenon which springs from the triumph of the Nicaraguan revolution.

COSEP UNABLE TO ACCEPT LOSS OF ECONOMIC POWER

Managua BARRICADA in Spanish 29 Oct 81 pp 3, 5

[Article by Sergio Lopez: "What the COSEP Top Leadership Does Not Understand"]

[Text] It is difficult for some big business operators to get used to the idea that they once and for all have lost the control they used to exercise over the government's economic and legal administration and they are now trying to create a climate which will enable them to recover the power they have lost.

There is no other way to explain the attitude of big capitalists who, from the top leadership of the COSEP, launched a challenge against the people's government, knowing full well that the country is going through serious economic difficulties and that there are forces which are preparing the conditions for military aggression against Nicaragua, not to mention the counterrevolutionary gangs which frequently invade national territory, leaving a trail of blood and suffering behind.

And while economic difficulties exist primarily because of the seriousness of the crisis of the economic model which world capitalism imposed upon us Central Americans, the threats of aggression--and the leaders of the COSEP know that only too well--spring from the fact that what we have here is a revolutionary transformation process which is radically altering our society's economic and political relationships and which allows no return to the past.

They must thus realize that it is necessary to teach new forms of coexistence, very different from those that prevailed in the past and that they are having so much trouble forgetting.

The statistics disclosed by Central Bank President Alfredo Cesar and Finance Corporation General Manager Fernando Guzman show that the Sandinist revolution not only speaks of coexistence between the private and public sector, within the context of a people's government, but turns that expressed political determination into reality through the administration of the financial resources--and they are certainly in short supply--which the revolutionary state has.

Here are the statistics that tell us the private sector got more than 60 percent of the loans granted to the production and commerce sector. Of course, the beneficiaries of today are not exclusively those who in the past were the only ones to get their hands on the financial resources available to the bank, although they, too, received a significant share of the loans granted by the revolution.

Now the small and medium agricultural producers, the small cattle ranchers, the craftsmen can get loans and, in spite of the difficulties they are experiencing, these are not the major problems that have caused the nationalized banking industry to fail to meet its obligations. It is precisely the big operators, the richest, who owe most and who discharge their obligations toward the banks under the National Finance System least of all.

We must also remind them that while private investments in 1980 amounted to the insignificant sum of 400 million cordobas, the profits of the commercial sector came to 1.5 billion cordobas.

It would be better for the country if, instead of rejecting the historical responsibility they have for the economic crisis experienced in Nicaragua, instead of causing a confrontation with the revolutionary government, instead of destabilizing the revolution, they were precisely to seek a way of helping the process of national reconstruction by carrying out a policy of unity around the great tasks which are being planned within the economy and defense.

A patriotic attitude necessarily means realizing that power has changed hands and that power is now being held by the people, the people who gives them the opportunity to be useful to the fatherland and who will be implacable against those who want to destroy what costs so much to achieve.

PRINCIPLES OF SANDINIST REVOLUTION EXPLAINED

Managua EL NUEVO DIARIO in Spanish 22 Oct 81 p 2

[Article by Adolfo Miranda Saenz: "Sandinism and Marxism-Leninism"]

> [Text] Our revolution combines all of the universal principles of political science which are valuable and useful. The recalcitrant anticommunists do not agree that we are a "New Nicaragua" with an autochthonous revolution. Our revolution is a Christian revolution and cannot ignore the Marxist-Leninist doctrinaire values. There is no incompatibility with the Sandinist blueprint for a mixed economy and political pluralism. What happens to COSEP [Higher Council of Private Enterprise] is not a matter for Marxism-Leninism but a matter of having to live under new rules.

For the Nicaraguan people, who for many years suffered Somoza, capitalist, and imperialist oppression, preventing it from studying and learning political theories and doctrines that were not that the United States and its Spanish-American vassals wanted to teach it, the words "Marxism-Leninism" could be interpreted as a synonym of the denial of its values. COSEP knows that only too well and is manipulating that concept for the purpose of striking down our revolution and at the same time seeking internationally to damage Nicaragua as part of an attitude which, along with the position adopted by the right-wing parties, can be called "treason to the fatherland." Our revolution is led by a responsible and conscious vanguard and as such cannot ignore Marxist-Leninist doctrine and can recognize its values. But to say, as COSEP has said, that this revolution is Marxist-Leninist, in the sense and with the tone of voice they said it, is only designed to confuse the people and damage the country as part of a plan certainly conceived by the Yankees or their bosses.

We must remember that the Sandinist Front publicly and in a very clear manner maintains its position as an eminently revolutionary movement; by revolutionary we mean its antiimperialist and popular character, inspired at the same time by the historical and nationalist traditions of Nicaragua, side by side with the internationalist struggle of the peoples in support of their liberation. The Sandinist Front has always maintained that the Sandinist people's revolution is being made for the benefit of the neediest, the workers and the peasants who have been exploited for centuries and that one of its main goals is to put an end to the exploitation of one social class by another.

In numerous public statements, the top leaders of our revolution said very clearly that the revolution combines all those universal principles of political science which are valuable and useful, including the scientific principles of Marxism-Leninism, which is something which any revolution needs nowadays in order to be authentic. We cannot ignore such postulates precisely because their scientific character necessitates our considering them.

Our leaders often have said that this revolution features the values of authentic Christianity whose support has been decisive and valuable. The same is true of the autochthonous values of the history of our people's struggle and our nationalism, our traditions and our own idiosyncrasies. Even more so, our leaders have said that this revolution is also inspired by the authentic values of other revolutions, by the struggle of other peoples including the independence war of the United States and the humanist principles of the French Revolution.

Why so much weeping and moaning? What is happening is that the recalcitrant anti-communists want to challenge the fact that the revolutionary and scientific values of Marxism-Leninism are clashing with Christian feelings and other values and the nationalist sense of the Nicaraguan people. In an absurdly oversimplified statement they say: "If the revolution has Marxist-Leninist influence or orientation, Christianity will be excluded from it or will be wiped out; national values will be swept away and we will begin to live and think entirely as they do in other countries." In other words, they say: "Either we become another Costa Rica or we become another Cuba." They do not agree that we are a "New Nicaragua" with an autochthonous revolution, in which we cannot in a doctrinaire fashion ignore the Marxist-Leninist scientific principles, inspired by a profoundly liberating, evangelical, and authentic Christianity and based on our own historical tradition.

We must emphasize that, in generalizing things in such an oversimplified manner in all of their statements, they simple overlook the great achievements of modern revolutions, such as the Cuban revolution, which has been so slandered and which has been so maliciously described in a manner very different from reality in order "to scare us" (it would not be bad to become another Cuba but this is impossible historically).

Our revolution is Sandinist because it is inspired by the most beautiful tradition of our people and it is Christian because the supreme postulates of the Gospel are the main postulates of the revolution and the authentic disciples of Christ in Nicaragua are identified with the poor (images of Christ) collaborating in and exerting influence from within the process. This latter feature did not turn up in other revolutions because the Christian religion at that time was not witness to its principles and was in truth "the opium of the people." There was so much "bad odor" within the Catholic Church that Pope John XXIII said that the windows of the Church would have to be opened in order to let a little fresh air in, leading precisely to Vatican II whose updating for Latin America consists of the Medellin and Puebla conferences and whose fruits can be seen in the participation of Christians committed to their God and their people and in support of the liberation struggles of the oppressed on this continent. This "updating" of the Church did not take place at the time of the Cuban revolution, for example, and this historical circumstance cannot be overlooked. A pre-Council Christianity committed to the support of the exploiter class, with reactionary hierarchy and clergy, have no place in a revolutionary process, nor could the false god, whom those misnamed Christians presented, be accepted by a younger generation aware of the realities of a people expressed by those who preach a god of the exploiters. That category of distorted Christianity was not eliminated from the revolutionary process by Marxism-Leninism. It eliminated itself. Today, circumstances are different.

Our people's revolution is Sandinist, it is original and it is autochthonous, it is Christian and it cannot overlook the Marxist-Leninist doctrinaire values, in addition to which it also combines and is enriched by many other values. And this must be so because "Marxism-Leninism is a science; it is a revolutionary theory which is based on dialectics. It offers the theoretical and methodological base for the scientific analysis of the past and the present. It is a science in the midst of creative development which ceaselessly is enriched with new conclusions and with new fruits of the revolutionary work of the masses" ("Why History Develops According to Lenin," Vadim Zagladin, "Socialism, Theory and Practice," April 1981).

Those who present an oversimplified panorama (day or night, white or black, Cuba or Costa Rica) do not take into account the versatility of Marxist-Leninist doctrine; they forget that there is a period of transition from capitalism to socialism where one decides the place which will be occupied by each sector according to its attitudes in line with the revolutionary process and they do not realize that there is therefore no incompatibility with the Sandinist blueprint for a mixed economy and for political pluralism in support of the construction of the revolution and they do not realize that Marxist-Leninist doctrine can at the same time be used as a valid scientific instrument which must be taken into account so that our vanguard can lead us toward the formation of a new, just and humane society. All sectors are invited to participate in the construction of the new society. Within this pluralism there is unrestricted freedom of the press, provided it is not used to try to destroy the revolution itself. Lenin wrote: "The objective is to build socialism, to eliminate the division of society into classes, to turn all members of society into workers, to destroy the base on which rests all exploitation of man by man. This objective cannot be achieved all at once; it requires a rather long period of transition from capitalism to socialism" (V. I. Lenin, "Complete Works," Fifth Edition, Vol 38, p 385). Within a purely Marxist-Leninist doctrinaire concept, all honest and patriotic sectors would have their historical opportunity to contribute to the construction of the revolution and to occupy a worthy place in the future according to their consistent participation.

But the Sandinist blueprint for a pluralist revolution with a mixed economy, which we are experiencing in Nicaragua, harms the millionaires of the COSEP and the gentlemen of reaction, in general, in terms of their political interests. What happens to them is not a matter of whether or not we have Marxism-Leninism. What they do not like is that in Nicaragua people must now live under new rules oriented toward benefiting the vast majority of Nicaraguans who are workers and peasants; this is not in line with their illusory concept of making a "bourgeois" revolution but rather an authentic socialist revolution, because if it stopped being socialist it would cease to be authentic and it would cease to be a revolution, as Che Guevara said.

Finally I might quote from the book "Economia Politica-Socialismo": "The political economy of socialism is a living science which is in a process of continuing development. It has perfected itself as a science along with the progress of society. It is not something petrified and immutable. It is in a process of constant development. Its subjective and general laws cover all fundamental aspects of society during each epoch: politics, the economy, and the spiritual life of society. At the proper time, in each country committed to the construction of socialism, these laws become reality in different ways, depending upon the concrete historical conditions of the country" (G. Kazlov, Academy of Sciences, USSR, et al., Progress Publishers, Moscow, 1977).

OFFICIAL REPORTS SUGAR PRODUCTION EXPECTED TO INCREASE

[Text] It was announced officially yesterday that sugar output for 1981-1982 will go up 900,000 quintals as part of one of the biggest challenges to national production.

Eduardo Jerez, General Manager of Sugar Industries in the MIDINRA, informed BARRICADA that the five mills of the APP will increase their output by 39 percent over the output of the last harvest. It will be necessary to make a major effort in the labor area above all in order to be able to increase the output and to attain the targets.

The people's mills harvested 1.73 million quintals last year and it is hoped that we will reach a figure of 2.73 million quintals this year.

Harvest Details

Sugar output at the San Antonio Mill is expected to go up by 200,000 quintals; the approximate output will be 2.73 million quintals this year.

It is expected that the sugar output in the APP [People's Property Area] will lead to the processing of 1.6 million quintals of white sugar while the San Antonio Mill is trying to turn out 1.6 million quintals of refined sugar, with the rest being raw sugar.

The director of sugar industries pointed out that the sugar mills are trying to achieve optimum production through measures such as the separation of excess personnel, the enlargement of the agricultural area, and the improvement of industrial machinery.

On that score he said that the Julio Buitrago Mill has almost 2,000 employees who can be considered surplus and that a way will have to be found to solve that problem. There are other mills which have enough personnel, such as the Benjamin Zeledon Mill.

The Javier Guerra Mill will resume operations this year; it had been closed down for 3 years and the necessary repairs are now being made. As for the rest of the mills, preparations are being completed and the harvest will be started as planned by the administration in November and December of this year.

The APP "will mill" 27,600 manzanas [1 manzana = 1.75 acres] of sugar cane while the San Antonio Mill will come up with 25,450 manzanas, in other words, less than the APP, but with a greater sugar output. On that score, Jerez pointed out that the San Antonio Mill has managed to reach the limits of efficiency because of its long experience.

The sugar quota fixed by the International Sugar Organization for Nicaragua comes to 127,000 quintals and it will be easily filled; the domestic quota will benefit from an increase in output, said Jerez.

EXPERT EXPLAINS VALUE OF EXPORTED COTTON SEEDS

PY182310 Asuncion ULTIMA HORA in Spanish 12 Nov 81 p 8

[Text] A technical source at the agriculture and livestock ministry told ULTIMA HORA this morning that "even though they claim that the 800 [as published] tons of seeds sold to Argentina are of the industrial kind, the fact is that they are of the Reba Paraguay 279 variety because that is the variety which our factories have been receiving."

The source explained that the cotton and tobacco controlling office (OFAT) has been selling its surplus seeds to industrial plants which used them to produce oil, pulp and other byproducts. OFAT Director Jose Dario Radice said that "we sell a large portion of surplus seeds used for sowing to industrial plants to cover our administrative costs."

At this point OFAT has a large stock of seeds. It has 11,000 tons of seeds, enough to sow 440,000 hectares. However, only 300,000 hectares will be planted this year which means that only 7,500 tons of seeds will be used. There will be a surplus of 3,500 tons, enough to sow 140,000 hectares.

Our technical source indicated that "even though the seeds have not been properly certified or treated with fungicides and pesticides, they are of the Reba P-279 variety produced by 'nursery experts' and belong to the 'foundation' [fundacion], 'registered,' and 'certified' type. This type of seed can germinate easily just the same."

The technician said that the Reba P-279 had been produced exclusively in our country after considerable sacrifice, agricultural research, various breeding efforts and experiments. "That is why it has been given the name it bears. Reba means 'resistance to bacteria' 'P' stands for 'Paraguay' and the number 279 is that of the most successful culture specimen. It has remarkable resistance to diseases and greater fiber yield."

He also explained that "it is the type of cotton fiber which is much sought after throughout the world because of its quality, and its price is always the highest. That is why it is considered strategic material and now that Argentina, where production costs are lower, also has it, we are bound to face some unfavorable competition."

DAILY CRITICIZES SALE OF COTTON SEEDS

PY182057 Asuncion HOY in Spanish 11 Nov 81 p 11

[Editorial: "Besmirched Purity"]

[Text] It is a truly sad paradox to have cotton, the flowers of which are a well-known symbol of purity, mixed up in something which, according to the evidence on hand, is nothing but a shady export operation involving (as we have been compelled to point out) an objectionable "sale of development." This is because the 1,500 tons of seeds sold by a private enterprise to the provincial cotton board of the Argentine Province of Formosa belonged to that much sought-after variety the Reba PA-279. This variety is the result of almost 10 years of patient, painstaking and expensive efforts in selecting genetic material, beginning with the original Reba 279, which had been brought from Thailand.

As is well known, the operation was carried out through the Banco de Los Trabajadores [workers bank], and a reliable source indicated to our newspaper that the deal involved the illegal sale of 1,500 tons of seeds sent out in small shipments for obvious reasons of concealment. Thus the first shipment of 500 tons left the port of Varadero on 1 October. It was followed by three more shipments, one of 300 tons on 9 october, another of 200 tons from the same port on 19 October and a third shipment of 500 tons a few days later. These exports, which did not have the approval of the agriculture and livestock ministry, had been authorized by the finance minister as proven by the signatures of Rafael S. Santacruz and Brigido Rodriguez Baez, technical assistant and technical secretary to this ministry, respectively. Furthermore, the source certificate was signed by the director of the foreign trade department of the industry and commerce ministry, whose name had not been typed in under the appropriate seal, only his signature was there. We must also bear in mind that it is a general belief that these illegal exports were the motive for the unexpected resignation of customs Director General Saul Alcaraz and his replacement by Salvador Bogado.

To further add to the confusion with which the people, lacking an official explanation of the facts, are faced, the head of the "Exporinter Ltd" Company signed an open letter, published yesterday by a morning and an evening daily of this capital in which, among other things, he stated that "the exporting operation was carried out in a totally legal manner after paying all taxes stipulated by law and in compliance with the Lafta (now Aladi) treaties." He further clarified that the operation went through "without any type of concealment, without need for favors from anyone because it was in keeping with international treaties with which Paraguay complies in an acknowledged and faithful manner." The lengthy open letter includes curious remarks about the fact that most of the cotton farmers of this Argentine Province are Paraguayans from which one is supposed to deduce that in the final analysis it has just been a sale of Paraguayan cotton seeds to...Paraguayans. In addition to all this the open letter points out that even if the seeds were strategic material (something which the signer of the letter refutes)...the resulting cotton would never compete with that produced in Paraguay because the characteristics of our cotton production, which account for its great market value, are very special (family-level farming and picking by hand), all of which result in the high average quality of the product due to its exceptional cleanliness," something which could not occur in Argentina where the use of machinery for picking cotton reduces its quality.

These are, in general terms, the explanation of Walter A. Gwynn Oddone, head of "Exporinter Ltd" and signer of the open letter which he has deemed appropriate to release to the people.

In the light of this information the government should provide complete information concerning what has happened, a report which should duly clear up every one of the factors which have a bearing on this important aspect of the nation's economic activities.

CHRISTIAN DEMOCRATIC LEADER ON HUMAN RIGHTS

PY172302 Paris AFP in Spanish 1253 GMT 16 Nov 81

[Text] Paris, 16 Nov (AFP)--Luis Antonio Resck, a Paraguayan Christian Democratic leader here today called upon the people of Western Europe to increase their awareness of the dramatic status of human rights in Paraguay. The chairman of the Paraguayan Christian Democratic Party, who is touring Western Europe, told AFP that he wants to draw the attention of the people and their government to the fact that not only the United States but also Western Europe and the multinational companies are cooperating with a regime which is refusing to acknowledge any human rights at all and is exploiting its people.

Resck, who has been arrested 10 times by the Paraguayan Government and who is now living in Brazil, held talks with various French political sectors, especially with Antoine Blanca, adviser for Latin American affairs of the French premier, and with Bernard Stasi, a deputy for the opposition.

Resck also met with representatives of the Paraguayan colony in France and with members of the National Accord--which is made up of the Authentic Radical Liberal Party, the Christian Democratic Party, the Febrerista Party and the Colorado Popular Movement--a political opposition front which puports to be the only valid option for a democratic opening.

Opposed to President Alfredo Stroessner's regime, the National Accord visited Washington in 1978 and 1980 and La Paz in 1979. This year its members signed the so-called letter of Brasilia and have been seeking to disseminate its contents through contacts with democratic groups in the Southern Cone of the continent. In Paris the National Accord is being represented by Ruben Bareiro Saguier.

The Christian Democratic leader had participated in a conference on human rights sponsored by the European Council and held in Madrid. He met in the Vatican with John Paul II, who expressed interest in the Paraguayan situation and the role of the church in that country. In Rome, Resck conveyed his concerns to Mariano Rumor, chairman of the World Christian Democratic Union and to Giulio Andreotti, former prime minister. After his stay in France, Professor Resck will continue his tour in Belgium.

UNIVERSITY SUPPORTS STUDENT--In a press communique released today the University Pastoral Service [SPU] denounced "the unfair situation of fellow university student Perla Yore, charged with possession of subversive books." The communique stressed the right of the students "to have access to every kind of cultural material which could allow them to make in-depth research of whatever nature to improve their intellectual level." This statement draws support from the transcription of a paragraph of the "Gaudium et Sees" Ordinance No 59 of the 2d. Vatican Council which states that "man must be free to conduct research and disseminate his own opinion. Culture must not be placed at the service of political or economic powers." Further on, the communique discussed the hunger strike which the prisoner has been on for 17 days by saying that "through this attitude she has undertaken the defense of the entire university community." In another paragraph, the communique pointed out that "we share with her the anxiety stemming from the lack of respect shown toward her dignity as a human being, made in the image and likeness of God our Lord and toward her inalienable rights as a child of the Lord." (Cfr. Puebla 40) The communique concluded by stating: "Therefore, the SPU believes in the imperative need to assume a firm and Christian attitude advocating the urgent task of improving the moral standards of the nation." BRIEFS

SECONDARY OIL RECOVERY--The inevitable decline in oil production in the old Talara field (where of a total of 1,200 wells in 1979 only 953 were producing just 6,000 barrels daily and the rest had been abandoned due to exhaustion of production) is now in a recovery period. Occidental Peruana Inc and Argentina Bridas are in charge of the project requiring an investment of hundreds of millions of dollars, which defies the most modern technology. OXY and Bridas drilling in Los Organos has in the last 3 years increased production to a present level of about 20,000 barrels daily. Secondary recovery is stimulating oil production when the wells reach the "primary exhaustion" stage by injecting water into the dry wells or into especially built ones. OXY and Bridas recently built a plant to treat sea water, the largest in South America and able to produce more than 79,000 cubic meters daily of deoxygenated and treated water. About 1,000 wells will be drilled, half injectors and half producers. So far there are about 750 wells, evenly divided. Present production is substantially contributing to return Peru to oil exporting and to generate work in the region. [Text] [Lima OIGA in Spanish 19 Oct 81 p 67] 9545

ENERGY MINISTER DISCUSSES ALUMINUM, GAS PROJECT PLANS

Port-of-Spain TRINIDAD GUARDIAN in English 9 Oct 81 p 4

[Text]

AN ALUMINIUM foil plant — a downstream project of the proposed aluminium smelter — is to be established at Waller field.

It will be a joint venture in which a major international firm is involved. Energy Minister, Mr. Errol Mahabir, did not reveal the name of the firm yesterday.

However, it is believed that the US firm — Kaiser International — is involved.

Kaiser was one of the many US corporations with whom the late Prime Minister Dr. Eric Williams, held talks during his 1974 visit to the U.S.

Mr. Mahabir, speaking at yesterday's formal opening of gas price negotiations between the National Energy Corporation (NEC) and the companies that comprise the Southeast Coast Consortium, said that although a final investment decision had not yet been taken on the smelter project, the NEC staff was given the green light to proceed with the foil project.

GAS LINE

Cabinet, he explained, had given a mandate to the NEC, that it would consider a final investment on the smelter, but that it wanted to see at least two important downstream projects that would emanate from the smelter project.

The NEC, the Minister said, has been working on the downstream projects, and had in fact, received a number of proposals. Among them was one firm proposal for a foil plant, which is expected to utilise some 10 per cent of production from the smelter.

Taking into account also, the need to diversify establishment of industries, Mr. Mahabir revealed, it has been decided that once agreed upon, the proposed foil plant would be located at Waller field.

MAHAICA GAS

He said the Government was doing all that was expected, to ensure that the natural gas was utilised, and secondly, that the gas itself was available to the industries which will utilise it.

He also cited the present laying of the Trintoc gas line which will bring gas from the north Mahaica field. The line which is due to come on stream by the end of the month will satisfy the needs of small users in the northern areas and all industrial estates of the Industrial Development Corporation (IDC) in the north.

Also, because Trintoc itself wished to have available for its own use some nine million cubic feet per day to satisfy the needs of two gas turbines which were being installed at its refinery.

It would also be utilised in updating Trintoc's electricity facilities--from 50 to 60 cycles.

$43 MILLION TO BE SPENT ON OFF-SHORE OIL EXPLORATION

Port-of-Spain TRINIDAD GUARDIAN in English 19 Oct 81 p 7

[Text]

SAN FERNANDO:

AMOCO Trinidad Oil Company will spend approximately (TT) $43,000,000 on two exploratory wells from this month to December in the continuing hunt for oil off the east coast.

Mr. Robert N. Powers, President and General Manager of the Company, gave this information about the exploratory programme, which was announced in the daily Press in July.

Since the announcement, however, there have been changes in the programme.

The new jack-up rig, Dixylin Field, originally scheduled to drill the first well was not available for the east coast drilling programme (the Dixylin Field has being diverted from Gabon, West Africa, for the Trinidad assignment).

Drilling therefore, could not begin in early September as originally scheduled but started instead at the beginning of October.

The first well in this programme will now be drilled with the Lexington which is doing exploratory drilling south-east of Trinidad for Mobil Exploration Trinidad Limited.

The Lexington will drill for Amoco approximately 35 miles north-east of Galeota Point, which is also approximately nine miles north-east of the Samaan Field.

Arrangements are being made for the second rig to drill the other exploratory well in one of the two locations under consideration.

One location is just east of the Poui Field and the other is approximately six miles north-east of Galeota Point.

Mr. Powers said that the second exploratory vessel, Bluewater III, was scheduled to arrive off the east coast around November 1, to begin work on the second well.

ASPECTS SURROUNDING BEAGLE MEDIATION REVEALED

Buenos Aires LA NACION in Spanish 29 Oct 81 p 8

[Text] The present Argentine policy with regard to the Beagle affair is that you can't pull the tooth until the abscess goes down.

In terms appropriate to the negotiations, Argentina maintains that it is indispensable that an inventory be taken of all the questions pending between it and Chile, including all questions of mutual interest, so that His Holiness's proposal may find the proper context in which to flourish.

That, in effect, is what Foreign Minister Camilion argued in Rome in September when he met with Cardinal Casaroli, the Vatican secretary of state; Cardinal Silvestrini, secretary of the Church's Council for Public Affairs--the equivalent, in the Holy See, of the portfolio of minister of foreign relations--and Cardinal Samore, papal delegate in the mediation. The highlight of Camilion's trip to Rome was his meeting with John Paul II.

Chile has accepted, although with numerous reservations, the proposal made by Wojtyla to the parties on 12 December 1980. Argentina let 3 months elapse and in March limited itself to requesting the mediator to make a series of clarifications and explanations of his proposal. The Vatican answered some time later. Some of its statements on that occasion, such as the one concerning navigation through Tierra del Fuego channels, could be very useful should the papal proposal be the final solution to the South Atlantic dispute, Argentine sources have told LA NACION.

Three Premises

However, the "ideas" carried by Doctor Camilion to the Vatican surely meant a restatement of our country's position in the face of what must have been considered a crucial stumbling-block in the negotiations. Obviously Camilion did not speak to the pope and his cardinals on behalf of the Palacio San Martin or the president of the nation. He spoke--and this is important, considering the complexity of the current legal system--on behalf of the Military Committee, which is made up of the commanders in chief and the president.

At this stage in the Beagle negotiations, Argentine diplomacy appears to be acting on the basis of three premises:

1. There must not be a war;

2. The proposal, as edited in December 1980, cannot be accepted; and

3. The mediation must not fail.

Last week, all Buenos Aires was talking about the fact that an answer to the opinions expressed by Doctor Camilion in Rome had been received here from His Holiness, through the nuncio, Monsignor Calabressi. Actually, it was not quite like that. The contents of the sealed envelope delivered by the nuncio to the Foreign Ministry was a document from the Vatican office for the mediation, initialed by Cardinal Samore and containing no indication of the kind which usually means, unequivocally and deliberately, direct intervention by the pope.

As is understandable, Cardinal Samore is a little impatient to see the political matter placed in his hands by providence at the end of 1978 crowned as soon as possible. Called by our ambassador to the Vatican, Jose M. Alvarez de Toledo, to have lunch today with him and Cardinal Primatesta, the elderly cardinal very courteously declined the invitation because, among other reasons, he is totally engrossed in the task commended to his care by His Holiness nearly 3 years ago.

Samore Insists

From the little that is known, the latest correspondence from Samore to the Argentine Government insists that the proposal offers a formula for a just understanding for both parties. It does not reject the "ideas" expressed in Rome by the Argentine foreign minister, but it emphasizes the good points of the December 1980 proposal and the possibilities that it offers in itself.

The impression here is that the Vatican prefers that there be no more procrastination in the negotiations. Argentina, in turn, seems to be trying to have it understood that a peace treaty founded on an agreement concerning the South Atlantic dispute would make no sense if all the other latent points of conflict with its neighbor are not solved at the same time. That is: peace only in the south?

From the La Julia mine on the northern border to the mouth of the Strait of Magellan, and even further south, along the wire fence on Isla Grande, there are disputed border points between Argentina and Chile. Only a few hours ago our country awoke to a new claim by the Chileans. Its brief history follows: South of Desert Lake there is an extraordinary reservoir of drinking water: the deposit of continental ice which Argentina, without renouncing its sovereign rights over the same, invited a special forum of the United Nations to consider among the precious possessions of humanity. Now then, without any serious warning precedent, the Chilean delegation to the UN forum meeting at Canberra, Australia, to study these matters, has just made a reservation on that deposit of continental ice.

The "Boil Theory"

The new Argentine policy regarding the Beagle negotiations may, in our opinion, have a vulnerable spot. Argentina has resolved, in effect, after the experience of the 1970's, never again to submit any dispute with Chile to arbitration. Although the pope, as the commander in chief of the army said this week, is not an arbiter, but a mediator, and for that reason could not very well force compliance on the parties, it is certain that politically he is close to being the former because of the weight his voice carries among peoples which include a strong Catholic majority. So only with much care could Argentina place all its current disputes with Chile on a negotiating table presided over by Wojtyla.

We agree, however, that on the other hand, the "boil theory" has its advantage. No one, not even the most impatient of negotiators, could be unaware of the fact that the papal proposal being unacceptable in principle to the Argentine Military Government, only an overall restatement of the mediation, which might ease tensions, will save it from failure.

At this stage it is unthinkable that the high-ranking Argentine military leadership will resist the papal proposal because of the fact that Nueva, Picton and Lennox, which were the substance of the arbitration compromise in 1972, remain in Chilean hands. The Argentine military are not unaware of what recognition of Cape Horn meridian by the pope as an imaginary line dividing the ocean waters between Argentina and Chile would mean; but they hope, meanwhile, to count on firm land in the very far south on which to base that line.

Status Quo?

While the negotiations are bogged down on that and other points, the way has been opened, then, in the Argentine Government, for the current thesis: that is, to create a new context by virtue of which it might be easier later on to make some progress on the subject of the South Atlantic. The 1941 Border Commission, after 40 years, achieved total agreement on only one of the 16 sections into which their work was divided. The Beagle Channel and its related problems are only a part of one of the remaining 15 sections.

It would be a serious mistake, however, for anyone to believe that there are no fixed borders between Argentina and Chile; but it would also be a mistake to interpret the South Atlantic border dispute as the last of the open geographical questions between the two countries.

The Argentine Government has received reports that the chairman of the bishops, Cardinal Primatesta, took to the Vatican an exaggerated view of the current situation and its prospects. That view would give the impression that Argentina cannot sensibly be expected to hasten its steps very much in the negotiations. Official sources have indicated to LA NACION that the Argentine position does not consist in merely maintaining the "status quo," although that may eventually be the outcome of such a stalemate as we have been watching for several months. The sources emphasized that the Argentine position, on the contrary, is one of active search for a solution. This, they observed, is advisable because of our interest in preserving our relations with the Vatican as well as with Chile and, certainly, our ties with a church whose word has had a moderate beneficial influence for everyone here, unlike other countries in the Southern Cone.

Hope for Success

For the rest, the Argentine Government has gathered more than sufficient proof of extensive concern in the west to avoid risks which might lead to political failure on Wojtyla's part. We know that among the three points mentioned by Gen Alexander Haig as being of concern to bilateral relations between Argentina and the United States in his recent visit with Foreign Minister Camilion was, in spite of geographical distances, the Beagle question. In addition, Ambassador Keller Sarmiento, chief of the Western Europe Department at the Palacio San Martin, in a recent tour of areas under his jurisdiction, discovered--in such unlikely countries as Switzerland,

Austria and West Germany--the existence of a sharp government interest in seeing the pope's efforts as mediator between Argentina and Chile crowned with success. Obviously in those countries they are not particularly concerned with which way the wind is blowing in the South Atlantic; but they are indeed very alert to the lively political and spiritual breezes of a pope who has demonstrated in the very heart of Eastern Europe, that communism contains internal contradictions which may change the course of its history.

BEAGLE PROPOSAL SAID TO BE IN CONFLICT WITH OIL INTERESTS

Buenos Aires LA NACION in Spanish 24 Oct 81 p 11

[Text] Rosario--Dr Adolfo Silenzi de Stagni talked with the press about the petroleum policy, which he characterized as the systematic draining of Government Oil Deposits [YPF].

He indicated that that drain is based on the reduction of the real income of YPF chiefly through the cession of domestic interests to firms such as Shell and Esso, He pointed out that since 1976, losses in the lubricants sector have reached 15 percent, and he emphasized that each point represents "several tens of millions of dollars."

Then he said that self-sufficiency could have been achieved a long time ago if a coherent policy had been followed which took the country's interests into consideration. He added that one of the factors preventing this at this time is that the foreign firms are not fulfilling their contracts, since they are all below established production. "The deficit," he emphasized, "is 1.2 million cubic meters."

"Most Expensive in the World"

He then pointed to the domestic price of petroleum, which is set, he said, in line with national and international fluctuations, causing Argentine crude to be the most expensive in the world. "In January," he said, for example, "Shell received $143.83 per cubic meter, when the international price was $230. But it must be borne in mind that of that $230,85 percent is reserved to the conceding government, while here at home it is all retained by the oil company. In addition, the domestic price of almost $144 is the wellhead price. To this we must add freight costs and bonuses paid by YPF to the provinces." Then he asserted, as proof of the "lucrative business," that for the foreign oil companies, oil means that in 1980, "20 firms sold 628 billion dollars' worth."

"Proposal Must Be Rejected"

At another point, Silenzi de Stagni said that if the papal proposal for the so-called "zone of peace" becomes a reality and maps are changed accordingly, it must be rejected, because the region is of interest to the petroleum industry. He added that such a proposal is more serious than the decision of the British crown, since the Strait of Magellan was not in question, "in spite of the fact that General Videla signed the Puerto Montt Act, which has a clause establishing the agreement to study the boundaries in the Strait of Magellan."

After recalling that the sedimentary basin of the Strait is one of the largest in the world--"five times greater than the one in the North Sea"--, he compared it to the Malvinas Islands and the contracts signed with Shell under the Economic Cooperation Program. Then he expressed his fear of what might be, he concluded, a smokescreen for England's giving up the islands, but not the petroleum.

CARIBBEAN CONGRESS OF LABOR WARNS BARBADOS WORKERS

Bridgetown THE NATION in English 1 Sep 81 p 10

[Text]

SECRETARY of the Caribbean Congress of Labour, Burns Bonadie has called on Barbadian workers to look for moves by Government to enforce legislation which will take away their rights.

He made this call, while addressing the closing session of a labour legislation seminar at the National Union of Public Workers (NUPW) headquarters last Friday evening.

The CCL secretary/treasurer described such signs as: Government's disclosure earlier this month that foreign reserves had fallen by $45 million, the failure of the sugar industry to create the expected revenue, and the many conditions stipulated by the International Monetary Fund (IMF) when giving loans.

Bonadie stated that when these were hinted at by governments, the next move would be to create wage restraints and pass legislation which would prevent the trade unions from opposing these restraints.

The labour official said that at present in Barbados, "essential services" covered water, gas and electricity services, and that because the Caribbean governments were "copy cats", the introduction of essential services legislation in Barbados would be used to cover many other services, and relieve workers of the right to strike.

Concerning the general Caribbean region, Bonadie said that most of the Caribbean governments were trying to implement essential services legislation and that this would be resisted by the region's trade unions.

He also said that because most people were aligned to one political party or another in their country, when ever there were decisions to be made concerning trade union matters the workers decided party wise, rather than in their best interest or in the interest of the trade union.

Concerning a current trend in the region, Bonadie said that governments were making many amendments to legislation which would affect workers, but were not consulting with the trade unions. He said also that one of the reasons for this was because they were trying to facilitate outside businessmen who wanted certain guarantees before setting up there businesses.

"All these moves," he said; "are aimed at making the trade union movement disappear of rendering it harmless." Bonadie warned all workers to be on their toes and not allow the local movement to lose much of its force, as has been the case with the Guyana Trade Union movement, which was the strongest in the region up until the second world war, but which today has lost much of its bargaining ability.

The NUPW's labour legislation seminar was held over a one week period and involved over 25 shop stewards of the union. Resource persons included, Dr. Neville Duncan, Maurice King, Joseph Goddard, Ulric Denny, James Williams, Oswald Simmonds and personnel of the Labour Department.

FEDECAMARAS CRITICIZES AID TO NICARAGUA--Barcelona, 27 Oct--As a way of protesting the detainment of a group of businessmen in Nicaragua, FEDECAMARA's [Association of the Chambers of Commerce and Industry] president, Dr Carlos Sequera Yepez, announced that this body will request that the Venezuelan Government suspend the oil and technical aid it had been offering to that Central American nation. Sequera Yepez, who was attending the homage given in Puerto Cruz by the region's economic sectors to the former FEDECAMARAS president, Dr Cero Anez Fonseca, called it unusual "that the current government in Nicaragua would resort to the detainment of competent business leaders, because they had expressed in a document their opinion of the economic problems of that country. "This clearly demonstrates that the Nicaraguan nation went from an extreme rightist dictatorial government to an extreme leftist totalitarian regime which, just as was commonplace in the former, will also not accept criticism nor permit any type of opposition," he claimed. He later added that "in the first place we are initiating a campaign in order to obtain the full release of those detained, and will see that international pressure mechanisms are implemented to bring about a democratic regime of government in Nicaragua." Sequera Yepez said that Venezuela should not continue to offer oil and financial aid to "a government that attempts to put into effect the same methods imposed in Cuba to put an end to private enterprise." IMPORTANCE OF RADICAL PARTY NOTED

PY211433 Buenos Aires HERALD in English 20 Nov 81 p 10

[Editorial: "One Silver Lining"]

[Text] The days when the country's senior politicians could be reduced to a respectful silence by some crisp orders delivered by a military chief clearly belong to the past. The attempt by the Third Army Corps commander to make the radicals moderate their criticism of the status quo has completely backfired. Far from inducing them to shut their mouths it has provoked a strong counterattack. This counterattack, moreover, is being aimed not merely against the Third Army Corps chief but at the regime as a whole. The incident has also encouraged speculation about possible power plays within the regime. Making the situation even more uneasy than would otherwise have been the case is the illness of President Roberto Viola. He would appear to be suffering from rather more than a mild case of high blood pressure and his continuing absence from the Casa Rosada is a significant factor in the sultry political climate that hangs over the country.

The prevailing mood was succinctly summed up by a leading radical, Dr Antonio Troccoli, during a party meeting he said: "We are going through a stage in which the regime installed in 1978 is in its death throes and different sectors are fighting for a share of the spoils of the country they brought to bankruptcy." He also went on to warn the military to resist the temptation to transform themselves into "an army of occupation in their own country." Although Dr Troccoli's words were clearer and harsher than most, he was expressing the belief of a large number of people who fear that the nation may be drifting toward a new period of conflict.

The outlook may be gloomy, but it is not entirely black. One of the most hopeful phenomena of the last year or so is the emergence of the radical movement as the driving force behind the opposition to the regime. The party had already staked out for itself a place at the centre of events by creating the "multiparty convocation," which includes the representatives of parties which in the most recent elections represented an overwhelming majority of the Argentine population. Its prominence has been increased by the quarrel with the Third Army Corps commander. The Peronists, still immersed in the problems that followed the death of Juan Domingo Peron, have not been able to make a comparable impact on public opinion, although whether or not they have lost ground among the electorate is something nobody will really know until elections have actually been held.

This creates a situation which is very different from the one that prevailed in the early seventies. Then the country was being plagued by leftwing terrorists associated with some Peronist factions, and the Peronists provided the cutting edge of the more peaceful political opposition as well. In consequence, voters saw in them the most convincing alternative to a military regime they resented and provided them with the support they needed at the polls. Today, despite the warnings of some military chiefs, there is very little sign of leftwing terrorism while the most visible civilian opposition to the military regime comes from a party whose democratic credentials are as good as those of anyone else in the country and far better than many. Thus, while the present situation is certainly fraught with danger, it is in some important ways far more promising than was the situation before the country's last attempt to effect a reentry into the turbulent but invigorating atmosphere of democracy.

MRS PERON CLEARED OF CHARGES--(NA)--Former President Maria Estela Martinez de Peron has been cleared by a court of appeals of misuse of presidential funds. Mrs Peron, removed from power by the armed forces in March 1976 had previously been absolved by Judge Pedro Narvaiz. The charges of misuse of funds had been made by Prospero German Alvarino, who questioned her handling of 150 million pesos which formed part of the reserved presidential funds. Although the court cleared Mrs Peron of these charges, she may still be summoned to testify before the courts on the same matter. However, this aspect of the case continues to be pending and Mrs Peron is entitled to be absent from Argentina in accordance with a legal permit granted her several months ago. Mrs Peron is still being charged with alleged mismanagement of funds concerning the Solidarity Crusade, an entity formed during the last Peronist regime. OPPOSITION FORCES SUSPECT PLP OF PLOTTING 'SNAP' ELECTION

[Article by Gladstone Thurston]

[Text] OPPOSITION forces are gearing for a snap election as reports persist that the ruling Progressive Liberal Party may present their candidates for ratification during next week's convention.

Indications from inside sources are that Prime Minister Lynden Pindling might dissolve Parliament shortly after the Convention.

"Based on the information received," one Opposition official said, "there are indications that the PLP is planning to hold a snap election which is designed to take the Free National Movement by surprise."

FNM spokesman Arthur Foulkes agreed that something is in the wind. "We realise that Mr Pindling alone has this card to play and we have no doubt that he will play it to his best advantage as he sees that to be. Our party is going ahead steadily with its plans for the next elections and if a snap election is called our party machinery will move into high gear very quickly."

The opposition official, who asked not to be named, said the PLP's National General Council has ratified most of its candidates. Ratification of candidates in previous years came a few weeks before the election was called. In addition to that, PLP Members of Parliament have been conducting voters registration drives for the past month.

"Taking into consideration these activities and the fact that there has been, over the last couple of months ceremony after ceremony, the last being the cornerstone laying at the agricultural research station, and the topping off of the Market Plaza, which was not necessary at this time, and the sudden withdrawal of Bruce Braynen from St Agnes, one must come to the conclusion that something is in the wind," he said.

Also, it is understood that Fox Hill incumbent Frank Edgecombe will be replaced by Gladys Manuel. The candidates to represent Grand Bahama are to be selected this weekend.

PLP Members of Parliament, especially those who represent New Providence constituencies, have on many occasions been severely criticised by their constituents for ignoring the needs of the people.

The young people, especially, have been vocal in criticizing those MPs who rarely visit their constituencies. Older constituents too have criticized PLP MPs who only come around during election time.

Bruce Braynen was never popular in St Agnes with the young people. He hardly ever visited, according to the constituents. Young people in St Michael's had the same to say about George Mackey. Some areas have not seen Mackey since 1977, according to residents. Although Alfred Maycock is seen in Fort Fincastle, the complaint there is that he visits only certain people. Sir Clifford Darling, it is said, is "afraid of the young people" of his constituency. Sinclair Outten would not venture anywhere near certain areas in his constituency of St Barnabas, it is claimed.

"The PLP representatives have isolated themselves from the people," one young man shouted during a recent political meeting. "We don't want them."

"We would like the Prime Minister to know that under no circumstances he will catch us off guard," the Opposition official said. "We are ready to do battle and as a matter of fact challenge the Prime Minister to go through with his plans next week. We are ready and we know the people are ready to send that happy band of mal-administrators home for good."

It is significant, the official said, that the Deputy Prime Minister and not the Prime Minister will be delivering the keynote address during next week's convention.

"By doing so," the official said, "the Prime Minister is relieving himself of the responsibility of having to answer too many serious questions and give an account of the many broken promises. He is now passing the buck to his deputy who, over the years has had no responsibility for the total administration."

WORKERS PARTY PLANS TO REORGANIZE, SEEK OPPOSITION ROLE

Nassau THE TRIBUNE in English 8 Oct 81 p 1

[Article by Anthony Forbes]

[Text]

TIRED OF the "hustling and jostling" of the Bahamas' three opposition parties, the Workers Party today announced it had reorganized and would now campaign to become the official opposition to whatever government was elected in the next general elections.

Workers Party chairman Rodney Moncur, at a press conference today, said College of the Bahamas lecturer Philip Miller will be the party's new leader, while he will remain its chairman.

He gave notice that those officers of the party who are either unable, or who cannot find time to deal with party affairs, will have to take on an advisory role to those who were willing to take over and lead the party to victory.

He appealed to the traditional 45 percent opposition voters to support the Workers Party and he declared "war" on the other three opposition parties – the Free National Movement, the Social Democratic Party and the Vanguard.

Other party officers are Necolia Jacques, first vice-chairman; Marilyn Barrett, second vice-chairman; Donovan Dorsette, secretary-general and Gus Fountain, assistant secretary-general.

He said the party has set up a research committee to study the history of all the political movements in the country to see how they functioned, survived and came to an end.

"We have called forward our best grassroot and intellectual leadership to the forefront of the party," the chairman of the three-year-old Workers Party said.

"We have said to the present leadership, the party must grow and there must be a series of forceful, yet peaceful protests that the country has never seen since 1967," Mr Moncur said.

Before today's announcement, Moncur, as chairman of the Workers Party, led and represented the party at panel discussions and demonstrations.

He said the party had demonstrated against capital punishment, unemployment, crime, high prices and many other issues affecting the nation in its three-year history.

"So the Workers Party has established a genuine record of struggle for, and on behalf of the people of the country and will continue that struggle," he said.

He said the party will not fight the 1982 general election to become the next government.

"It is our sincere intention to become the official opposition," he said.

"The Workers Party, by virtue of its youthful leadership and membership, feels it is too premature at the moment as a sincere political movement, to take over the government," he said.

Begging the 45 per cent of opposition voters to vote for the party, Mr Moncur said his party is prepared to go by the rules and regulations and present the best opposition since 1967.

"When given that opportunity, the Workers Party has the ability, knowledge and grassroot know-how," he ssaid. "War is declared on all inefficient opposition parties which lack the know-how to oppose the administration."

He said the party was reorganized to give the maximum effectiveness in the opposition ranks to the PLP Government, and in the past few months, the party's membership has grown tremendously.

Charging the FNM, SDP and Vanguard with being unworthy of forming the next government, Mr Miller said they are organized for "political hustling and jostling and nothing more."

He said the FNM bosses were a part of the PLP

Also, he said, the FNM had left the PLP unchecked, causing it to degenerate into a bad government. He claimed the FNM was also guilty of "questionable acts" of which the PLP had "always been guilty."

The Workers Party leader said the SDP, the official opposition, had tried half-heartedly to take the business of parliamentary opposition seriously, but did not seem to understand the highly responsible duties of the official opposition.

He said the Vanguard had not opposed well and there was no proof that it was capable of governing.

"None of these opposition parties has taken seriously the concept of a Shadow Cabinet," he said. "As a result, none of them has a detailed and relevant programme of government."

Mr Miller said that though marginal in terms of wealth and organization, the Workers Party appeared to be the only opposition group that opposed in the traditional Bahamian way, where national peace and security was not threatened.

"SDP and FNM members of Parliament are paid to oppose the government," he said. "Yet the Workers Party, which has no seat in the House, gives more opposition than those two parties combined."

CENTRAL BANK: NATIONAL DEBT AT $280 MILLION; SURPLUS DOWN

Nassau THE TRIBUNE in English 17 Oct 81 pp 1, 13

[Text]

THE NATIONAL debt of the Bahamas up to the second quarter of this year is $280.1 million, according to the Central Bank report.

And, the fall in current revenue and the growth in current expenditure for the quarter reduced Government's current surplus to $8.5 million from a year earlier when the surplus was $19.7 million, the Bank stated.

The overall budgetary position showed a deficit of $13.3 million because of the sharp rise in net lending to $12.1 million and increased capital outlays of $9.7 million. This deficit was financed by a drawdown of cash balances, the Bank said.

Debt repayment for the quarter ending June amounted to $4.5 million, an increase of $2.3 million over the corresponding period of 1980.

External debt repayment was unchanged from last year at $1 million, while internal debt repayment increased by $2.3 million to $3.5 million.

Repayment on the Bahamian dollar portion of the domestic debt increased by $2.8 million to $3.2 million, while the foreign currency portion decreased by $0.4 million to $0.3 million, the Bank stated.

The total direct charge on Government for the second quarter of 1981, the Bank said, stood at $233.4 million, a decrease of $3.9 million from the first quarter of this year and an increase of 3 percent above the second quarter of 1980.

"Contingent liabilities of the public corporation at $46.8 million brought the total national debt outstanding to $280.1 million," the Bank's quarterly review stated.

Current revenue for the second quarter of 1981 totalled $64.6 million, down $5.8 million from a year earlier. Tax revenue amounted to $49.6 million, a loss of $2.7 million from the same period in 1980, while non-tax revenue fell by $3.1 million to $15 million.

"The decline in current revenue from the quarter under review may be attributed in part to a general slowdown in economic activity," the Central Bank stated.

The business and professional licence fees yielded $3.4 million, a rise of $2 million. Export taxes brought in 0.9 million, again of 0.1 million. Stamp taxes rose by $1.4 million to $4.6 million. All other categories of tax revenue registered declines.

"Taxes on goods and services fell sharply as the slackening of the economy inevitably led to a lower demand for imports," the Bank stated. "Consequently, import duties fell by $3.2 million to $31.7 million."

Selective taxes on services similarly declined by $2.6 million to yield $5.1 million. Property taxes fell by $0.3 million to $1 million, while departure taxes and motor vehicle taxes declined by a marginal $0.2 million and $0.1 million to $1.9 million and $1.4 million respectively.

In the non-tax revenue category, the most significant decline was in income from other sources, which fell by $3.5 million to $0.4 million. This decline from the 1980 level was due in a large part to the fact that Government did not receive its share of the Central Bank's profits in the quarter under review as it did in the corresponding quarter last year.

Fines forfeits and administrative fees dropped by $2 million to $12 million, while income from public enterprise and other miscellaneous receipts showed no substantial change. Sales of government property yielded $2.5 million for the quarter under review.

Increased outlays on social and economic services accounted in part for the growth in total expenditure, which amounted to $65.8 million for the review quarter, a rise of $9.7 million over the comparable period of 1980.

Current expediture totalled $56.1 million, a gain of $5.4 million, while capital expenditure at $9.7 million rose by $4.3 million over the same period of 1980.

During the second quarter of 1981, the balance of payments position as measured by changes in the official international reserves, posted a surplus of $12.9 million, $2.3 million above the level obtaining in the comparable period of 1980.

According to the Central Bank, the current account deficit widened by $24.1 million, up $10.9 million over the $13.2 million recorded in the second quarter of 1980 and $17.9 million greater than that experienced during the first quarter of 1981.

"The deterioration in the current account was the result of a decrease in the net invisible earning which fell to $119.6 million from a level of $146.3 million a year earlier," the Bank stated.

The trade deficit contracted by $17.7 million to $147.3 million from a year-earlier level of $159.9 million "owing to an appreciable drop in both oil and non-oil merchandise imports reflecting the slowdown in tourism," the Bank stated.

FNM HITS PLP FOR WITHDRAWAL FROM AGREEMENT WITH TUC

Nassau THE TRIBUNE in English 19 Oct 81 pp 1, 8

[Text]

THE OPPOSITION Free National Movement has called the PLP withdrawal from the Memorandum of Understanding with the Trade Union Congress "a victory" for the FNM and "an admission of defeat" for Government.

"Prime Minister Pindling's withdrawal from the Memorandum of Understanding is an admission of defeat and a clear statement that the PLP has now lost the base of support that has kept it in power for the past 14 years," the FNM said in a press statement today.

FNM leader Kendal Isaacs said it is clear that Prime Minister Pindling is "running away from a situation that was turning out to be a big embarrassment to his Government."

The party welcomed the "liberation" of the member unions of the TUC and reaffirmed its belief that the true purpose of trade unionism is best served when the trade union serves only one master .... its members and their interests.

In June, Mr Isaacs called on trade unions to withdraw from the Memorandum of Understanding and return to the concept of free trade unionism, unfettered by the political considerations of the past.

In a statement today, Mr Isaacs said it is obvious that Mr Pindling, the PLP and certain trade union leaders have used the hard-working people of this country for selfish aims "and now that the workers of the nation are no longer prepared to be used the PLP has seen fit to abrogate the Memorandum."

"It is a pity that certain union executives, who showed such promise in the pursuit of worker rights in this country, could have allowed themselves to become so consumed by personal ambition and selfishness as to betray the best interests of the trade union movement and the workers," Mr Isaacs said.

Mr Isaacs also asked the Bahamas Hotel and Catering Workers Union to "take note" that the stranglehold on the TUC by the PLP has been broken. The hotel union pulled out from the TUC in July after its president, David Knowles, MP for Salem, was defeated as head of the TUC.

"The resolution of abrogation indicates that the PLP will now try to pick off individual unions and further fragment the union," Mr Isaacs said, noting that the PLP suspended the memorandum until individual unions indicate their willingness to be guided by the memorandum's principles.

"Individual unions would do well to avoid this new web of trickery which the PLP have spun," Mr Isaacs said. "The breaking of the memorandum is a victory for the FNM and bodes well for our success in the upcoming general elections."

FNM OFFICIAL HITS PINDLING ON SOCIAL, ECONOMIC PLAN

Nassau THE TRIBUNE in English 6 Oct 81 pp 1, 10

[Text] For the second time in less than a week, Prime Minister Lynden Pindling has been challenged to tell the Bahamian public what became of the $2 billion, 10-year social and economic plan for the Bahamas, which he announced in an address before the Chamber of Commerce in June, 1976.

Free National Movement Councillor Arthur Foulkes, Minister in the fifth of a series of rallies last Thursday, again brought up the issue in a press statement today.

Mr Foulkes pointed out that Mr Pindling had unveiled his big plan for the country just a year before the last election.

"Since the last election, what have you heard about this master plan?" he asked. "What has been done about it?"

Mr Foulkes suggested that nothing had been done about the plan because it was just another election promise "designed to fool the people."

"It's just like all the other false promises they have used in the past and just like the ones they will try to fool you with again this time," he claimed.

Mr Foulkes said that if the $2 billion plan had been put into effect, it would have been near the half-way mark by now with at least $1 billion in development. He said Mr Pindling should have known when he unveiled his plan that his Government was not capable of attracting the huge sums of private capital necessary to activate such a scheme.

"It was just another empty promise, just as ridiculous and insulting as the one he made when he promised full employment by 1980," Mr Foulkes said.

"Instead of achieving full employment, we are rapidly headed for full unemployment and the young people of the country are bearing the full brunt of this tragedy."

Mr Foulkes said the PLP Government had demonstrated their inability to restore confidence and bring about the economic expansion necessary to put thousands of unemployed Bahamians to work. He charged that instead, they "come with one bad policy after another including the so-called land policy which only made a bad situation worse." Mr Foulkes said the next phase of the FNM's plans calls for Family Island visits to be led by party leader Kendal [name illegible].

PAPER DEPLORES U.S. 'GUNBOAT JUSTICE' AGAINST HAITIANS

Bridgetown THE NATION in English 22 Oct 81 p 4

[Editorial: "Gunboat Justice"]

[Text]

MANY people are shaking their heads in dismay, if not disbelief, and ours are among them.

We are dismayed because we consider the recent decision of the Ronald Reagan administration to introduce gunboat justice in order to keep out thousands of poverty-stricken Haitians from the United States to be a harsh and inconsistent approach.

When it was first reported more than two months ago that the United States Justice Department was contemplating interdicting boats on the high seas and turning them back if the Haitians on board could not prove that they were political refugees, we agreed with one of America's newspapers, the Washington Post, when it characterised the proposed plan as "an extreme remedy".

Somehow we were hoping that the Reagan administration would change its mind.

But it recently instructed its coast guard to intercept boats with "undocumented" people from the Caribbean on board on the grounds that the "entry of undocumented aliens arriving at the borders . . . from the high seas is detrimental to the United States".

According to a Justice Department spokesman, the coast guard has been given authority to fire weapons if such vessels did not respond to a call to halt for inspection. In addition, the coast guard was authorised to request persons on board these boats to produce documents so that their status as political refugees or persons fleeing their homeland because of economic conditions could be determined.

If the coast guard is satisfied that the persons on board are economic refugees the boats in which they are travelling are to be returned to the country from which they came.

The process of interdicting boats on the high seas, giving the coast guard authority to use its guns and requiring people to produce documents to show they are political refugees, is nauseating.

In any case, what kind of documents must a person carry to prove that he or she is a political refugee?

The Reagan decision is indeed harsh.

FARMERS CONSIDER SECURITY MEASURES TO HALT RISING THEFTS

Bridgetown THE NATION in English 23 Oct 81 p 32

[Text]

FOOD crop farmers in Barbados are contemplating the introduction of private security measures in an effort to stem the rise of praedial larceny on the island.

This has come in the wake of a reported loss of more than $100 000 from crops stolen so far this year and indications that the figure could rise steadily if the practice is not stamped out.

The incidence of praedial larceny is expected to be one of the priority matters down for discussion tomorrow when the Barbados Agricultural Society holds its annual general meeting at The Grotto, Beckles Road.

BAS general manager, Haynesley Benn, pointing to the seriousness of the situation, noted that within a six-day period after the initial losses were reported in another section of the Press earlier this month, thieves made off with some $6 000 in produce; 2 500 pounds of carrots and 1 000 pounds of cabbage.

Benn said the security measures were likely to include private patrols around farms between the hours believed to be the time the thieves struck. The use of guard dogs is also a measure to be used.

Last year, farmers reported losses in the vicinity of nearly $60 000, but so far this year, the reported losses have climbed way past the $100 000 figure.

Benn said that the practice was very rampant in Barbados and needed to be dealt with quickly since it did not offer farmers an incentive to produce food.

He said it was unfair to ask farmers to assist in reducing the country's high food import bill and then have others reap their crops after the farmers had suffered as a result of adverse weather conditions, which stopped them from meeting their projections.

Praedial larceny, he added, was one of the reasons for the increase in the cost to consumers for vegetables, since a farmer had to make a reasonable return on his investment. He noted that the price would further increase if the farmers resorted to the introduction of private security measures.

Benn said that the thieves appeared to be well organised, and from the quantities of produce stolen, must have some use of vehicles.

HAITIAN REFUGEES IN U.S. THREATEN BARBADIAN FARM WORKERS

BARBADOS' 40-year-old United States Farm Labour Programme could soon be in trouble.

For, according to Minister of Labour, Mr. Vic Johnson, the jobs traditionally offered Barbadians were now under threat of being taken away by Haitians living in Florida.

Barbadians have been cutting sugar cane and picking fruits in the United States since the early 1940s, an activity which last year alone saw families here benefiting by some $700 000 in remittances.

Johnson said yesterday that because of the influx of Haitians into that country, and because they were being given special status, they now had a number of very legitimate claims to the places on the programme.

The minister also said that the Haitians had formed themselves into a pressure group and had joined a trade union, making some very strong claims.

Johnson said:

"Already they are making some serious inroads into apples, and I believe that they are going to make some inroads into sugar cane as well."

VALID CLAIMS

He also agreed that at this time their claims were very valid, and this made it even more difficult for the local Labour Department to handle.

He added:

"They have a pressure group formed to give legal advice. They have trade union status, and are putting pressure on the Labour Department which is going to affect the offshore programme."

Concerning the Canadian Farm Labour Programme, Johnson said that a group of workers had recently returned home and all the reports which he had received were favourable.

He added that there was high praise for the women involved, and, as a result, it was expected that an even larger number of women might be going next year.

INDUSTRIAL EXPORTS IN 1980 WORTH (BDS) $151 MILLION

Bridgetown ADVOCATE-NEWS in English 9 Oct 81 p 9

[Text]

Industrial exports from Barbados totalled some Bds$151 million last year, accounting for 55.7 per cent of the total export from the country.

This according to Chairman of the Industrial Development Corporation (IDC) Mr. Fred Gollop, underlies the importance of the sector to the economy of Barbados. Success of this sector, he added, is critical to the economy because hundreds of jobs are created, and lots of foreign exchange brought to the country.

Mr. Gollop was speaking at the official opening of Elias Industries Limited, at the Wildey Industrial Park, last Tuesday.

He said further that some 4 000 full-time jobs were provided by the garment industry. This accounts for about 40 per cent of the jobs provided in plants provided and assisted by the IDC.

Elias Industries is a garment factory which at present specialises in the production of shirts for local and Caricom markets. Indeed, some 75 per cent of the shirts produced are exported to Caricom, with the remainder being sold locally.

The company has been in operation for about 13 months, and now has a staff of 50. By next year, that number is expected to reach 150, with tee-shirts and slacks for men and boys being produced as well.

Mr. Gollop said that there was significant opportunities for investment in Barbados at this time, a theme which was reiterated by Mr. Peter Miller, Chairman of the Barbados Manufacturers Association (BMA).

Mr. Miller paid tribute to managing director of the company, Mr. Odil Elias. He pointed out that Mr. Elias started out as a retail store proprietor, and was now involved in manufacturing on a large scale.

The BMA Chairman said that more local businessmen should get involved in manufacturing because the present economic situation demanded such a move. The benefits, he pointed out were reduced foreign expenditure for the country, and production for import substitutions.

HEAD OF BARBADOS PEACE COMMITTEE OUTLINES OBJECTIVES

Bridgetown THE NATION in English 1 Sep 81 p 10

[Text]

"WE are seeking a state of relations where Caribbean states with different political systems will see the urgency to settle their differences peacefully to ensure happy co-existence."

This profound and idealistic aspiration is that of the Barbados Peace Committee and was expressed by its president Ricky Parris.

Amidst political turmoil and war stricken times, the Committee's work offers a small ray of hope for a turn of tide.

The Barbados Peace Committee forms part of the World Peace Council and though it still operates at a community level, and has a small membership, its work is varied and extensive.

The committee whose members include people from different political and religious persuasions, is primarily interested in motivating Barbadians to consider problems in maintaining peace as important in their own situation and not as an isolated European/Asian problem.

The committee sees the Cubana airplane crash of 1978 as the most significant evidence in recent years which indicates that serious political tension exists in the region.

At present, the committee holds monthly meetings to review both regional and world problems to which members from various associations and members of the public who have interests in preserving world peace, are invited.

In addition to these meetings the committee circulates literature, organises poster displays and presents film shows for the general education of the public.

Although the members of the Barbados Peace Committee are not daunted by the financial pressures involved in the organisation's work, they find their most serious obstacle to be the attitude of certain elements of society who regard the Committee as "subversive".

BAN ON MULTIPLE CANDIDACIES ALTERS COMPLEXION OF ELECTIONS

Rio de Janeiro JORNAL DO BRASIL in Portuguese 25 Oct 81 p 22

[Text] The rejection of the bill which extended the system of multiple candidacies from the same party for the same office [sublegenda] to direct elections for governor scheduled for 1982, will cause profound changes in the picture of successions in the states. Once the surprise caused by the decision of the Congress passed, there appeared the first changes in the evaluations of the stock of the candidates, many of whom lost their status as favorites.

Introduced in 1966 by the then Senator Daniel Krieger, who copied the formula adopted in Uruguay by the Blanco and Colorado Parties, the sublegenda was the casuistic expedient to which the 1964 regime resorted to bring the adversary state factions who made up the extinct ARENA [National Renewal Alliance] under one party.

With the abolishment of the sublegenda for governors, the PDS [Social Democratic Party] emerges as the most prejudiced in an overall computation in the country. The question its members ask themselves today is how will it be possible to extract a single candidate in Minas Gerais where there are 14 PDS hopefuls for the office of governor or in Sao Paulo, where there is no chance for an understanding between Governor Paulo Maluf and former Governor Laudo Natel; or in Ceara where Deputy Adauto Bezerra does not accept supporting the candidate appointed by Governor Virgilio Tavora?

Although it celebrates as a victory the defeat of the sublegenda, the opposition in the times of the extinct MDB [Brazilian Democratic Movement] was its greatest beneficiary, with the exception of Pernambuco, where casuism insured the victory of the present leader of the PDS, Senator Nilo Coelho, in 1978. Present Senators of the opposition Tancredo Neves, Jose Richa, Jaison Barreto, Humberto Lucena and Henrique Santillo owe their positions to the sublegenda.

The Opposition Was Helped in 1978

Brasilia--The present leader of the PDS in the Senate, Nilo Coelho, owes his election to the sublegenda in which his colleague in the extinct ARENA, Cid Sampaio, today in the PP [Popular Party], also ran. In the 1978 elections both of them together obtained 693,497 votes against 654,592 votes of the MDB candidate, former Deputy Jarbas Casconcelos. By himself Nilo Coelho would have lost badly because he only obtained 367,720 votes.

The present president of the PP, Senator Tancredo Neves, is another who owes his election to the sublegenda. As the only MDB candidate, he would have lost by 26,382 votes to the two ARENA candidates, Fagundes Neto and Israel Pinheiro Filho, who together obtained 1,668,297 votes. With Alfredo Jose de Campos Melo in the sublegenda, Tancredo Neves obtained another 95,162 votes, which added to the 1,641,915 votes he obtained by himself, gave him the victory.

Senator Jose Richa of Parana would have lost as the MDB candidate by a difference of 188,560 votes to the ARENA candidate, Tulio Vargas, who obtained 1,083,573 votes. By adding his 895,013 votes to the other 254,520 votes obtained by sublegenda candidate, Eneas Farias, he won by a difference of 65,960 votes.

Jaison Barreto, candidate of the extinct MDB in Santa Catarina, obtained 465,930 of the 626,185 votes given to his party in the elections for the Senate. If the ARENA candidate, Wilmar Dallanhoi, had run by himself, Jaison Barreto would also have won as an only candidate. However, since ARENA had Aroldo de Carvalho in the sublegenda, the MDB also took the votes won by Djandir Dal Pasquale in the sublegenda. The results: the opposition won by 19,756 votes. In Goias, Henrique Santillo and Juarez Bernardes together won 536,113 votes against 444,170 votes by the three ARENA candidates: Jarmund Nasser, Osires Teixeira (he ran for reelection) and Jonas Duarte. The MDB senator also owes his position to the sublegenda.

Bezerra Does Not Agree with Virgilio

Fortaleza--The PMDB [Brazilian Democratic Movement Party], now that the threat of the sublegenda has been eliminated, has all the chances of winning the governorship of Ceara. The PDS leaders themselves admit this, believing that only a miracle will unite the factions of Governor Virgilio Tavares and Deputy Adauto Bezerra. Faced with the possibility of defeat, those of the PDS hang on to the hope that the two factions will accept the prefect of Fortaleza, Lucio Alcantara,as a compromise candidate.

Virgilio's followers make up the majority in the PDS convention. Those who follow Bezerra as a minority could deal for an agreement which would present the candidacy of Lucio Alcantara, who is well accepted in both factions. The agreement would be completed with the appointment of the candidate to the Lieutenant Governorship by Adauto Bezerra, and Virgilio Tavares would pick the candidate to the Senate. Minister of Mines and Energy Cesar Cals would receive the prefecture of Fortaleza and the guarantee of reelection of his group of state and federal legislators. "That is a hypothesis we have not even studied,"said a prominent adviser of Governor Virgilio Tavora. "If we are a majority at the convention we have the right to appoint the candidate for governor," he concluded.

The candidate of the Virgilio group, Aecio de Borba, is involved completely in his campaign and this Sunday will have a rally in Aracati. It is admitted, however, that Virgilio Tavora, fearing the negative effects which the defeat of the PDS in Ceara could cause in Brasilia, is willing to review positions and discuss a solution which represents a party consensus.

In the last two days, the story circulated in Fortaleza that Adauto Bezerra will be a candidate on some sublegenda to the Senate. He would be seeking a victory with a triple objective: defeat his adversary Virgilio Tavora at the polls, increase the number of his federal and state deputies and prevent some follower of Virgilio from being elected governor. To attain the final objective, he would instruct the four federal deputies, 12 state deputies, 52 prefects and almost 500 councilmen who support him to abstain from the election for governor.

"Then we could cry victory ahead of time," commented the deputy leader of the PMDB in the Legislative Assembly, Deputy Jose Humberto.

The PDS of Minas Gerais has 14 Candidates

Belo Horizonte--Although no one in Minas Gerais dares to analyze the picture of succession after the defeat of the sublegenda, difficulties became greater, at least for the PDS, since the party has 14 hopefuls who want to succeed Governor Francelino Pereira.

Francelino Pereira warns that no one can now have the vanity of wanting to pick the candidate. "It is necessary to seek the one who has the party consensus and this consensus can only be achieved by one who has the conditions for winning next year's elections."

Although surprised by the defeat of the sublegenda, Senator Murilo Badaro continued to tour the interior in a campaign to win the support of the PDS rank and file in the Party Convention. Belo Horizonte Prefect Mauricio Campos issued an official note declaring that the result of the voting for the National Congress does not change the position he assumed by placing his name for consideration by the party.

The PP considers the candidacy of Senator Tancredo Neves, who was going to the convention as an only candidate anyway, has been strengthened. In the PMDB, former Prefect Jorge Carone loses the opportunity of becoming a candidate although he announces that he will compete at the convention with Senator Itamar Franco. The other parties, without the conditions for presenting candidates, are waiting to enter into agreements.

Montoro Already Claims Victory

Sao Paulo--The PDS and opposition parties declare that they will come out the winners because of the rejection of the sublegenda in the elections for governor. PMDB president, former Deputy Mario Covas, heralded the victory of the opposition and Senator Franco Montoro reacted as if he had already been elected governor. More than a month ago, however, Deputy Armando Pinheiro, president of the Sao Paulo PDS, had doubts about the sublegenda bill being passed by the Congress and according to him, its rejection was of interest to Governor Paulo Maluf.

It is believed that Senator Montoro will benefit the most from the congressional decision, but the followers of Janio Quadros guarantee that if the former president were to join the PTB [Brazilian Labor Party] "He will win the 1982 elections." The last poll by the Gallup Institute indicates Montoro is in the lead by nearly 10 points over Janio Quadros, who is in second place. With respect to the survey made nearly three months ago, Montoro increased his lead a bit and Janio lost two points.

In the PDS, although he fought for the sublegenda, former Governor Laudo Natel continues to work the conventioneers and believes that he can win in the convention and become the party candidate to the governorship. However, other names are mentioned: Reinaldo de Barros (prefect of the capital), Guilherme Afif Domingos (secretary of agriculture and the favorite of Maluf) and Deputy Adhemar de Barros Filho.

Rank and File Pressure Jair and Marchezan

Porto Alegre--In Rio Grande do Sul, the rejection of the sublegenda will force the two PDS candidates--still undeclared--Minister of Social Welfare Jair Soares and Deputy Nelson Marchezan to hasten their decision. Both have already begun to receive pressure from their support base to begin competing for convention votes. Deputy Governor Otavio Germano, the only declared PDS candidate, guaranteed that he is going to compete in the convention to be nominated by the party. Deputy Adilson Motta, campaign manager for Jair Soares, went to Rio Friday in an attempt to convince the minister to release his support base for an immediate initiation of a campaign.

Advisers to Nelson Marchezan are pressuring him the same way. Some deputies such as Rospide Neto (PMDB), Carlos de Souza (PDT) and Enrico Pegoraro (PDS) think that the election has been made more difficult for the PDS by the rejection of the sublegenda, since the three PDS candidates could more effectively confront the opposition.

Without depending on the sublegenda, the PMDB and PDT in extraordinary conventions have already nominated their candidates: Senator Pedro Simon and Deputy Alceu Collares, respectively. The same was done by the PP with former Governor Sinval Guazelli. The PT has not decided whether it will nominate its own candidate, but if it did, the nomination should be that of its national vice president, Olivio Dutra. On 9 November, the PDS will bring its three candidates together with Governor Amaral de Souza and the state and federal congressmen for a decision on the candidate and the political campaign.

Maciel Plans Dashed

Recife--Governor Marco Maciel will have to completely reformulate his plans with respect to the gubernatorial succession in Pernambuco, plans which up to now have been based on the sublegenda. A first obstacle has been created: former Governor Moura Cavalcanti, who always wanted to be the lone candidate from the PDS or wanted his candidate nominated at the party convention.

Recife Prefect Gustavo Krause, indicated as the candidate chosen by Governor Marco Maciel, is in a good position. A nephew of Moura Cavalcanti, who introduced him to politics, he will not be sacrificed and have to compete against the former governor or only be a name on the government slate on some sublegenda. If Maciel intends to support him as a candidate, he will have some hard work before him in rallying the PDS around Kraus.

With the possibility of the sublegenda eliminated, the candidacy of Senator Francos Freire of the PMDB became even stronger. The polarization between the government and the oppositions is great and it benefits Francos Freire.

Former Governor Cid Sampaio, who recently joined the PP, wins with the elimination of the sublegenda. In the PDS he certainly would not have the conditions to become a candidate unless it were a sublegenda. Possibly Cid Sampiao could be a candidate to governor of the state with the support of the group which left the PDT. However, without the sublegenda, the candidacy of Marcos Freire grows stronger and has broad possibilities of emerging victorious with the support of an opposition front which would include the PP.

Only Planalto Saves Alvares

Vitoria--Without the sublegenda, the candidacy of former Governor Elcio Alvares to the governorship of the state can only be saved by an interference by Planalto Palace in the process of succession in the PDS in Espirito Santo if it were to declare him to have the best chances of defeating the PMDB in the election.

If it were to depend on social contingencies, according to the president of the Legislative Assembly, Deputy Vicente Silveira (PDS), Governor Eurico Rezende, an adversary of Elcio and the leader of the other factions of the party, would choose the candidate from among less well-known names but who are more loyal to him. Among them are the former prefect of Vitoria, Crisogono Teixeira Cruz, the favorite; Carlos Von Schilgen, now prefect of the capital, Jose Maria Feu Rosa, prefect of Serra and Federal Deputy Teodorico Ferraco.

In the PMDB, the dispute is restricted to Federal Deputies Gerson Camata and Max Mauro. While the former appears frequently in public opinion polls as the great challenger to the favorite status of Elcio Alvares, the latter has his base strictly among the urban sectors of the left.

Dinarte Does Not Accept the Official Nomination

Natal--The opposition celebrated the defeat of the sublegenda until early morning and received in the expressions of happiness the solidarity of a dissident group of the PDS, which is opposing the candidacy to the governorship of the prefect of the capital, Jose Agripino Maia.

Dinarte was unequivocal in describing the political picture without the sublegenda: "Now we are indeed on the road of democracy." He once more accused the candidacy of Jose Agripino Maia of being divisionist and he cited names of politicians who could unite the PDS in Rio Grande do Norte: Lt Governor Geraldo Meio, industrialist Fernando Bezerra, Deputy Carlos Augusto Rosado and Rector Diogenes da Cunha Lima.

Jose Agripino Maia defends himself from the accusations of Dinarte, who considers him to be part of a family oligarchy which has ruled the state for 8 years. He explains that he is not a candidate only because he is a Maia--he is the 5th cousin of the present governor, Lavoisier Maia--but because of the administration he is accomplishing in Natal.

PMDB Loses Duo in Mato Grosso

Campo Grande--The opposition was the victim of the decision of the Congress which rejected the extension of the sublegenda to the election for governors. The PMDB was left without the duo of the brothers Plinio and Wilson Barbosa Martins, with which the PMDB intended to win the governorship of the state.

The PP will also have to remake its plans because it had counted on the sublegenda for presenting its three senators as candidates: Saldanha Derzi, Mendes Canale and Jose Fragelli; now it will have to choose just one of them.

The defeat of the sublegenda was well received by Governor Pedro Pedrossian, who now feels he has a chance to assume control of the PDS and command the process of succession.

A. Carlos Seeks to Attract Lomanto

Salvador--Despite having considered the rejection of the sublegenda an error, Governor Antonio Carlos Magalhaes is the most obvious winner within the PDS of Bahia after the decision by Congress this week. The biggest winner in the parties of opposition is Waldir Pires, consultant to the republic during the Joao Goulart administration, who is the first to have his candidacy to the governorship formally accepted in conventions.

Among the losers, the greatest loser is undoubtedly Senator Lomanto Junior, who initiated an internal dissidence within the PDS when he announced his candidacy to the governorship against the wishes of Antonio Carlos Magalhaes. The one who benefits the most, however, is the president of the Bahia State Bank (BANEB), Cleriston Andrade, considered the favorite candidate of the governor.

In the limbo of the PDS are the groups led by Senator Luis Viana Filho and Senator Jutahy Magalhaes, who continued to advocate the need for a consensus in nominating a PDS candidate.

The picture of succession for the opposition does not change much, unless it is because of the fact that now the regional president of the PP, former Governor Roberto Santos is going to step up the beat in attempting to overcome Waldir Pires of the PMDB.

Ney prefers Saul Raiz

Curitiba--In Parana, the rejection of the sublegenda favored the PMDB candidate to the governorship, Senator Jose Richa. Because of the five present PDS hopefuls, Secretary Saul Raiz, the favorite of Governor Ney Braga, should emerge the candidate and he is a novice at elections.

Saul Raiz himself admits that he needed the sublegenda in order to be elected with the help of other candidates because he will have to fight for votes in the same area as his personal friend and PP candidate, former Governor Jaime Canet.

Within the PDS, the hopes of Jaime Lerner, the prefect of Curitiba, who counted on a sublegenda, have been dashed. Londrina Prefect Antonio Belinati also gave up his hopes. Formerly of the extinct MDB, he was accepted by the PDS as the political solution for creating a sublegenda in the northern region of Parana, the traditional redoubt of the opposition.

The chief of the Civilian Household, Fabiano Braga Cortes, is considered a family solution, which his cousin Ney Braga can accept.

The biggest loser is former Governor Paulo Pimentel, who surely will not go beyond the convention despite the good relationship he has with Planalto Palace.

Seixas Now Has Hope

Aracaju--The sublegenda was the guarantee that Governor Augusto Franco Faria would name his successor without any great problems. With the rejection of the sublegenda by Congress, the picture of the PDS of Sergipe changed radically and the situation changed to favor the opposition which has such strong candidates as Senator Gilvan Rocha and former Governor Seixas Dorea. In the PDS there is difficulty in finding one candidate who will rally the dissident groups of the party.

Seixas Dorea, who two weeks ago granted an interview in which he acknowledged the victory of the PDS, is now euphoric and believes that the opposition has a chance to elect the governor.

The previous selections made within the PDS with respect to the names which would be included in the sublegendas are considered as "no good" by PDS and opposition politicians. Present Secretary of Education, Federal Deputy Antonio Carlos Valadares, was discarded. The most likely hopeful now is Senator Passos Porto.

Acre Turns to the President

Rio Branco--Acre Governor Joaquim Falcao Macedo declared that without the sublegenda it will be difficult to rally the different factions within the PDS and he expected that he will be forced to turn to the President of the Republic to lead the electoral process in the state.

He pointed out that the sublegenda was vital to the PDS and he had been working with the assurance that it would be approved. "Now," he said, "we have to do a work of arousing the awareness of party members to prevent the party from being harmed by internal differences."

Up to now the PDS has two gubernatorial candidates, who do not show any willingness to give up their aspirations: former Governor Geraldo Gurgel de Mesquita and Federal Deputy Amilcar Alves de Queiroz, inflexible adversaries.

Governor Joaquim Macedo made it clear that he prefers Geraldo Mesquita but he acknowledged that the candidacy of the former Governor would encounter strong resistance within the party.

According to the Acre governor, the defeat of the sublegenda strengthens the PT [Workers Party], which is already the third electoral force in the state. "The PT will be the indicator on the scales," he forecast, "and can decide the election for governor."

An already defined candidate accepted by all sectors of the party, Deputy Raimundo Herminio de Melo, said that the defeat of the sublegenda was "very beneficial" for the PMDB in Acre. "There could not have been anything better," he added.

Alacid Remains a Prisoner of Barbalho

Belem--The rejection of the sublegenda bill created difficulties in Para for the PMDB and the PDS equally, although opinions are divided in the official party. For the leader of the PDS legislators in the Legislative Assembly, Deputy Zeno Veloso, the defeat of the sublegenda strengthened the position of the party, which in his opinion will have better chances of winning the election with a single candidate.

In the opinion of Federal Deputy Oswaldo Melo (PDS), however, the party would have greater chances if it were to compete with three candidates. For Senator Jarbas Passarinho, the absence of the sublegenda makes no difference because he believes that the PDS will win in any event.

As far as the PMDB is concerned, the absence of the sublegenda apparently improved the situation of its candidate to governor, Deputy Jader Barbalho, who had been resisting the attempts of Governor Alacid Nunes to present a candidate from his group. On the other hand, without the sublegenda the PMDB runs the risk of not obtaining the vote of the Alacid rank and file supporters, who up to now have not assimilated the agreement which joined them with the governor. It will also face the problem of the division of opposition votes because it will no longer be able to count on former Deputy Benedito Monteiro in the sublegenda. Monteiro, at this time a PDT candidate for state governor, had been developing understandings for transferring to the PMDB and running on a sublegenda.

Valadao Does Not Change Plans

Goiania--Valteno Cunha, Secretary of Interior and Justice and political coordinator for the government, declares that the rejection of the sublegenda does not change any plans because Governor Ary Valadao was not against the sublegenda. He only announced the decision not to use it if it were introduced.

Secretary Valteno Cunha, does not believe in the existence of irreconcilable groups within the PDS and asserts that the PDS will march united around the candidate chosen by the convention. There are three candidates in the PDS:

Ibsen de Castro, the secretary of finance who has already placed himself "at the disposal of the party," Otavio Lage, former governor and Prefect of Goiana Indio Artiaga.

The PMDB has only one candidate to the governorship, former Prefect Iris Rezende. Senator Henrique Santillo withdrew his candidacy and agreed to appoint the vice governor from the PMDB slate, choosing businessman Onofre Quinam.

The PT is an unknown quantity in the picture of the opposition. Up to now the president of the party, Athos Magno Costa e Silva, advocates the position of "presenting candidates at all levels." This week the leadership of the PT was invited to a meeting with the advisers of Iris Rezende. The reply to the invitation by the PMDB will be made next week.

PDS Recovers Unity in Piaui

Teresina--The PDS is the biggest beneficiary of the rejection of the sublegenda for the gubernatorial elections in Piaui. With the decision by Congress, the government party has rid itself of the possibility of an internal dispute which threatened its unity.

The abolishment of bipartisanism allowed the government party in Piaui to eliminate its basic differences: Senator Alberto Silva left for the PP and what remained in the PDS placed itself under the unified command put together by deceased Minister Petronio Portela.

To prevent the advances of the candidacy of Senator Alberto Silva, launched after the results of the 1978 elections were announced, the PDS encouraged the emergence of hopefuls for the candidacy to governor of the state. It was the means for motivating the rank and file to prevent the occupation of their spaces by Alberto Silva. In the passage of time, the candidacies achieved consistency, making the selection by Governor Lucidio Portela difficult. He seeks to acquire the political inheritance of his brother Petronio and assume control of the succession.

The pressure by those hopeful of succeeding him in office was so great that Governor Lucidio Portela could not make up his mind because if he did he could cause constraints and defections. With the rejection of the sublegenda, he declared: "Now I will roll up my sleeves and I am going to work for the candidate who is approved by the convention."

According to the manifestations of the great majority of the party, the PDS of Piaui will opt for the candidacy of Deputy Hugo Napoleao, who placed first in the survey ordered by Governor Lucidio Portela.

A Uruguayan Formula

The sublegenda is an invention of Uruguay, which appeared for conciliating the various factions concentrated in the Blanco Party, on one hand, and the Colorado Party on the other, during a climate of political radicalization which almost led the country to a civil war.

In Brazil, the sublegenda was created at the suggestion of the then Senator Daniel Krieger at the time of the creation of the ARENA and the MDB in 1966. At that time the agglutinization of political forces in only two parties made a legal mechanism necessary, pursuant to which all antagonistic factions could coexist in the same party and add up their votes for the dominant faction. The sublegenda appeared only for the Senate, a casuistic expedient whose purpose was to prevent the desertion of powerful political chiefs to the opposition. In 1968 the sublegendas were extended to municipal elections. The 1969 Constitution abolished the sublegenda for the Senate but the April Package of 1977 restored it.

With party reform at the end of 1979, the government proposed the maintenance of the sublegenda. Using his veto power, President Figueiredo restored the sublegenda for candidates to the Senate and prefectures. Last Thursday, the extension of the sublegenda to the elections for governor attempted by the government was rejected by Congress.

PLANNING MINISTER TO VISIT U.S., JAPAN, FRG

PY232339 Buenos Aires TELAM in Spanish 1228 GMT 22 Nov 81

[Text] Brasilia, 22 Nov (TELAM)--The press information office of the Brazilian Planning Ministry announced today that Planning Minister Antonio Delfim Netto will make a 16-day trip to the United States, Japan and Germany in December.

It reports that in the United States Delfim Netto will sign a loan contract with the World Bank for $320 million for the development of Brazil's northeastern region, and in Japan he will obtain another $250 million for projects in the field of transport.

In Germany the planning minister and the president of the Brazilian Nuclear Corporations (NUCLEBRAS) will seek an understanding to regulate the schedule of the existing nuclear agreement between the two countries in order to adjust it to the Brazilian regulations on restraint of public expenditures in 1982.

Official sources clarified this by stating that this understanding would not be aimed at renegotiating the existing nuclear agreement, but at placing it within a realistic framework of Brazil's economic possibilities.

In Japan Minister Delfim Netto will start making contacts so that Japan can take part in the financing of the exploitation of the Carajas mineral deposits, considered to have the largest reserves in the world.

Experts estimate that Japan's Government and private enterprises are ready to contribute $500 million in order to participate in the exploitation of mines in the Carajas areas, located in the State of Para in central Brazil.

SENATOR REPORTS ON LEGISLATOR'S VISIT TO CUBA

Brazilia CORREIO BRAZILIENSE in Portuguese 25 Oct 81 p 10

[Text] Returning from Cuba, where he was a member of a delegation of the Parliamentary Union consisting of 15 federal deputies and five senators headed by Minas Gerais Senator Murilo Badoro, Senator Calmon of Espirito Santo granted a collective interview to the press yesterday morning in which he reported on his impressions of Cuba after the rise of Fidel Castro to government.

The meeting of the members of the Parliamentary Union took place from 15 to 23 September in Havana and more than 1100 delegates of 100 parliaments of capitalist countries were present, including two which do not yet have diplomatic relations with the government of the Cuban dictator: Brazil and the United States. The meeting took place in the Palace of Congress which was recently inaugurated and whose construction cost $30 million.

During the course of the work, several speeches were made, among which was that of former Venezuelan President Raphael Caldera, who now heads the Interparliamentarian Council. Fidel Castro was presented to the parliamentarians as the commander in chief and president of the Council of State. At that time he made an explosive speech, whose duration was exactly two hours. On other occasions, the communist leader, wearing a flamboyant general's uniform, has been less "brief," talking for as long as six or seven hours.

In his speech to the visitors, recalled Calmon, he violated the rules of protocol by attacking countries participating in the assembly of the Parliamentary Union with extreme violence, particularly the United States and Great Britain.

This was not proper because Cuba was the host country and its highest leader could not offend the legislators who were his guests, primarily those of the United States, which was accused of being governed by a fascist group and of having waged a bacteriological war against Cuba.

According to him, in less than 3 years five serious epidemics have assailed cattle, crops and even the health of the Cuban people. He even indulged in a little bit of black humor, emphasized Senator Calmon, by declaring that as delegates to the Interparliamentarian Union Conference they could be infected with one of those diseases: hemorrhagic conjunctivitis, which was allegedly introduced criminally into his country by the North American Government. Obviously those accusations were not taken seriously because Fidel Castro was using them to prepare the permanently mobilized people to face the threat of an invasion by U.S. forces. Some of the U.S. delegates left the building and all refrained from attending a reception held that night for the parliamentarians by Fidel Castro in the sumptuous Palace of the Revolution at which a varied menu was served, prominent in which were immense platters of lobster and shrimp, aways replenished, and a great variety of imported beverages.

The Brazilian delegation, continued the Espirito Santos senator, as was said before, consisted of six members of the Senate of the Republic and 15 deputies from the PMDB [Brazilian Democratic Movement Party], PDS [Social Democratic Party] and PP [Popular Party] and was headed by Senator Murilo Badaro, who is also president of the Brazilian section of the Interparliamentary Union. They arrived in Havana on the 15th, a Tuesday shortly after the beginning of the solemn session of installation of the meeting. On the 18th, Friday, at exactly 2000, they received the news of President Joao Figueiredo's heart attack. The following morning the president of the Brazilian delegation decided to leave Havana, leaving it up to the decision of each legislator, however, whether or not to remain in Cuba until the 23rd, on which date the closing of the 68th assembly of the Union was scheduled. Only four PMDB legislators remained in Havana, however, other legislators of the PMDB itself and of the PP left Cuba on Saturday night. The curtailment of the stay by the Brazilian delegation did not allow completion of the entire program. Instead of eight days, it only remained four entire days.

The most important event of the visit to Cuba by the Brazilian delegation was undoubtedly the meeting with Fidel Castro, something which took place at the exclusive initiative of the chief of the Cuban Government. On the 18th the Brazilian legislators were informed at the Hotel Habana Libre (formerly Hotel Hilton, seized after the rise of Castro to power) that a high official of the revolution would receive them at 1730 at the Palace of Congress. The identity of that leader was not revealed at that time nor had the delegation asked for an audience with Fidel Castro.

At 1700 they were all directed to a large office where the smiling--uniformed as usual and smoking a cigar--commander in chief waited for them.

Fidel Castro devoted an hour and a half to the legislators and even expressed his regret at not being able to spend more time with them, said Senator Calmon, because he had to attend three receptions that night.

Several questions were asked of Fidel, who did not hide his desire to reestablish diplomatic relations with Brazil as soon as possible.

Our country and Cuba are the two greatest producers and exporters of sugar in the world, therefore, it is up to us and the Cuban nation to establish better prices for the product on the world market. What has prevented the reestablishment of diplomatic relations is the obstinacy of Fidel Castro in trying to export not only sugar but also communist ideology, seeking to support the armed struggle of subversive groups in other countries.

Even guerrillas were trained in Cuba after the revolution of 64. Recently, however, the Havana government has modified its attitude toward the Brazilian Government. Its representatives no longer attack our political system in international congresses and they have also ceased to boycott the election of Brazilian representatives in world organizations.

Communications

The press, radio and television are stated-owned in Cuba and they have not criticized Brazil after the beginning of the democratic opening. During his speech at the inauguration of the parliamentary assembly, Fidel Castro made a statement of praise for the position of Brazil in refusing to heed a call by the United States for extending an agreement similar to NATO to the Latin American countries. Castro emphasized that the refusal by Brazil is a sign of the new times that the North American imperialists are facing.

Fidel Castro, however, appears docile to Soviet imperialism, which is now installing a nuclear powerplant in Cuba.

During the meeting with the chief of the Cuban Government, Senator Calmon asked a question on the campaign he initiated in January 1961 for the eradication of illiteracy in Cuba. He programed that by December of that same year there would no longer be any illiterates in Cuba. To reach that goal, he closed all the universities of the country. He mobilized his teachers, students and skilled workers, a total of nearly 100,000. Through this effort Cuba would be free of the plague of illiteracy. The espirito Santo legislator and member of the Senate of the Republic asked the Cuban dictator how it was possible to prevent the large-scale return of illiteracy. UNESCO estimates that rate of regression to be between 50 and 60 percent of those who learn to read, write and count in short-term courses.

Fidel Castro avoided an objective answer, since that type of mass education without lasting results is nothing more than a demagogic or propaganda weapon. Senator Calmon also asked him how continuity was provided for education after the demobilization of the contingent of 100,000 literacy teachers who worked for a year. Once more Castro evaded the question, preferring to focus on another aspect, an important one. That literacy crusade was begun 20 years ago. In that period of two decades, Castro revealed to Senator Calmon, the Cuban Government achieved a more important feat: the elimination of the source of illiteracy. Cuba guaranteed at least a 6th-grade education for 100 percent of the children of the country. By 1985, Cuban children will be assured a 9th-grade education.

During the audience Fidel Castro made a revelation to those present, which was received with great skepticism. According to him, livestock experts achieved an exceptional success in the process of crossbreeding a Cebu bull with a Dutch cow, which is now giving 10 liters of milk per day.

There were some ranch owners among the Brazilian legislators and they found that miracle of revolutionary or socialist awareness by that Cuban cow exaggerated. However, Fidel invited the unbelievers to visit a farm at which was located the world champion in milk production. Unfortunately the invitation could not be accepted because the delegation was leaving early the next day. In other areas, primarily in the field of sports, Cuba has broken world records.

Invasion of Poland

In his visits to the United States and Cuba, the senator gathered the impression that if the USSR were to invade Poland, the United States would immediately carry out landings by its armed forces on Cuban soil.

Reagan has already made it clear that the cases of Cuba and Nicaragua will not be repeated during his administration. At this time he is economically and militarily supporting the El Salvador junta. After the humiliations suffered in Vietnam and the episodes of the unsuccessful attempt to free the hostages from the U.S. embassy in Teheran, the United States is seeking to rehabilitate its image. The first demonstration of that new phase came recently with the shooting down of two Libyan jets by aircraft from the aircraft carrier Nimitz. Carter limited himself to promoting an embargo on exports at the time of the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan. As will be recalled, that embargo was a failure.

Now Reagan is preparing to fight with an entirely different policy.

Senator Calmon, closing the interview, revealed that the slogan of the Cuban Government, disseminated on posters on the streets of Havana, preaches three sources of activity to the Cuban young: education, work and rifle, an imitation of the slogan of the great Latin American leader Jose Marti, who had the pen and the plowshare as his coat of arms.

He also showed the newsmen who interviewed him a copy of one of the only newspapers (there is hardly any press in Cuba) which are published there, GRANMA, the name of the ship which took Fidel Castro, Che Guevara and other guerrillas to the Sierra Maestra where they began the battle for independence of Cuba against the shameful dictatorship of Sgt Fulgencio Batista.

After his interview, whose main objective was to inform the people of Espirito Santo of his impressions of what he had the chance to see and observe, Senator Calmon expressed surprise at the fact that no Brazilian press organ--only one newsman was present--had participated in an event as important as the meeting held in Havana by the Interparliamentary Union.

GALLUP POLL SHOWS NATIONWIDE DECLINE OF PMDB POPULARITY

Rio de Janeiro JORNAL DO BRASIL in Portuguese 26 Oct 81 p 2

[Text] Sao Paulo--In a new poll for September being published by the magazine VEJA, which reaches newsstands today, the Gallup Institute reveals that the preferency by the country for the PMDB [Brazilian Democratic Movement Party] began to decline. At the same time, preference for the PDS [Social Democratic Party] began to increase. In June the PMDB had 22 percent of the popular preference, declining by one point. The PDS, in turn, rose from 17 percent to 20 percent.

Among the candidates for governor in the 10 states surveyed by the Institute, the stock of former Deputy Sandra Cavalcanti (PDR) [Republican Democratic Party] fell in Rio de Janeiro. Miro, the principal adversary of Sandra, climbed from 15 percent to 17 percent. In Sao Paulo, Senator Franco Montoro continued to climb: he went from 20 to 23 percent.

The Parties

In February 1981, the PMDB was the party preferred by 23 percent of the voters, the PDS being preferred by only a modest share of 13 percent. The PTB of Ivete Vargas, struggling before the Supreme Electoral Court [TSE] to obtain final registration, followed next with 12 percent. Far behind came the PT [Workers Party] and the PP [Popular Party], both with 6 percent.

With the frequent crises which threaten to make it inoperable, the PTB [Brazilian Labor Party] now has 7 percent, having been passed by the PP, which now occupies third place throughout the country (8 percent). The PT is in fourth place with 6 percent and the PDT comes in last with only 3 percent.

The Gallup Poll on the parties covered 20 of the 22 states. Those polled numbered 2,429 in 259 Brazilian cities. A year ago the rise of the PDS, which is blamed for all the unpopular measures of the government, would have been difficult to imagine, a rise which in September finds it preferred by 20 percent of the voters, only one point behind the PMDB.

To rise in the standings, the PDS benefitted primarily from the misfortune of the PTB and from the errors of its adversaries. In small cities (from 5001 to 10,000 voters) the PDS has a 27-percent popular preferential rate, the PMDB having only 17 percent, with the PP in third place with its 12 percent.

In the capitals, in compensation, the PMDB wins by 26 percent to the 11 percent of the PDS, the PT holding third place with 9 percent and the PTB with 8 percent coming in fourth. In the large urban centers, the PP has a rating of 6 percent, the PDT only 3 percent and the PDR of former Deputy Sandra Cavalcanti does not even appear.

The PDS is also the great favorite in cities of 10,001 to 50,000 voters (25 percent), with the PMDB receiving 17 percent. The PP is even with the PTB (9 percent). In those medium size cities, the PT has a 5-percent rating, while the PDT has 4 percent.

In cities of up to 5,000 voters--rural economy cities--the PDS has a 35-percent rate of preference compared to 15 percent for the PMDB, 6 percent for the PP, 5 percent for the PTB and 1 percent for the PT and PDT.

The Candidates

In Sao Paulo, in addition to the consolidation of the candidacy of Senator Franco Montoro, who rose three points, the great news of the Gallup survey was the increase in the ratings of the principal PDS candidates who seem to have the support of Governor Paulo Maluf: Adhemar de Barros Filho and Reynaldo de Barros climbed from 6 percent to 9 percent, while Laudo Natel fell from 14 percent to 12 percent.

In Rio de Janeiro, Sandra Cavalcanti fell from 38 percent to 34 percent and Miro Teixeira rose from 15 percent to 17 percent. Roberto Saturnino (PMDB) fell from 7 percent to 6 percent and Brizola from 5 percent to 4 percent. Moreira Franco of the PDS rose from 1 percent to 3 percent. The number of undecideds was 16 percent and 20 percent of the voters have no preference among the names already presented for the contest for the succession to Chagas Freitas.

In Minas, Tancredo Neves (PP) fell 3 points and the prefect of Belo Horizonte, Mauricio Campos, who is preferred by Governor Francelino Pereira, rose from 6 percent to 9 percent. In Rio Grande do Sul, Pedro Simon (PMDB) also fell 3 points, while Sinval Guazelli (PP) rose one point. In Parana, Jaime Canet (PP) remained stationary at 25 percent, while Jose Richa (PMDB) rose from 22 percent to 23 percent. Lomanto Junior in Bahia fell from 30 percent to 25 percent.

Marco Freire (PMDB) in Pernambuco fell from 39 percent to 37 percent, but his closest followers, former Governors Moura Cavalcanti (PDS) and Cid Sampaio (PP) have only 6 percent. In Santa Catarina, Espiridiao Amin (PDS) maintained a rating of 25 percent while Jailson Barreto (PMDB) fell from 16 percent to 15 percent. In Ceara, two names from the PDS are presented: Adauto Bezerra (26 percent) and Cesar Cals (20 percent). In Goias, Iris Resende (PMDB), although falling from 33 percent to 29 percent, continued well ahead of Otavio Lage (PDS), who only has 18 percent, having risen by one point.

NATIONAL GROWTH DEPENDS ON INCREASED EXPORTS, SAYS MINISTER

Rio de Janeiro JORNAL DO BRASIL in Portuguese 25 Oct 81 p 39

[Text] Brasilia--Brazil could grow again beginning next year, increasing imports by up to 10 percent if it can manage to increase its exports by 15 percent. Those are the conditioning agents for the development of the country in coming years, according to Minister of Finance Ernane Galveas.

The preconditions for the so-called take-off of the economy at a rate lower than the traditional 7 percent, probably between 4 and 5 percent, were created this year with the transformation of a trade deficit of almost $3 billion in 1980 into a surplus of between $500 million and $1 billion, and the reestablishment of confidence by the international financial community in government policies.

Inflation

The gradual activation of consumption to the level necessary for the reactivation of investments in several industrial sectors could take place simultaneously with the decline of inflation, providing the government keeps the process under control. Many sectors with a privileged capability for affecting the market (cartels and oligopolies) will raise their prices this year well above the rate of inflation to compensate for the loss of profits caused by the decline in sales. In the degree that their sales increase, they can reduce the rate of increase of their prices without prejudice to their profit margins.

The great obstacle to the realization of new investments in the industrial sector in 1982 will continue to be the high rate of interest. The domestic cost of money, conditioned in great part by the high foreign rates of this second half year, which will be paid in the first half of 1982, will have to be avoided even with sacrifices. Thus, some formulas being suggested, such as the temporary permission for the reduction in a portion of the interests on income taxes and greater incentives for loans with a postfixed correction, deserve the attention of the government.

The reactivation of the economy will also allow greater entry of risk capital into the country, facilitating an improvement in the balance of payments. The reduced entry of foreign investments this year resulted in part from the retraction in the Brazilian economy, which primarily affected its most dynamic sectors, and from the high rates of interest paid on the North American market.

The government is aware that after the recession this year, with idleness spreading to almost all sectors, the increases in prices are more a result of the pressure of costs than of demand. It also knows that a large part of those pressures result from the inability to reduce the fixed costs of the companies. A more consistent activity by means of informal controls of the cartel and oligopoly sectors of the economy could greatly reduce inflationary pressures.

Balance of Payments

In 1982, the country should pay out nearly $17 billion for servicing the foreign debt, payment which this year will be nearly $16 billion. If exports exceed the $24 billion of this year and increase to $27.6 billion at a growth rate of 15 percent, and imports increase only 10 percent, reaching $25.3 billion, the trade surplus of $2.3 billion will decrease the pressures of the foreign sector on the economy considerably.

In that way the country will have to obtain a volume of loans only a little higher than that of this year. For that it will also have to counterbalance nearly $5.5 billion in the deficit in the balance of services, excluding interest, with foreign investments and supplier's credits. The government is already moving in that direction with the agreements made by Minister Delfim Netto abroad. At the same time, CACEX [Foreign Trade Department] is already entering into the sectoral agreements for exports in 1982 with the objective of not letting the end-of-the-year trade surplus being prejudiced in the following quarter by indecision. In that respect, he has already established that financing for exports will be increased by 150 percent, going from 300 billion cruzeiros set for this year to 750 billion.

Monetary Policy

Certain that the average inflation in 1982 will be at most 80 percent with the price index ending the year with a rise of nearly 70 percent, the government will still have to adopt various measures to make possible a balanced monetary program. In that respect, the interests rates of subsidized credit will have to be raised and some programs of dubious priority will have to be cut. The reduction of incentives will also allow the strengthening of the fiscal budget with resources to be transferred to the monetary budget.

The indecision by the government in processing changes in wage policies this year could soon have a very high cost. Under the present economic situation of the country, instead of earning an additional 10 percent over the net per capita income, a considerable number of workers, who receive from one to three minimum wages, are losing their jobs, while the contract income workers, who receive more than 11 minimum wages and who could guarantee an increase in consumption, are having their buying power reduced.

The combination of a wage policy, the excessive rise in interest rates and the reduction in the payment periods for credit sales, aggravated even more by the fear of unemployment and the encouragement for savings, are sufficient factors for maintaining consumption, sales and production at a very low ebb. Join to this combination a reduction of government spending and the country will continue to discuss a Gross Domestic Production of around zero next year.

Gross Domestic Product

Those who debate on the growth of the GDP should note that regardless of the fact that the result will oscillate around zero, existing unemployment is not going to change, prices could maintain an undesirable tendency to rise and companies will continue without any prospects for sales and production that will allow them to plan even in the short term. It is a matter, therefore, of changing the focus of discussion to the subject of the growth of the country in 1982 and the measures that must still be adopted at the end of this year to reverse the situation.

The country had its growth determined by the balance of payments and the foreign debt this year. Next year those restrictions will not have disappeared but certainly the sacrifice of 1981 will make possible some easing, a space in which to grow and decrease unemployment. Since in an economy a considerable time passes between the time decisions are made and their results appear, the adoption of measures that will guarantee growth next year is more important than a discussion of the recession of this year.

Exporters Will Have 750 Billion Cruzeiros in 82

Brasilia--The government has already begun to establish the main parameters of the 1982 economic policy. It is going to allocate 750 billion cruzeiros--compared to 300 billion in 1981--an increase of 150 percent, for the financing of programs advocated by Resolution No 674 (production of manufactured goods for export).

This first decision in one of the most important items of the monetary budget--whose general lines will be approved at the end of the year by the National Monetary Council--clearly indicates that once more the government will choose an increase in exports and the subsequent strengthening of the trade balance, a path which Minister of Finance Ernane Galveas believes the most suitable for resolving the balance of payments problem.

Solid Support

This past week Secretary General of the Ministry of Finance Carlos Viacava reported that next year the government will maintain the same policy maintained in 1981 of giving solid support to the sectors interested in exporting their production. In this respect the director of Cacex, Benedito Moreira, has already begun to sign export contracts for 1982.

Government experts believe that the mechanisms of Resolution No 674--exporters are "penalized" if they do not comply with their export pledge--are an important victory for the support of sales abroad next year. The reason being that credit will generally continue to be restricted in the 1982 monetary budget and sectoral contracts are a way of preventing bottlenecks in this important area.

At a lunch with newsmen last Wednesday, Minister Ernane Galvaes reaffirmed that all the strategy of the government for resolving the balance of payments problems is concentrated in the good execution and results obtained from the trade balance. In an exercise of arithmetic and optimism, he said that the problems of obtaining resources can be resolved in 1985.

According to his reasoning, if Brazil wished to resolve its problems in the foreign area in one year it would have to have a surplus of $8 billion in the trade balance. Since that is not possible, he believes that if in a period of 5 years exports grow at a rate of 15 percent and imports at around 10 percent, the amount of money to be obtained abroad to effect the "rollover" of the foreign debt can be reduced or at least maintained at the same levels.

According to Carlos Viacava, the government expects to conclude all sectoral contracts for export negotiated by CACEX by next November. The secretary general of the Finance Ministry said that the government "is working hard for that," adding that the work by Benedito Moreira began in September and that 1982 is going to begin with guidelines all ready in this area, since in 1981 the agreements were concluded during the fiscal year.

Up to now agreements with the petrochemical sector, which will go from $140 million in 1980 to $1.5 billion in 1982, after having reached $600 million this year, have been signed. An agreement was concluded with the SINDIPECAS [National Automobile Parts Industry Union] for exporting $250 million in parts and another, also for $250 million, was signed with the fishing sector.

In this area of subsidized export credits, the government favors exporters with advantages. Up to now financing under Resolution No 674--which is granted in ranges which run from 12 to 40 percent of the value of production--was given on the basis of the nature of the exports made by a certain sector in the previous fiscal year. Now, however, financing will be calculated on the basis of the commitment to export.

BRIEFS

CRITICISM OF U.S. POLICY ON NICARAGUA--Condemning the foreign policy of the United States Deputy (Jose Freisa) criticized U.S. Government support for the junta governing El Salvador against the true interests of the Salvadoran people. The opposition deputy also condemned the U.S. policy toward Nicaragua, criticizing as ridiculous the declaration of President Ronald Reagan that Nicaragua is threatening the United States. The new colonialist orientation being imparted by Reagan to U.S. relations with the rest of the world was analyzed in depth by the opposition deputy who, at the same time, recalled that the U.S. Government never took a position against the regime of Dictator Somoza in Nicaragua. He stated that the American people do not support the Reagan foreign policy and called upon the Brazilia government to adopt well-defined and independent positions in favor of Third World countries. GALVEAS ON CAR SALES TO IRAQ--Baghdad--Wolfang Sauer, president of Volkswagen do Brasil, will meet today with Iraqi Minister of Industry and Minerals Tahir al-Tawfiq in an attempt to increase the Volkswagen do Brasil's chances to be chosen to participate in the installation of an automobile industry in Iraq and also to agree on the sale of 10,000 to 20,000 automobiles next year. More optimistic, Finance Minister Ernane Galveas feels that Volkswagen will succeed in signing a contract for the sale of 40,000 vehicles for the Iraqi market. According to Bernhard Eland, director of the Brazilian company's sales and marketing department, the chances to export to Iraq are "positive" due to the good relations at government levels. Sauer will present a new proposal today for the sale of VW cars at the international bidding opened by the Iraqi Government. The Iraqi Government plans to purchase 106,000 automobiles, 5,000 taxis and 2,000 special cars for physically disabled persons, total $450 million. ANTARCTIC COMMISSION CREATED--Brasilia (O GLOBO)--Itamaraty spokesman reported yesterday that the Brazilian Government is organizing an inter-ministerial commission to coordinate Brazil's activities in the Antarctic. In addition to Itamaraty, the commission will be made up of the Navy Ministry, the National Security Council and of the Communications Ministry. Their specific mission will be to study the conditions for establishing an advanced post in the Antarctic region. They will also plan scientific expeditions and geographical, ecological and mineral research. Itamarty will be charged with preparing the Brazilian policy for the region, paying special attention to the practical activities so that they are strictly in compliance with the commitments assumed by Brazil on signing the Antarctic Treaty in 1975. AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF CARLOS FRANQUI, CASTRO'S RIGHT-HAND MAN DURING REVOLUTION

Rome LA REPUBBLICA in Italian 28 May 81 pp 18-19

[Text] Carlos Franqui, son of the poor working class and man of the rebellious spirit, matured politically in the Cuba of the fifties. During that era the island was governed de facto by foreign powers, and amongst its inhabitants--descendants of the many races which have occupied it during the course of the centuries--the restlessness and the malcontent became ever more lively. Franqui grew up, therefore, in what were known as the years of Fidel Castro--that modern nationalist that the malcontent and the restlessness made use of, even to the point of casting him in the role of his natural vocation of leadership.

What happened first in Cuba was the attainment of full sovereignty--and Fidel succeeded in getting rid of the resident tyrant (who, among other things, was an easy pawn for foreign bureaucracies) and in installing a revolutionary government. Even right up until victory he succeeded in uniting the many diverse spirits of the rebellion--an ability, however, that Carlos Franqui, in his latest book, "My Years With Fidel" (SugarCo, Milan, 223 pp, 7500 lire) is not disposed to acknowledge because Franqui, who is a former communist, would have preferred that the coexistence among those various "spirits" be achieved only after all of the communists had abandoned it as he had done and after the USSR had retreated into isolationism.

This desire of his could not help but influence the "objectivity" of his testimonial. As he realized soon after the victorious conclusion of the struggle, the choice for Cuba was, in reality, only one--either Fidel Castro was to be successful in convincing the Americans that independence did not necessarily mean communism, or communism needed to be successful in itself and defend itself with great determination from its very close enemy. Abetted by some and assailed by others, Castro tried to pursuade the United States, either by benevolence or by resorting to blackmail, as Franqui's description of Castro's trip to New York in 1960 makes clear. But the miracle never came, and everything that came afterwords was the logical consequence of that missing miracle. To realize this it is sufficient to keep in mind the facts in question: on the one hand, Soviet policy that is intertwined with the contemporary Third World liberation movements; and, on the other, the personality of the Castro brothers.

But Franqui does not seem to want to take into account this "globality" of facts, almost afraid to reduce the story to a sort of game of chess. Like Mao, he seems to prefer ping-pong to the strategies of Capablanca (who parenthetically, was Cuban). The result is a book for the "initiated," a very personal memory of the revolution. From this point of view it is a book of profound interest.

"My Years With Fidel" is, as the title indicates, an autobiography. The characters that we meet in it are also, by chance, historical characters. This does not imply that they are always great characters, but if all of those that Franqui has portrayed had been in such an advantageous positon (i.e., near the leaders) and had lived through an event as significant as that of Cuba in the sixties, and had later described it with as much authentic sincerity and free spirit, many areas of the "socialist camp" would come out of the darkness in which they are found, and far less conflicting reports concerning the "revolutionary" governments would be born instead of the schizophrenic separateness inherent in those that exist today.

Franqui documents, without reticence, the burning issues of the new Cuban course—which is common knowledge to the history of the world. Among other things, one cannot see why we should be shocked by the horror of learning that Raul Castro has a "happy trigger finger" in a country where shortly before, Batista massacred his own opponents by torturing them whereas Fidel's brother Raul, who bursts out crying upon his first meeting with a group of victorious party leaders, was commander of the Armed Forces. In Cuba, says Franqui, among other things, there is no torture even though it tries to subdue its adversaries with psychological pressures (on individuals) and military pressure (on the masses).

The most important thing in this book is that it shows the faces of the leaders in their true personality, outside of legend and myth. The inevitable political limits of each of the individuals therefore come to light. And, above all, the author comes outside of himself much like a less-clamorous Guevara, who in his quixotic good soul, fights duels in the shade of small tropical gulags, and, at times, as in that hallucinatory instance in the palace room, when after a night of festivities he is up against the ropes with everything against him, except for Fidel. On the other hand, what does not come out because of the subjective slant of the book, is all of the suffering that the island has endured from the initial libertarianism of the revolution to its alignment on the Soviet model. Thus the reader could think of a leveling of Cuban intelligence, which is not true, as evidenced by the political battles that continue behind the scenes in Cuba while Franqui lives freely in that world that identifies itself with Western Europe and with North America. Here the former communist does not play only the role of the "unfrocked priest" like many other former communists, but takes action, and is not willing to confine himself to putting into writing the usual distant memory of the exile and produces pages that are hail and storm.

It is above all, a valuable contribution to the understanding of the personality of Fidel Castro--a complex personality, more befitting a politician who is more "Machivallian" than Leninist, more of the "loner" than godfather, more Bonapartist than socialist, a man whose astuteness recalls that of the peasant landowner squeezed between the rich landowners who seeks to eke out the most for himself and for his large family in spite of his poor financial status, a man who is definitely the founder of a paternalistic authoritarianism that is very close to Gaullism and that resorts to Leninism only when all of the other means have been exhausted.

In this way Castro can still continue to inspire Latin American movements such as the Sandinists or the Salvadoran or Guatemalan left, and in such a way becomes a partner (not a servant) of Brezhnev in geopolitical undertakings far greater than the dimensions of the island in which he was born would have permitted.

FORMER DEFENSE FORCE MEMBERS IN ANTIGOVERNMENT RALLY

Bridgetown ADVOCATE-NEWS in English 28 Aug 81 p 3

[Text]

ROSEAU, Dominica, Thursday, (CANA) — Former members of the now disbanded Dominica Defence Force demonstrated peacefully outside Government Headquarters here yesterday in an effort to force Government to pay what they claim is outstanding money owed to them.

But the Government has dismissed the claim stating that as far as it was aware, the ex-soldiers were paid all monies owed to them.

The Dominica Government disbanded the 99-strong Defence Force after local authorities had arrested and charged its commander, Major Frederick Newton and his second in command, Captain Malcolm Reid, as well as some junior officers for conspiring to topple the Eugenia Charles Administration by force of arms.

The preliminary inquiry into the charges against them is due to begin here on October 12.

The soldiers, represented by the National Workers Union, carried placards some which read "pay us our money". They claim that when the force was disbanded in April, accumulated leave, owed to them during their term of service was paid to them, but in some cases, remuneration for a number of days was held back without explanation.

They added that efforts to meet with Government officials for an explanation had so far proved fruitless.

General secretary of the union, Josephine Dublin, told reporters that the union was also protesting what she described "as a breach of contract on the part of the Government".

Miss Dublin said that upon their appointment, the soldiers had been awarded a 12-year contract with government which was breached when it disbanded the force. Therefore, the union was now asking for redundancy payment.

However, the Government said that it was not aware of any 12-year contract and pointed out that further legislation concerning the Defence Force did not make provisions for redundancy payments.

The Government Information Service (GIS) said that the administration did not know what the demonstration was about and it could not recognise the union since the soldiers, while members of the force, were not entitled to union representation.

The GIS said if there were short payments in some cases, the individuals concerned should go through the normal channels and write the appropriate authorities pointing out the discrepancy.

"There has been no direct communication from any soldier in this regard", the GIS declared.

PAPER RUNS EXCERPTS OF PREVIOUSLY REPORTED ANTI-PRG EDITORIAL

[Editorial Report] In Roseau THE NEW CHRONICLE in English of 3 October 1981, on pages 1 and 16, carries extensive excerpts of the editorial calling on Grenadian leader Maurice Bishop to grant freedom to the people of the island that appeared in other Caribbean sources, as reported in JPRS 79456 LATIN AMERICA REPORT No 2401 of 16 November 1981, pages 39-44. THE NEW CHRONICLE item, under the heading "Free Grenada, Maurice Bishop," is not specifically identified as an editorial; it closes with this paragraph: "The SUNDAY ADVOCATE NEWS joins in calling on Mr Bishop and his colleagues to give freedom to the people of Grenada!"

BANANA INDUSTRY STUDY--Roseau Dominica, Thursday (CANA)--Dominica's government has appointed a nine-member Task Force to examine the operations of the Dominica Banana Growers Association (DBGA) and the performance of the banana industry. The Task Force will review all aspects of the Associations' operations from January 1, 1978 to July 31, 1981, and evaluate the performance of the banana industry over the same period. Other terms of reference given to the Task Force include a study of the Associations debts, an examination of all managerial, technical and clerical requirements of the industry, and an investigation into all other aspects which will determine the success of the industry. The Committee is expected to submit its report to government by the end of next month, and is also due to make recommendations for the improvement of the industry and the association. According to the Chairman of the Task Force, Dr Bernard Yankey of the Barbados-based Caribbean Development Bank, the Force is not a commission of enquiry but rather an exercise for the future development of the banana industry. 'DREAD' ROLE IN COUP ATTEMPT--A leader of the dread cult has testified that Malcolm Reid had asked him to organize a fighting force of dreads to help overthrow the Dominica Government. Algernon Maffei, at a preliminary hearing this week, said that Reid asked him to get a force to seize the Police Headquarters, local telecommunications office and all amateur radio operators as soon as a force composed of mercenaries landed in Dominica. Maffei said that his reward would be that he would become second in command of the army under Reid if the coup succeeded. Maffei was testifying at a hearing into conspiracy charges against the nine detainees. Among the twenty witnesses who have been called to give evidence are two Federal Bureau of Investigation agents who gave detailed information of the events leading to the arrest of the mercenaries in New Orleans. Immigration officers from Antigua, hand-writing experts and Dominica's Police Commissioner Oliver Phillip also gave evidence. Mr Phillip said that the intercepted notice was identified by Fred Newton, the former Defence Force Commander, as having been written by Malcolm Reid. DOUGLAS BANANA 'FOLLY'--The Minister of Agriculture disclosed to the nation in the House of Assembly on Monday last that over 8 million dollars debts were incurred in relation to the Banana Association in 1979 alone. This was a result of a promise made by the then Minister of Finance and Agriculture Michael Douglas to help the Dominica Banana Growers Association to meet its cash shortfalls--

a promise which he did not fulfill. As a result of Michael Douglas's folly DBGA has to pay $45,000 monthly to the bank and this is the main contributor to the present critical financial situation of the DBGA. In contrast the present government has injected no less than $5,300,000 into the Banana Association but the farmers will not have to repay one cent of this amount. The debts contracted by the Association under Mr Douglas' direction was at a time when government had received funds from STABEX for injection into the industry in the tune of some 13 million dollars. This money having been frittered away the DBGA has now to pay back the debts created by Michael Douglas. [Text] [Roseau THE NEW CHRONICLE in English 17 Oct 81 p 1]

JOHN TRIAL--Patrick John has been remanded in custody pending a High Court trial scheduled for next year. John, along with Malcolm Reid, Dennis Joseph and Julian David, were ordered to stand trial by Magistrate Charles Williams on Friday at the end of a week-long Preliminary Inquiry into charges that they plotted a military take-over of the Dominica Government. Three of the accused were freed because of lack of sufficient evidence. They are former Defence Force commander Frederick Newton, Howell Piper and Ronnie Roberts. Two other men, Walton John Phillip and Hubert John Charles were freed on the coup charges but were remanded in custody on other matters. [Text] [Roseau THE NEW CHRONICLE in English 17 Oct 81 p 1]

MINISTER GARCIA: KILLINGS EXCEED HUMAN TOLERANCE

San Salvador EL MUNDO in Spanish 27 Aug 81 p 3

[Text] The minister of defense and chief of the general staff of the armed forces yesterday described as "a brutality" and "acts which exceed the limits of human tolerance" the assassinations of numerous civilians during the last few weeks in the Western Region of the country, particularly in Santa Ana and Sonsonate.

"We are concerned over these assassinations and we condemn them because they are acts which lie outside the limits of human tolerance, very difficult to control immediately," added the minister, Col Jose Guillermo Garcia, in a press conference. He announced that a full investigation has been ordered to punish the perpetrators. "We condemn those who promote and carry out these horrendous crimes and we will punish them, whoever they are," he added.

When he was questioned by a correspondent on a political detente which the government junta is considering, to create climate of tranquillity in the country, Col Garcia said that certainly a national detente is being considered "to carry out a dialogue with sectors such as the Church, the unions, political parties, business, etc., on condition that it be on a constructive, civic and nationalistic basis, for peace and tranquillity to return to the country." He indicated that "the armed forces consider that a dialogue is necessary to create a suitable climate for the upcoming elections" and he indicated that "for this reason, subversives are carrying out acts to prevent the elections."

He emphasized that the subversive organizations are trying desperately to keep the international news focused on the violence in our country and that in view of this situation the armed forces are favoring honest elections so that the people can choose the leaders it wants. He emphasized that the "armed forces have no commitments to anyone."

In answer to questions from the journalists, the minister of defense confirmed that the person responsible for the dynamite attack on the National Police was Sgt Jacinto Mendoza, who had infiltrated that security organization.

He said that unfortunately in a situation such as the one in El Salvador, there are bound to be many traitors to the country and the armed forces. When he was asked again if he believed it was possible that others had infiltrated the security organization and the army, he responded that if there had been any, there were no more.

Finally, he stated that the night before last the newspaperwoman Maria Lopez Vigil, of Spanish nationality and Cuban origin, was arrested in a police search on the Colonia Jardines de Guadalupe. She is being detained for having been found in possession of subversive material, he said.

Also, he reported that in general terms the casualties of the armed forces amount to 1,300 and he concluded by affirming that in Metapan they are carrying out a sweeping antisubversive operation.

ARMY DISCOVERS ILLEGAL GUERRILLA ARMS

San Salvador EL MUNDO in Spanish 20 Aug 81 p 3

[Text] Great quantities of arms and other war equipment secretly introduced into the country for the use of the guerrilla organizations were discovered by special troops of the armed forces in a rural sector of Amayo canton, while the Army was carrying out a patrol between this jurisdiction and the Las Ventanas and El Jicaron cantons, in El Paisnal, department of San Salvador.

The combined troops made the discovery after sustaining a fierce battle with the extremists the day before yesterday in the morning. It was noted that after the confrontations which took place in the area of the three cantons there several subversives were found dead who could not be identified because they were not carrying any documents or other objects which would facilitate these formalities. No arms were found with the corpses.

Later, it was observed that the bulk of the guerrillas were fleeing, seeking the same route, toward Amayo canton and the army prepared to pursue them. After the troops surrounded them, they discovered arms, munitions of various calibers and other war materiel, as well as propaganda from the FPL [Popular Liberation Forces], medicine to be used in campaigns, etc; all stored in the camp.

The Armed Forces Press Committee [COPREFA] reported that the arms and other war equipment were moved to the General Staff of the Armed Forces, from whence it will be sent to be used by the army in the struggle against subversion.

COPREFA reported also that in the area of the Los Pocitos settlement, Los Aposentos canton, Tejutla jurisdiction, Chalatenango, well-armed extremist elements raided this rural community, attacking passersby, vehicles and dwellings of humble peasants. Here, they said, they attacked Jose Maria Valle Pleitez and Gilberto Hernandez, who were driving a pick-up van with license plates P-128-285, property of the Lourdes bakery, of this capital and which was distributing bread in the area. They stole from the occupants of the vehicle 500 colons in cash, 100 colons in goods, personal clothing, etc.

EDITORIAL SCORES CRITICISM OF GRENADA IN TRINIDAD PAPER

St Georges FREE WEST INDIAN in English 1 Aug 81 p 4

[Editorial]

[Text] As the reactionary unfree press in the region continues its unceasing, coordinated and ferocious propaganda attacks against the Grenada Revolution the latest blast comes from the TRINIDAD EXPRESS newspaper.

In an editorial earlier this week, Trinidad's largest daily which is sold in Grenada called on regional governments to isolate the PRG because of alleged human rights abuses. The identical call was made four weeks ago by the EXPRESS' reactionary ally, the notorious Jamaica GLEANER.

However, one prominent regional newspaper, the CARIBBEAN CONTACT, has refused to join this unrelenting anti-PRG propaganda campaign orchestrated by the CIA and the US State Department and we applaud our sister publication for its firm and principled stand.

The TRINIDAD GUARDIAN, another newspaper that has been consistently hostile to the Grenada Revolution, has captured the ignoble prize for editorial hypocricy and double standard in its handling of Grenadian issues.

We wish to draw our readers' attention to excerpts from two Guardian editorials: the first dated February 24, 1974, a time in recent Grenadian history when many thousands of our countrymen and women were in the streets demonstrating daily against the dictator Gairy's repressive rule, and when Grenadians and freedom-loving people outside Grenada were calling for his resignation and the other dated February 16, 1981, a time when the patriotic people of Free Grenada were again in the streets, but this time cleaning up their communities in preparation for the second festival of their popular Revolution.

PRINCIPLE OF GOVERNMENT ACCOUNTABILITY STRESSED BY COARD

St Georges FREE WEST INDIAN in English 17 Oct 81 p 5

[Text] "The principle of accountability is fundamental in building a new people's democracy."

So said Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance Bernard Coard, at last Monday's Central Zonal Council meeting at the St. George's Anglican School.

Explaining that everything which affects the people must be reported to them, so that they can have a direct say in what goes on, Bro Coard stated that nearly half the adult population attends meetings on an organised basis every week.

The tremendous growth and development of mass organisations and the rise of popular participation in the numerous meetings of the masses reflect the genuine grassroots democracy in Grenada now, Bro Coard said, and this is "terrifying those lackeys of imperialism in the region."

These meetings started as eight parish councils. They were reorganised into 18 zones to cater for the great influx of people that have been stepping forward daily to indicate their willingness to participate.

These will be soon expanded to accommodate other farmers, workers, women, youths and villagers, who want to be part and parcel of these direct forums to express themselves. "There are no bystanders, everybody is part of the Revolution," endorsed Bro Coard.

In response to the PRG's call for total participation everyone in nation-building, more and more people are becoming increasingly involved, he pointed out.

In the past four months, the National Women's Organisation (NWO), has gone from having 59 groups to 129 groups, with an increased membership of over 3,200 women.

Likewise, the National Youth Organisation (NYO), in the same four months has gone from 64 to 116 groups, with over 3,000 members while the Young Pioneers Movement now has 67 groups.

All this, Bro. Coard explained, demonstrates the interest and enthusiasm of these organisations in filling their ranks with patriotic Grenadians.

Even the farmers are now moving full speed ahead, to have their annual general meeting soon, he reminded.

"A lot of new faces are joining the People's Revolutionary Militia," Bro Coard added. Hard mobilisational work which ensured the "most incredible turnout of our people in the face of imperialists aggression in the last "Heroes of the Homeland Manoeuvres," is now ensuring that the militia is moving from strength to strength."

"Grenada is being totally transformed through infrastructural development in all areas," he added. Over the last two-and-a-half years, the PRG has raised $300 million in signed agreements geared towards development.

The Eastern Main Road rehabilitation project was supposed to have taken two years to be completed. Now it will take only one year because of the progress made.

Meanwhile, water supply to the people has increased from four million gallons per day to six million. Overall eight-and-a-half million is needed to supply the whole of Grenada.

The Central Water Commission (CWC) at the same time has in its budget, money organised to pay the Ministry of Communications and Works to repair the roads damaged during the process of laying new pipelines.

Mentioning that improvements are on the way in the telephone and electricity services, Bro Coard said assistance from the German Democratic Republic is forthcoming for the whole country, including Carriacou and Petit Martinique.

Electricity, which needs a two-phase solution, was also looked at. The first short-term solution means installing a new generator, which will take two years to implement.

The second solution will take five or six years--the developing of hydro-electricity is the system best suited to Grenada.

At present, "improvements are being made to enlarge our port to accept more boats," he stated.

"We have suffered many natural disasters, but despite many limitations, plenty benefits are being brought to our people."

FINANCE MINISTRY DEPUTY REVIEWS NEW JEWEL ACHIEVEMENTS

Bridgetown ADVOCATE-NEWS in English 10 Oct 81 p 3

[Article by Vern Darville: "Grenada: A Hard Road But Positive Returns"]

[Text] NASSAU, Bahamas, Friday (CANA) — It has been a hard road to travel, with numerous challenges and problems, but exciting and with positive returns which are helping to transform the political, social and economic life of the people of Grenada.

That's the assessment by Deputy Finance Minister Lyden Ramdhanny of developments in the spice island since the Opposition New Jewel Movement led by Maurice Bishop resorted to arms to topple the flamboyant dictatorial Prime Minister, Sir Eric Gairy in March 1979.

Ramdhanny painted an impressive picture of Grenada today, as seen through the eyes of the People's Revolutionary Government, during an interview while he was visiting Nassau recently.

He said that despite pressures from the United States, his country had made significant forward strides in its efforts to provide the 110 000 population with much-needed social services.

Things were still not ideal...indeed, far from what the government would like on the social and economic front..but the gains were real, he declared.

Mr. Ramdhanny, pointing to difficulties in the economy, said that the Southern Caribbean nation has found itself with falling world prices on agricultural crops such as cocoa, nutmeg and bananas, coupled with the fact that the pound sterling has weakened against the dollar.

"This has resulted in a net reduction in our foreign exchange earnings. At the same time, however, the cost of our imports from the developed countries has been increasing tremendously, as every other Caribbean country has been experiencing. So we do have a real problem."

Elaborating on inroads made into the problem of inadequate social benefit, he added — "we now have for the first time in Grenada total free secondary education, and total free health care — you only pay for health care when you go to a private doctor. Once you're attended to in our clinics or in hospitals, all of this is totally free.

"We have introduced into Grenada something like seven dental clinics. Prior to the revolution, we had one dental clinic. The number of doctors available to our people has increased by 12 since the revolution and we're still in the process of getting additional doctors.

"We're introducing a programme of primary health care to our people. This we feel is very important.

"In the area of education, in 1978 Grenada had something like three scholarships (to foreign universities for its students can now go to UWI at subsidised rates.

"We have been making a great attempt to improve the quality of our teachers and we have an in-service programme on an ongoing basis.

"We're in the process of constructing three new primary schools, and this year we've been able to put aside some $60 000 — it may sound small — to assist the poor parents who are unable to pay for school books and uniforms.

"In the area of infrastructure, there's been a massive project, the construction of our international airport. For years hoteliers and nearly everyone who has come to Grenada and who has studied the tourism potential of Grenada has said that the only way to develop the students).

In 1979 after the revolution, we had 109 scholarships for students.

"Prior to the revolution, all Grenadians had to pay the commercial cost of going to the University of the West Indies (UWI) because the previous government could not pay its commitment to the UWI. We paid up that amount and our tourism industry is by the construction of an international airport.

"This is now underway with the assistance of friendly countries and we'll be completing the airport by 1983 with 9,000-foot runway, the international standard. However, by November, 1982, we hope to commence operations using the airport of 5,000 feet with nightlanding facilities.

He said Grenada's experience and surveys indicated that many people in North America were keen to visit Grenada, "but are not prepared to go through the hassle of having to overnight in other countries, if we can provide an international airport and have direct flights, there's no question that our foreign exchange earnings from tourism will greatly increase.

"Also the airport will assist us in exports of our agro-industry products and fresh fruits to markets in North America and the United Kingdom.

"We have been able to set up agroindustrial plants for canning juices, jellies, jams, nectars, using local fruits and we've actually started to export.

In housing there is a programme for providing low-cost units and a plant is to be established for producing prefab houses.

"We've been giving them out on a long-term repayment period. One of the ambitions of the revolution was to provide adequate housing to our people.

"When we took over, agriculture was totally disorganised. We've been able to turn that around. We're putting together a five-year agricultural plan because we see agriculture as the main part of the Grenada economy. Certainly tourism would also greatly contribute to the economy, but agriculture is the main stay."

REPORT ON 'COORDINATED' ANTI-GRENADA EDITORIALS

St Georges FREE WEST INDIAN in English 3 Oct 81 pp 1, 4

[Text] The coordinated media attacks against the Grenada Revolution have finally provoked response from the working journalists themselves.

In an unprecedented move, journalists from all the media houses in Trinidad, met last Tuesday to discuss the appearance of joint identical editorials published in last Sunday's editions of both daily newspapers, the TRINIDAD GUARDIAN and the EXPRESS.

The editorial, which also appeared in the SUNDAY SUN of Barbados, the GLEANER of Jamaica and throughout the Caribbean said: "Today all major newspapers, radio and television stations in the English-speaking Caribbean (with the exception of Guyana, which has not been invited for obvious reasons) join in a common expression of condemnation of the behaviour of the People's Revolutionary Government."

The journalists decided that the editorials, which called on the PRG to "hold elections," "stop human rights abuse" and "free Grenada," originated from the Caribbean Publishers and Broadcasters Association (CPBA), an offshoot of the CIA founded Inter-American Press Association (IAPA).

The Trinidad meeting, held at a Port of Spain restaurant, the first independent collective meeting of journalists there in over five years, was chaired by EXPRESS reporter Jeff Hacket.

It attracted representatives from the EXPRESS and its sister paper the SUN; the TRINIDAD GUARDIAN and its sister EVENING NEWS; NBS radio 610; Trinidad and Tobago Television (TTT); THE TRINIDAD AND TOBAGO Review; the BOMB, CHALLENGE, and CATHOLIC NEWS.

The journalists appointed a seven-man steering committee to prepare resolutions on the editorials appearance and to investigate further the reports of alleged abuse of press freedom and human rights in Grenada.

A report and pictures of the meeting were published in the EXPRESS but the GUARDIAN refused to publish those submitted by its own staff members.

This has added fuel to the fires of journalistic discontent in Trinidad and increased the feeling that news is being controlled by the directors and editors who are linked with CPBA.

CPBA is an association of the region's wealthy press barons, who have open ties with the United States' International Communications Agency (USICA), which acts as CIA propaganda conduit.

In May this year, at a USICA-sponsored conference in Washington, CPBA editors were briefed on "how to handle Grenada" in the news, while being wined and dined at US State Department expense.

Directly after this, the clearly organised propaganda onslaught against Grenada multiplied, mainly in CPBA-owned newspapers.

The Media Workers Association of Free Grenada (MWAFG), commented that "this new wave of coordinated press attacks takes place in the context of the Vieques military manoevres, which revealed clear US intentions to invade Grenada. It is not the first, and it won't be the last tactical offensive that US imperialism will mount through its operatives in the region."

MWAFG further observed that "the capitalist media owners and managers of the CPBA have a notorious record for economically exploiting and stifling the views of democratic and progressive media workers in their employ and are hardly a credible body to level judgements on human rights and press freedom."

In a telegram of solidarity with their colleages in Trinidad, MWAFG, which represents approximately 90 per cent of the practising journalists in Grenada, stated:

"As journalists and media workers freely practising our profession in Grenada, we condemn these latest coordinated Caribbean newspaper attacks as blatantly false and dishonest. They represent the narrow views and interests of the media monopolists in the region, who abandon all pretenses of objectivity, when it comes to reporting on the Grenada Revolution."

A similar statement came from the Press Association of Jamaica (PAJ), which protested the attempts by CPBA media magnates to poison the minds of the region's people.

ISLAND COMMUNICATIONS--Saturday, (CANA)--Residents of Grenada's two wards islands--Carriacou and Petti Martinique--will soon benefit from both telephone and electricity services, Finance Minister Bernard Coard has announced. Giving details on the proposed telephone service, Mr Coard said that the People's Revolutionary Government (PRG) had negotiated with East Germany for a telephone system for both islands. He said that the government would be subsidising the telephone system to be installed in Petil Martinique because the service would be uneconomical due to the island's small population. Mr Coard also announced that a number of Grenadians had been sent to East Germany for training to install and operate the system. They are due back home shortly. The Grenadian Deputy Prime Minister said that the installation of the system on the two islands was expected to take over 18 months. He added that Grenada would also be seeking assistance from Cuba on the project. [Text] [Bridgetown SUNDAY ADVOCATE-NEWS in English 11 Oct 81 p 3]

AIRPORT EQUIPMENT--A barge with special equipment for use in filling Hardy Bay on the international airport site at Point Salines, arrived in Grenada this week. Refilling operations are now expected to start within a week, and should be completed by the end of next month. A similar piece of equipment was lost a few months ago when the barge transporting it down here capsized and sank. This cause delay in dredging operations. However, the actual pumping out of unstable material from Hardy Bay was completed early last month and the project is expected to take a big leap forward after the refilling operations are completed. HARNESSING OF USUMACINTA'S HYDRAULIC RESOURCES

[Editorial]

[Text] The presidents of Mexico and Guatemala have already announced their joint decision to postpone the visit of Jose Lopez Portillo to our country, for a summit conference--as they say in the political jargon of the journalists or the journalistic jargon of the politicians--already postponed once before because the Mexican president had other things to do and brought up again recently for the purpose of concluding a treaty on the development of the Usumacinta River by building a hydroelectric plant through cooperation of both countries.

That was the only point on the agenda, apparently previously set, since, when they began to speak again of the visit of President Lopez Portillo, in January 1980, President Lucas Garcia said in Coban--according to information from Eduardo Sam Aldana--"that the utilization of the Usumacinta River to build a gigantic hydroelectric plant is the most important point we will address." A seminar of Mexican and Guatemalan engineers was also held here and the INDE [National Electrification Institute] referred to advanced studies on this project.

As early as 1979, the INDE released a small document, admitting that we cannot count on serious studies--according to our colleague LA NACION--and that when we negotiate on that point there will be no solution other than to accept the Mexican proposals. We recall on this subject the book published in 1957 by Enrique Compan Pulido, a resident of Villa Hermosa, Tabasco, entitled "The Usumacinta River Basin or Mono Sagrado," describing its source with its main tributaries the Negro or Chixoy River, in Huehuetenango and La Pasion River, in Alta Verapaz. In 1971, Virgilio Viscovich published in EL IMPARCIAL a brief "Monograph and Description of the Positive Basin of the Usumacinta River," and he refers to various studies on the location of the aquiferous resources of the region.

In November 1964, the Federal Electrification Commission of Mexico told the Mexican Commission of the International Commission on Borders and Waters with Guatemala that for the development of the program of planning and study--for the purpose of the exploitation of the hydroelectric resources which exist in the southeastern part of Mexico--they wished to begin talks with the Guatemalan experts, so as to implement the studies mentioned above with those which Guatemala is carrying out. The talks took place in 1965, as simple preliminaries, since it was decided that the experts from both countries would proceed to study the system of hydrological and climatological stations which are indispensable for the understanding of the hydrological system, in their share of the basins of the international rivers.

Before, a national plan for irrigation and drainage in areas of San Marcos, Huehuetenango, Quiche, Baja Verapaz, Alta Verapaz and El Peten had been drawn up; it was presented by the Department of Hydraulic Resources of the Ministry of Agriculture and accepted with programs which were to begin in 1965 and be implemented within a decade, their main purpose being the production of food; bearing in mind estimates on the impact which our country's demographic growth would have around 1990. Decree-Law 354 declared as a reserve for the production of food the land adjacent to the basins formed by the Usumacinta River, entrusting the settlement and rational exploitation to several organizations, among them the INTA [National Agrarian Transformation Institute] and the FYDEP [National Agency for the Economic Promotion and Development of El Peten], this development program having been approved by the National Council for Economic Planning.

In January 1966, when he was vice president of the republic, Clemente Marroquin Rojas published in his daily newspaper LA HORA a series of articles in which he denounced the leniency on the part of Guatemala in the consideration and study of the Mexican projects, to the point of having shelved a report by engineer Bendix in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs--transcribing data from the Mexican engineer Armando Trueba--on the location of one or several dams to exploit the waters of the Usumacinta and several elevations, as well as the harmful consequences to Guatemalan territory, since the flooding would cause the loss of more than 20,000 km^2 of fertile land in El Peten and Verapaz.

EL IMPARCIAL reported the charge, that a hydroelectric plant is already being built on Mexican territory, on the banks of the Usumacinta, without there having been a previous agreement with Guatemala, as the Ministries of Foreign Affairs and Communications and Public Works reported; but there was a lack of full and explicit information from the government, especially because of the upcoming visit to Mexico--precisely when it was about to take place--by the president of Guatemala, Julio Cesar Mendez Montenegro. "The worse that could happen," said EL IMPARCIAL, "is to keep quiet, or to attribute intentions other than the defense of the national interests... the accusation must be answered in indubitable, absolute, precise terms, without leaving any room for doubt... A special executive committee could carry out the investigation in record time and give an account of its work to public opinion."

In June 1970, the journalist Clemente Marroquin Rojas insisted: "they have finally noticed what I have been saying," referring to the comments in the daily newspaper LA NACION--mentioned above--on watching out for the country's interests, seeing that in Mexico the Usumacinta project was already very advanced. More recently, in January 1980, the engineer Romeo Samayoa observed that, in return for a few kilowatts of energy, "the best agricultural land and all its resources would be flooded; Peten would lose a third of its territory"; he believed likewise that "the Mexican technicians will attempt it, without concern for the damages incurred by Guatemala and we must be very cautious in requesting--in this case--a share of the energy which is being generated equal to the damages"; he was thinking mainly of the rural population which would be affected, aside from "other types of compensation for flooded lands."

SENIOR OFFICIAL COMMENTS ON CARIBBEAN BASIN INITIATIVE

Georgetown GUYANA CHRONICLE in English 21 Oct 81 pp 12-13

[Text] The Caribbean Basin Initiative [CBI] could help reactivate the Caribbean economy but its private sector orientation has some serious limitations, a senior government official said.

"Basically a Caribbean Basin Initiative based on the socio-economic aspirations and wishes of the Caribbean peoples, could be a useful contributory tool with which to activate the Caribbean economy," he explained.

But he added: "The private sector orientation of the CBI has some serious limitations inasmuch as neither the US government nor any other government of the group could direct its private sector on external investment policies."

He stressed that because the lack of adequate physical and institutional infrastructure had often proved a considerable disincentive to foreign private investment decision-making, private investemtn "could hardly be predictable or planned for with the reasonable statistical precision which the discipline of planning demands."

Referring to Guyana's own plans to attract foreign investment for its multi-million-dollar hydro power aluminium complex, he contended that foreign private investment "could be a bonus if intelligently sought and atracted, such as Guyana is now attempting to do for the complex."

Meanwhile, commenting on recent talks on the CBI in Georgetown between local officials and a US delegation led by ambassador Robert Ryan, the senior government official explained that the meeting was held in a very frank and cordial atmosphere and proceeded against the stated background of a common Caricom approach.

He said the Guyana delegation traded insights into national policies and ambitions in order to inform the opinions of the visitors.

"The need for the Group of Four (the USA, Canada, Mexico and Venezuela) to coordinate their thinking and programme was also pointed out," he explained.

The Caribbean Basin Initiative was launched in the Bahamas earlier this year. Prior to the October 13 meeting in Georgetown, there were two meetings at which common positions by the Caricom countries were hammered out.

On the first occasion--September 4-5--Caricom Foreign Ministers met in Kingston, Jamaica, and drew up a set of cardinal principles which they felt should inform any action plan for the region.

In keeping with these principles, the plan should be open to all territories of the region, it should respect the sovereignty of states and the integrity of regional institutions and it should be non-ideological and nonmilitary.

It was also agreed that private investment has an important role to play in the region. It was stressed, however, that there was need for substantial flows of government-to-government assistance to create the necessary physical and other infrastructures conducive to private capital flows.

In addition, a time table for action--including the creation of a Caricom technical group--was worked out and it is felt that in order to be effective, the regional programme should lead up to a meeting between ministers of the sponsoring Group of Four and of the Caribbean Basin.

On the second occasion--on September 8--officials of Caricom countries met with officials of the other Caribbean countries as well as with officials of the Group of Four at Santo Domingo where there was a wide exchange of views with no concrete proposals for action resulting--(GNA).

BRIEFS

LABOR ISSUES--The Man Power Citizens' Association has called off the go-slow at the Guyana Electricity Corporation and work is expected to return to normalcy today. The decision to discontinue the 11-day go-slow was taken at a special meeting of the executive council of the MPCA and some time after the union had formed part of a delegation which met the Minister of Energy and Mines, Cde Hubert Jack at his office. Shop stewards and other branch officials attended the special meeting of the MPCA, which took the decision. The move to meet the Minister of Energy and Mines was spearheaded by the General Secretary of the Guyana Trades Union Congress, Cde Joseph Pollydore following a meeting of the executive council of the TUC on Wednesday evening in the boardroom of the Critchlow Labour College. Cde Cleveland Charran, General Secretary of the MPCA said the go-slow at the GEC was implemented to protest against a decision taken by the corporation to charge employees the same rate for electricity as that charged members of the general public. Cde Charran said that yesterday morning the Guyana Trades Union Congress, the MPCA and officials of the GEC met Cde Jack. After the meeting Cde Charran brought his executive council up to date with the decision taken and as a result the members voted to call off the go-slow. Cde Charran said that at the meeting the minister gave the TUC and the MPCA the assurance that the matter would be taken to Cabinet and representatives of the corporation and the union would meet at a later date with a view to resolving the differences. SPAULDING CHARGES WANTED MEN PLAN TERRORISM IN CUBA

Bridgetown SUNDAY ADVOCATE-NEWS in English 11 Oct 81 p 3

[Text] Kingston, Jamaica, (UPI)--National Security Forces Minister Winston Spaulding has charged that the Jamaican Police's most wanted fugitive and other gunmen may be hiding in Cuba, keeping contact with gunmen back home and planning a new wave of terror.

Gunmen of opposing political groups killed more than 500 people during Jamaica's parliamentary campaign last year.

Spaulding told Parliament on Wednesday night that police believe gunman Anthony Brown, most wanted man on the police fugitive list, and other gunmen are hiding in Cuba and keeping contact with the Opposition People's National Party, whose leadership maintains good relations with Cuban officials.

The National Security minister offered no direct proof of his charges, but said police have seized letters and tape recordings indicating the gunmen are in Cuba from the Chairman of the Opposition Party's youth organisation, Paul Burke.

"We do not want to find that any foreign country is aiding and abetting or giving cover or assistance to these subversive activities," Spaulding told Parliament.

Police said the letters and tape seized from Burke as he left an area frequented by Kingston gunmen made references to a country where the fugitives are allegedly hiding, and about a shortage of clothes for Cuban men.

Spaulding, saying the fugitives spoke about a courier service to Jamaica, said the fugitives are obviously in contact with gunmen in the island and plan to unleash violence in Jamaica.

"The letters and tape together show a design of hatred, hostility and malice aimed at this society by misguided and warped criminals who are being given comfort and assistance in Jamaica and out of Jamaica by people committed to the destruction of our system," Spaulding said.

'BARRICADA' WRITER VIEWS SANTA FE DOCUMENT

PA231526 Managua BARRICADA in Spanish 15, 16, 17 Nov 81

[15 Nov 81, p 3]

[Article by Guillermo Rothschuh]

[Text] The weakening of the U.S. economy and the effective loss of its hegemony are the main factors that occasioned a total reorganization of U.S. foreign policy with the intention of recovering its considerably diminished leadership.

The exhaustion of its model for the accumulation of capital is what drives the United States, in a desperate attempt to restore its domination over capitalist countries, to promote a militarist policy of open confrontation.

Under these premises we must analyze the openly interventionist policy of the Reagan administration and the direct military threats recently made against the Nicaraguan revolution. This attitude is among the new principles of the U.S. foreign policy toward Latin America.

This attitude is an updated version of the "Monroe doctrine" in which Latin America has been chosen as the region in which the United States will display its military power to the world and assume the right to impose its designs on us. They are again proclaiming the wornout slogan "America for Americans."

Latin America was the continent chosen during the simplistic analysis of the Reagan advisers. A work group composed of ideologues from the center for strategic and international studies at Georgetown University was tasked with presenting Reagan with a new design for his Latin America policy.

The group of experts was headed by Roger Fontaine and was called the Santa Fe group. This name fits them perfectly since they claim to have begun a crusade to rid the world of communism. This is why, although he is justified to a certain extent, Thomas Farer, chairman of the Inter-American Human Rights Commission (CIDH), said that the group of Reagan advisers has considered the present times, "open hunting season."

Like terrible angels, the Santa Fe group has a precise concept of power: a nation's power rests on its military force. This concept has saturated the Reagan administration to the core.

One of the most prominent members of this group of advisers is James Theberge. U.S. ambassador to Nicaragua during the last years of the Somozist dictatorship, Theberge is an enthusiastic supporter of solving problems from a military point of view and a man whose sleep is disturbed by the specter of communism.

The common dominator among the Santa Fe group experts is their firm support for the use of force and zealous militancy characteristic of the "geopolitical" school which gathers to its bosom the most conservative social scientists in the United States.

One of the outstanding characteristics of the present U.S. policy is its pragmatic character, expressed in its preference for action, as a suitable formula to solve the various problems which now confront the United States. In this respect current U.S. policy is faithful to the tradition and style of the Republican Party's exercise of power, which has always favored hard and prompt solutions rather than the general political solutions favored by the Democratic Party.

In fact, the Santa Fe document (May 1980) is notable because it contains a series of political proposals most of which have been already implemented by the Reagan administration. Since its contents were revealed, most specialists in U.S. foreign policy have said that it was a guideline, similar to the Linowitz report of the Carter administration.

If we read the document critically, we can see that it has really served as an outline on which the Reagan administration has based its foreign policy for Latin America. The document is divided in five parts and has an introduction and a final summary.

The introduction, which is attributed to Ronald F. Docksai, contains a new defense of the Monroe doctrine and criticism of the Carter policy toward Latin America. It refers directly to Guyana, Jamaica (prior to Seaga's coming to power), Grenada and Panama, saying that these countries are aligned with Soviet expansionism. It gives a slanted view of U.S. interventions in Latin America and concludes with brief quotations of two Latin American personalities to support, evaluate and justify their policy toward our continent.

The first part of the Santa Fe document refers to a foreign military threat (from the USSR through Cuba) and it has four basic proposals, through which they try to face it successfully. The four proposals give priority to specific military actions. Some of these military actions have already been carried out and others are in the process of being implemented.

The first proposal demands that "the hemisphere security system be reactivated through support for the Inter-American Reciprocal Assistance Treaty, TIAR, and taking the leadership at the Inter-American Defense Board, LADB, in order to support the long list of resolutions aimed at increasing the hemisphere's security against external and internal threats."

This thesis reflects the geopolitical nature of U.S. strategy and establishes the urgent need to strengthen the military organization under its leadership. This proposal is already being implemented through the recent meeting of military chiefs of Latin American armies held in Washington and chaired by Gen E. C. Meyers. The main speaker at that meeting was Gen [as published] Guillermo Carcia, chief of the Salvadoran army.

The second proposal is a corollary of the first proposal. It notes the need "to encourage agreements of regional security," which immediately reminds us of the notorious Central American Defense Council, CONDECA, and the efforts to reorganize it under the euphemistic title of Northern Triangle, under which the armies of Guatemala, Honduras and El Salvador would unite to oppose the Nicaraguan revolution.

The main objective of this proposal is to involve our countries in the defense of U.S. interests, since they assert that Latin Americans would better understand having their own armed forces act in presumed defense of the hemisphere instead of the United States.

The third proposal refers to the "traditional military ties in the continent, offering military training and aid to the armed forces of the American continent, particularly to young officers and noncommissioned personnel." This is an aspect that the experts of the Santa Fe group deal with in pragmatic terms so that Latin Americans and North Americans can understand it perfectly. They try to use what they call our peoples' power and talent to stop the progressive movements. The idea is to implement a satisfactory combination of U.S. military technology with the human contingents of our continent. This is a low-cost formula for imperialism which is well known by our people. In good Castilian it means: You supply the bodies and we'll supply the bullets.

El Salvador, Honduras and Guatemala have accepted this proposal. The only problem is that with the intensification of the Salvadoran struggle, the United States has been forced to send military advisers and a large amount of financial aid to maintain a military junta which has lost international prestige because it murders its own people in cold blood.

At the end of this proposal there is a description of Panama's social democratic government led by General Torrijos, which is excluded from the military cooperation because they consider it a "brutally aggressive dictatorship of the extreme left," which they seek to reverse.

In this regard, we wish to stick strictly to what politicians from different parts of the world say: That they refuse to believe that General Torrijos's death was accidental. In Latin America, aircraft accidents have been a frequent method of getting rid of politicians who cannot be eliminated so easily or who are opposed to given interests. General Torrijos was this sort of man.

We just have to remember that in Bolivia this method was used to eliminate General Barrientos in 1968 and more recently in 1980, to try to kill the vice president-elect, Jaime Paz Zamora, who survived the attempt on his life.

The proposals are interrelated and the fourth contains advice on overcoming any eventuality. It recommends "if the present treaties fail, placing the Panama Canal under the CONDECA, to ensure that the nations of this hemisphere have free and just access to the Atlantic and to the Pacific."

Since the LADB's reactivation has been conceived so that the United States can resume the hegemony of the organization, the measure suggested in this proposal will return to U.S. hands everything that has to do with the canal, thus restoring the colonial enclave in Panama.

In order to have our countries approve and accept the measure, the use and need of the canal will be equal for all Latin America, but in principle this is not true. Anyway, it is a generous concession by the empire. In our opinion it is a formal recourse that injures Panama's sovereignty, wanting us to share in this shameful maneuver, since they skillfully suggest "the creation of a security zone under the 19 flags of CONDECA."

The second part, divided in five action proposals, deals with domestic subversion. The first proposal begins with admitting the integral links between domestic subversion and foreign aggression. In an open attack on Ecuadorean President Roldos (who died in similar circumstances as General Torrijos who is dealt with equally harshly in this document), the group rejects the doctrine that countries from other continents do not violate the principle of nonintervention if they act in the defense of human rights.

In a criticism made by Reagan's advisers to Carter's human rights policies, they discard the importance of human rights and are firmly in favor of supporting military dictatorships. This reasoning was explained at length by Mrs Kirkpatrick, who condemned our revolution and belatedly raised the flag of Somozism. However, she does not discount a policy of direct aggression against Nicaragua.

A characterization, in their opinion of course, of the Nicaraguan rebellion, leads them to state that something similar would happen in El Salvador (let us remember that this document was drafted in 1980), to what happened in Nicaragua in 1979. But with a historical shortsigntedness and a distortion of facts, they sustain the concept that "when Somoza left the country, the rebels had not taken Rivas yet."

They also pretend to deny the armed triumph of Sandinism, but implicitly admit that Somoza and the national guard were supplied by the United States, thereby admitting their guilt in the massive murder of Nicaraguans with the weapons they supplied the dictator.

Proposals two and three of this part, refer to the communications media and the need to counterbalance the liberation theology. Regarding to the first aspect, they have maintained an open opposition to the creation of a new international information system and included the Inter-American Press Association in this matter. Regarding the second, Nicaragua has felt the full weight of this policy. In recent months there has been an evident interest by the domestic allies of imperialism in polarizing the Nicaraguan church hierarcy against the revolution.

Their attacks on our Christian members have been constant. Some former priests have unashamedly returned to Christ, whom they had renounced, to attack the revolution. Their attitude is more political than religious. They have practically begun a witch-hunt. All their efforts make us think that this is a group that favors the holy inquisition, that is if we are to judge by the manner in which they attack the believers of a church committed to the poor.

This flank has been continually under attack, in a vain attempt to separate the Christian from their commitment to change and their desire to join a church renewed in Nicaragua. If there was no specific imperialist project and the campaigns did not have such political overtones we wouldn't have mentioned this matter in this section on the Santa Fe document.

Proposals four and five reject the human rights policy of the former democratic administration and establish the need to create alliances and support the Latin American dictatorships as has happened since Reagan assumed power. The hard democracies as Mrs Kirkpatrick likes to call the dictatorial regimes, are assured of military support in spite of the crimes they commit against their people.

Perhaps this is one of the key aspects of the logic of some of the most influential advisers of the present U.S. Administration and its executive. The world has been divided between black and white, in friends and enemies. A grotesque observation that made John Sears, former director of Reagan's campaign, say that "There is a generation gap between what Reagan thinks he knows about the world and reality. He lives in the world of 1952. He sees the world in black and white."

DANIEL ORTEGA INTERVIEWED ON COUNTRY'S SITUATION

PM191201 Rome LA REPUBLICA in Italian 15-16 Nov 81 p 14

[Interview with Daniel Ortega Saavedra, coordinator of the junta of the Nicaraguan Government of National Reconstruction by Marco Cantarelli in Managua, undated: "Sandinista Nicaragua Fears Reagan Line and Domestic Bouregoisie"]

[Text] Managua, 14 Nov--Where is Nicaragua going? Outside pressures and threats, together with increasing domestic economic and political difficulties, are making its future uncertain. We discussed this with Daniel Ortega Saavedra, the outstanding figure among the nine revolutionary commanders and coordinator of the junta of the government of national reconstruction.

His opinion is clear: "The existence of the revolutionary government is being put in jeopardy. Extreme rightwing and leftwing groups are taking advantage of the flexibility of the revolutionary process. Some foreign governments and reactionary sectors have not yet accepted the new situation. We are defining once and for all the existence of a revolutionary government that must not be jeopardized, revolutionary laws that must be observed. 'The blueprint for a mixed economy, political pluralism, freedom of the press and of association are guaranteed--but within the pattern being established by this revolutionary government.'"

[Question] It is 2 months since the state of emergency was announced: Where has the major resistance come from and what are the initial results?

[Answer] The economic battles promoted mainly by the small communist party have been reduced to a minimum. The state of emergency has encountered resistance also from the politicized sectors of the Nicaraguan bourgeoisie, which are concerned with weakening the revolutionary process more than with production. We have also achieved some positive results: we believed that the 5 percent spending cut would mean a saving of 440 million cordobas. We expect to save 700 million, however.

[Question] Does the resistance therefore mean that the mixed economy blueprint has no future?

[Answer] There is a fundamental problem concerning the participation of the Nicaraguan bourgeoisie: the most politicized sector identifies totally with U.S. policy. All the efforts that we have made to persuade this sector to cooperate have had no effect on its political leadership, which is expressed in the higher council of private enterprise and in parties such as the Democratic Conservative Party or Robelo's Nicaraguan Democratic Movement.

[Question] Tomas Borges said in a speech that "aggression is almost certain." What evidence does he have to justify such a claim?

[Answer] The aggression has existed ever since the Reagan administration took power. The president's first act, from his sickbed following the attack, was to suspend aid to Nicaragua. On top of this there is the tolerance toward the Somozaist training camps on his territory. Be that as it may, we will make every effort to provide no opportunities for aggression on a larger scale. But we are obliged to prepare ourselves.

[Answer] El Salvador and the fact that we presented the Salvadoran patriots' peace plan. This caused displeasure. I would not talk in terms of a rupture. It is a very tense situation but communications and contacts continue. Our efforts will always be directed toward seeking political formulas for resolving Central America's problems.

[Question] What would Nicaragua's position be vis-a-vis a possible future outside intervention in El Salvador?

[Answer] An intervention would have a negative influence on the whole of Central America. An invasion would mean extending the theater of war to the entire Central American area and would have a negative influence on the entire Latin American continent.

[Question] Economic and political crisis. Central American and Nicaragua. Currency shortages and foreign debt. What is the outlook for the months ahead?

[Answer] The situation is difficult. Over the next 5 years Central America needs about $20 billion to finance its development projects. We are seeking strong backing from the EEC. There is the plan for financing by the United States, Canada, Venezulea and Mexico, the so-called "mini-Marshal plan." The the United States has a discriminatory stance toward some countries, whereas Mexico pursues an open-minded policy.

[Question] How does your government justify the suspension of the right to strike? Do you not see some danger for the future?

[Answer] No. The situation is so serious that a strike would be an attack on productivity; it would be unrealistic and would endanger the past 2 years' gains.

[Question] The daily LA PRENSA has already been closed down five times. Are these restrictions of freedom of the press a prelude to a definite closure?

[Answer] Definitely not. They are a necessary measure to guarantee this freedom of the press. They are regulations which will not deny critical involvement but will not permit the sabotage of the revolutionary process.

[Question] Some bishops accuse the government of being on the Marxist-Leninist path.

[Answer] There are two positions within the church. One sector is close to the government, while the other has no confidence in it. The charge made against us is a pretext, because this sector advocates traditional conservative stances hit [toccate] by the revolutionary changes. This prompts it objectively to coincide in its policies with the bourgeoisie, which sees the religious issue as the only element of strength, because of its importance in our country.

INTELLECTUALS CRITICIZE AMBASSADOR MOSS' ATTITUDE

PA162343 Panama City CRITICA in Spanish 16 Nov 81 p 5

[Article by Vertalicia Peralta]

[Text] "The top U.S. representative in Panama openly interferes in our affairs in complicity with local sectors who are clearly fascist oriented. This is very apparent when this gentleman dares question our foreign policy and our right to choose our friends, while he unleashes an unfair, infamous attack on Nicaragua, Cuba and the USSR." This is stated in a recently published communique by members of the newly created "Panamanian Intellectuals Committee for the Sovereignty of the Peoples of America."

The committee includes Rogelio Sina, president; Ricaurte Soler, Jorge Arosemena, Joaquin Beleno, Austin del Rosario, Miguel Angel Candanedo, Nestor Jaen, Marcos Gandasegui, Manuel Orestes Nieto, Jose Franco, Vertalicia Peralta, Elsie Alvarado de Ricord and Esther Maria Osses, among others.

The Panamanian intellectuals proclaim that "We cannot remain indifferent and hereby announce to the world that the aggressor is our enemy, that we are anti-imperialists and anti-fascists, that we shall fight for our right to self-determination as a free nation and that we shall strive for the right to choose our friends and allies."

The tone of the charge of imperialist intervention in all parts of the world is diffused throughout the document of the Panamanian intellectuals, mainly the intervention of Ambassador Ambler Moss in our local politics which caused the indignation of all nationalist sectors. "It is not necessary for this representative,--the document states,--already declared persona non grata by our popular organizations, to try to tell us who our enemies are. We already know them."

COLOMBIAN NEWSMEN SAID TO BE MISLEADING PEOPLE

[Editorial: "Colombian Press Laying Smokescreen"]

They are using a very simple tactic. They publish news to impress the public as a means of distraction. To achieve this goal, they have chosen two neighboring countries, Venezuela and Panama. Colombian newsmen blame the arms traffic on these two countries, thinking that by doing this the people will blame Panama and Venezuela for all the problems caused by the Colombian guerrillas.

If these newsmen carefully analyze the facts, they will realize that for many years Colombia has been experiencing a social, economic and moral crisis, which although it cannot be blamed on the people, is the cause of the profound discontent that has resulted in guerrilla warfare. We cannot regard this situation as a present-day malady, nor can we say that it is epidemic. It really is an old and serious endemic situation that has been bleeding Colombia since the days when the Casanres area was the scene of frequent clashes between rebels and the government and even until now when guerrillas have become a spreading cancer which affects the entire nation. This situation affects Colombians in Cartagena, Caqueta, Bogota, Cali, those who live in the swamps, the man in the street, as well as the chief executive.

An analysis of the facts would enable these newsmen to learn that a group of young Colombian priests met with the pope when he visited Colombia several years ago. The pope asked them what was the reason for that social upheaval represented by one man --Priest Camilo Torres. The young priests replied that there were so many social and economic imbalances that many mothers confessed that they had had "to sell two of their children in order to feed the other three."

Under these conditions, it is very difficult to govern a country, afflicted with corruption, contraband, narcotics and white slavery when high government officials are involved in these crimes.

If these newsmen, obeying vested interests, had analyzed these and other interesting details, they would not have had the ridiculous daring to lay the smokescreen as they are now doing. They are trying to accuse Venezuela and Panama of something that can be blamed only on the Colombian authorities of past and present generations.

LIBYAN OFFICE REJECTS U.S. ACCUSATIONS

PA221935 Panama City LA REPUBLICA in Spanish 19 Nov 81 p 7

[Declaration of the Libyan People's Office in Panama--date not given]

[Text] During the past few days, U.S. and Western government circles and media, especially rightist ones, have been accusing the Socialist People's Libyan Arab Jamahiriyah of planning to attack U.S. ambassadors and U.S. prominent people. It was said that there had been plans to attack the U.S. ambassador to Italy. Also, Libya was accused of being behind the attack to the U.S. deputy chief of mission in Paris. The People's Libyan Arab Jamahiriyah emphatically rejects these false accusations and once more states that its government is the only one that has issued laws that strongly condemn terrorism and that Libya and its leaders never go as low as is typical of U.S. policy. U.S. circles are repeating these lies to hide all the aggressions and provocations against the al-Fatah revolution and its historic leadership and to cover up the U.S. military presence and intervention in the Arab region.

The maneuvers underway on the Libyan border clearly show the U.S. terrorist policy being conducted against the independent peoples of the Third World and the plans to kill the Third World leaders among whom is Col Mu'ammar al-Qadhdhafi.

The United States has conducted several terrorist operations through its Central Intelligence Agency (CIA). Proof of this are the deaths of Patrice Lumumba in Africa, Salvador Allende in Latin America and the U.S. military interventions in Nicaragua, El Salvador, Guatemala and the U.S. imperialist occupation of Puerto Rico and part of Cuba. Also, the U.S. support to the Zionist racist enemy with its occupation of Palestinian soil and its support to the South African racist regime. All of these in addition to the U.S. terrorism and crimes in Vietnam.

The peoples of the Socialist People's Libyan Arab Jamahiriyah wish to inform the international public opinion that these false accusations are trying to harm locally and internationally the achievements of the great revolution of 1 September.

NEW CANAL PUBLIC RELATIONS DIRECTOR APPOINTED

Director Interviewed

PA181342 Panama City Televisora Nacional in Spanish 2145 GMT 17 Nov 81

[Excerpts] This television station spoke to the new director of the public relations office of the Panama Canal Commission immediately after his appointment was announced. During the interview, Mr Anel Beliz said that he is confident and is not concerned about future relations with the persons under him, especially Mrs Willie Friar, who currently holds the post of director of information of this office. Our colleague Diana Arosemena interviewed him, as follows:

[Begin recording] [Question] Professor Beliz, during the past 7 months, two Panamanians have been appointed to the post of director of public relations of the Panama Canal Commission. In the first case, Luis Noli's resignation was a controversial issue. There were rumors of internal difficulties because of problems with Mrs Willie Friar. What type of relations do you expect to have with Mrs Friar? How are you going to handle this situation?

[Answer] I do not expect to have problems with the personnel under me. I sincerely believe that I am assuming this post with an open mind and positive attitude, without any prejudice and with a strong desire to serve Panama and the United States in their current special relations. I believe that the personnel under me must understand that we are living in a new era and that the relations and work to be carried out in this information and public relations office are very delicate and very special, requiring their best efforts. I know Mrs Friar. I have talked to her. We have drafted a plan together. Therefore, I am not worried about anything. I have nothing to worry about, with her or with the rest of the personnel. Besides, I believe that when a person has the academic knowledge, the experience and the desire to work, and conveys this desire to others, there is no reason to worry.

[Question] Professor Beliz, how is Beliz, the Panamanian, going to handle a situation in which the feeling of nationalism may weel cause some subjectivity in dealing with the post?

[Answer] I believe that one has to be objective in this position. I am Panamanian above all else, let no one forget this, and I am going to work as a Panamanian, presenting an image to this effect. I cannot say anything about the job, because

I am in the process of getting acquainted with things I still do not know. Besides, one shouldn't cross bridges until he comes to them. This is my attitude, which I consider positive. [End recording]

Appointment Criticized

[Text] Gerardo Gonzalez, Revolutionary Democratic Party [PRD] secretary general, has sent a telegram to General Dennis McAuliffe and Fernando Manfredo, administrator and deputy administrator, respectively, of the Panama Canal Commission, in which he strongly protests the appointment of Mr Anel Beliz at the Panama Canal Commission's public relations office, replacing Luis Carlos Noli.

Gonzalez points out that Beliz was a staunch enemy of the Torrijos-Carter treaties and of the Panamanian revolutionary process, which, under the leadership of Gen Omar Torrijos, achieved the decolonization of the isthmus. He adds that there are plenty of professional journalists in Panama with the necessary qualifications and patriotism for such a high honor.

Following is the text of the telegram sent by Mr Gonzalez:

Gen Dennis McAuliffe
Panama Canal Commission Administrator,

Deputy Administrator, Panama Canal Commission

Please receive my strongest protest at the appointment of Mr Anel Beliz in replacement of the patriot Luis Carlos Noli.

Mr Beliz was a staunch enemy of the Torrijos-Carter treaties and of the Panamanian revolutionary process, which achieved the isthmus; decolonization under the leadership of Gen Omar Torrijos.

There are more than enough professional journalists in Panama with the necessary qualifications and patriotism for such a high honor.

STUDENTS PLAN TO MOBILIZE AGAINST IMPERIALISM

PA210316 Panama City CRITICA in Spanish 19 Nov 81 p 4

[Text] Fidel Palacios, leader of the Federation of Panamanian Students (FEP), yesterday morning announced that the FEP has scheduled a national mobilization campaign for the month of December to take the offensive in response to recent actions of oligarchic and proimperialistic groups.

The announcement was made in the Los Platillos room of the national brewery during a press conference arranged by the organizers of the eighth public administrators' week.

Palacios, who represented the public administration students association and the MAN [no expansion given] emphatically pointed out that the FEP will not continue to shoulder the weight of the mistakes that the national government is making. He said that the FEP is not a government entity; neither does it represent the youth group of the REvolutionary Democratic Party (PRD).

We identify with General Torrijos' ideals and therefore we denounce the growing concubinage of the current government with the oligarchic and reactionary groups, Palacios said. He added that for the past 3 years we have been observing the continuing displacement of progressive people from our government as well as the undermining of institutions, such as the educational reform, that characterized the process led by General Torrijos' government.

Palacios said that the disorder at the university is part of a series of events that tend to create tense situations that allow the old oligarchic groups to strengthen their positions. He added that our country is part of the group of Central American nations which U.S. imperialism considers candidates for invasion.

Palacios said in conclusion that for this reason 600,000 secondary school students and 30,000 university students will mobilize with the objective of stopping the reactionary groups and the Latin American groups that are planning to invade fraternal countries.

UNUSUAL MILITARY MOBILIZATION IN CANAL AREA NOTED

PA172308 Panama City CRITICA in Spanish 17 Nov 81 p 3

[Article by Carlos J. Nunez L.]

[Text] Evident contradictions galore were observed yesterday between the so-called "U.S. Southern Command's," ranking spokesmen. While its commander in chief, Wallace Nutting, told UPI "That a U.S. intervention is imperative in El Salvador in order to control the bandits, referring to the 'Farabundo Marti' front guerrillas," its press officer, Mr Friedman, told CRITICA last night "that the military operations underway in the Panama Canal firing ranges had nothing to do with the invasion of El Salvador."

In fact, yesterday morning, Monday, on several firing ranges located along the canal, "Huey" helicopter and A-7D fighter plane formations machinegunned "objectives" which alarmed the civilian population of the canal area for the duration of the "exercises."

They are "simple exercises," Friedman told CRITICA, adding they were "routine." Wallace Nutting's statements to UPI, however, presumably in Mexico, showed the so-called exercises were actual training preparations for a "real major military operation," according to persons who know about these matters. Another issue that strongly attracted attention was the presence in the Panama Canal locks of the warship "USSR California 36" which, according to some circles, is a highly specialized espionage vessel.

"The USSR California is on its way home to a port on the Atlantic U.S. coast, Friedman said, denying its involvement in the Salvadoran conflict."

Strangest of all was the fact that last night, nearly all foreign correspondents working in Panama were trying to interview Nutting but, according to the press officer, "He was preparing to travel to the United States next week for a vacation."

Other correspondents, however, had information that Nutting had already left Panama "for an unknown destination."

ANTI-IMPERIALIST INTERVENTION MARCH--An "appeal to participate actively against the interventionist attitude of the United States," is circulating widely among the various popular, democratic and progressive sectors. The appeal also announces the preparations for the peace and national sovereignty march to be held on Thursday, 26 November. The appeal says that: "The United States Government has interfered and is interfering in various ways in our countries. At this moment, according to statements made by Secretary of State Alexander Haig, the empire is readying all its forces for a direct invasion of the Central American and Caribbean area, or for an indirect invasion by means of the Honduran and Guatemalan armies. This would create a conflict of uncalculable dimensions which may affect the existence of mankind itself." The march for peace and against Yankee intervention in Central American and the Caribbean will start at Porras Plaza at 1700 on the 26th of this month. It will be supported by the members of the Panamanian Committee for Solidarity With the Salvadoran People, as well as the Panamanian-Cuban Friendship Institute, the National Intellectuals' Committee for the Sovereignty of Peoples, the Panamanian-Nicaraguan Friendship Institute, the Christian Movement for Peace and Against Intervention, the National Committee for the Defense for Sovereignty and Peace and the Cultural Workers Front. CANAL BLOCKAGE DENIED BY CUBA--The reports published by local newspapers about a plan prepared by Cuban Prime Minister Fidel Castro to block the Panama Canal in case of intervention in Cuba have been denied by Miguel Brugueras del Valle, Cuban ambassador to Panama. The plan was revelaed in Washington by Wilfredo Navarro, president of the United Subans' Organization, who asserted that the organization's agents in Cuba and Panama managed to learn about Fidel Castro's plan. According to Navarro, the blockage would be effected by sinking any Cuban vessles which might be transiting the canal at the time of any military action against Cuba. Although the Cuban ambassador said during a brief interview in his office that he did not know Navarro, he described him as "mad." Brugueras del Valle said Navarro is just one of those nuts who dislike Cuba. He then dismissed the charge raised in Washington. "United Cubans" groups are Cuban exile groups struggling against Castro. In conclusion, the Cuban ambassador denied that any army of Cubans is in Panama disguised as tourists. According to Navarro, Castro sent them here to carry out his plan. [Text] [PA201505 Panama City MATUTINO in Spanish 20 Nov 81 pp 1-A, 8-A]

'ILLEGAL' SAN MIGUELITO MAYOR ELECTION--The new mayor of San Miguelito, Jose Isaac Vernaza, was officially sworn in in the presence of Dr Luis de Leon Arias, president of the Assembly of Corregimiento Representatives. Meanwhile, the government and justice minister, Dr Jorge Ritter pointed out that the election of Vernaza is illegal because his name was never included on the three-candidate list, as provided by law. Another irregularity noted by experienced observers is that swearing-in of the new mayor Vernaza is also illegal because it was not done in the presence of a municipal judge. REAGAN PEACE PROPOSALS

Appeal to World

PY231605 Asuncion ABC COLOR in Spanish 20 Nov 81 p 12

[Editorial: "New Basis for Achieving World Peace"]

[Excerpts] President Ronald Reagan, during a speech recently delivered at the U.S. National Press Club, made a call to Soviet chairman Leonid Brezhnev to jointly search for a new peace model. Reagan made an appeal for world sentiment and recalled a letter sent to the Soviet leader emphasizing the common need for peace in the world and the hopes of people that depend a great deal on the understanding between the two countries.

Reagan's clear and precise remarks are quite timely now when Western Europe is witnessing peace demonstrations which have emerged precisely due to the not very clear remarks made by President Reagan a few weeks earlier when he said that in case of a nuclear war there was a possibility of restricting it to the old continent.

Due to the possible Greek withdrawal from NATO, the confusing situation in France on this matter and the latent possibility of Soviet presence in Poland it can be determined that there is an urgent need to search for new bases for peace and at the same time insure U.S. presence in this area. The ideologically socialist French Government itself has recently supported the deployment of the U.S. Pershing missiles as a valid alternative to the presence of the Soviet made SS-20 missiles.

It is therefore expected--after the U.S. proposals--that a new spirit for peace as the one proposed by the Reagan administration will emerge during the forthcoming Geneva negotiations.

Proposals 'Courageous'

Asuncion HOY in Spanish 23 Nov 81 p 9

[Editorial: "A Courageous Proposal"]

[Excerpts] The latest speech delivered by U.S. President Ronald Reagan at the National Press Club is a clear expression of the level to which world concern has risen in view of the increasing tension between the great powers. In fact, there are conflicts in various areas which threaten to gradually escape from their natural boundaries.

Central America is being shaken by generalized violence as never before in its history. Afghanistan, under Soviet occupation, is tirelessly fighting without being frightened by the enormous difference in military power. In the Caribbean, there are clear symptoms of decomposition which could lead the islands to a state of anarchy with unpredictable consequences. The conflict between Iran and Iraq continues without pause or truce, seriously compromising the strategic interests of the world powers.

With in this context, President Reagan's speech allows us to get close to the spirit currently animating the U.S. Government. The chief of state said that all indications lead one to believe that the Soviet Union continues to increase its military potential to a point directly threatening the world's military equilibrium.

In view of these circumstances the United States had no recourse. In view of such a critical juncture, Reagan made a dramatic proposal to overcome the factors worrying humanity.

The arms race commits resources which could have been used for science, housing, health, education and nutrition in large areas of the planet where people fervently want the support of the great powers to break the barriers obstructing progress and frustrating the best hopes of people.

In this regard, the speech delivered by the U.S. President is an example of good sense, clarity and hope and should deserve a positive answer by people who are aiming to strengthen world domination at the expense of the suffering, humiliation and misery of millions of human beings.

DAILY COMMENTS ON ANTI-U.S. CAMPAIGN IN EUROPE

PY241515 Asuncion PATRIA in Spanish 22 Nov 81 p 24

[Commentary by Hugo Saguier Guanes: "The Beat of our Times"]

[Text] President Reagan has proposed to Soviet Communist Party Secretary General Leonid Brezhnev that all medium-range missiles deployed in Europe be dismantled. With this significant step the U.S. Government has complied with an old West European desire, namely the establishment of the "zero option" condition, effective with the meeting on nuclear disarmament in Europe which will be held in a few days in Geneva.

The uneasiness and pacifist agitation that has arisen in the main European capitals reached their "peak" when President Reagan said that "the use of tactical weapons by both sides against troops in the European battlefield could be considered without this compelling one of the great powers to push the button." This statement, which suggested the possibility of a local war in Europe, has been exaggerated to the point of suggesting that the United States would not care about the fate of West Europe in an atomic war. This is a ridiculous idea even for the most innocent observer because no well planned strategy could conceive of the limited use of nuclear force without its leading to atomic escalation. This reinforces the concept of "nuclear deterrence" which ensures that the two superpowers will avoid the use of nuclear weapons since that would lead to a universal holocaust. The existing scheme is easy to understand. However, Europe has been shaken by a slanderous campaign aimed at depicting the United States as the supporter of a new world tactics: the use of Western Europe as an atomic buffer in order to safeguard U.S. integrity. We will continue talking about this subject.

DAILY ON 'INCONSISTENCY' OF MONETARY POLICY

[Text] During the month of August the Central Bank had to disburse the sum of 1,436,000,000 guaranies only to cover "bills due for payment" abroad. This sum is almost twice the amount disbursed in August 1980. These bills represent purchases abroad whose payment deadlines have already expired.

According to some local experts the need to meet the commitments generated by the country's economic activities is causing ever increasing pressure on the foreign sector. This is due to the decrease in traditional foreign exchange revenues from exports coupled with growing foreign obligations.

As the facts themselves have shown, the exchange market reflects the conditions in which the foreign sector is operating. Thus, the foreign financial difficulties are causing an increase of the guarani-dollar exchange rate in the fluctuating market as well as a "pressure" on the exchange rate in the official market which has become an additional factor of imbalance, partly due to the Paraguayan Central Bank's policy in this matter.

According to data of the Paraguayan Central Bank, so far during 1981 exports have performed very poorly while imports have substantially increased. This way the deficit gap between the total foreign currency earning and expenditures has widened despite an inflow of $202 million generated by the binational enterprises during the first half of 1981 (which represents a 17 percent increase over the inflow of foreign currency generated by the binational enterprises during the first 6 months of 1980).

An external scheme entirely based on the foreign currency generated by the hydroelectric enterprises is beginning to enter a critical phase, because the financial obligations so created seem to increase more rapidly than the resources so generated.

Export prices and volumes have experienced a sizeable drop during this year. The price drop has discouraged exports while the volume drop reflects reduced activities in sectors involved in international trade.

For example, compared with 1980 there has been a drop in export volumes in the following items (the percentages given represent volume drops):

Lumber	46 percent
Tobacco	33 percent
Corn	85 percent
Yerba mate	77 percent
Coffee	61 percent
Castor seed	24 percent
Quebracho	25 percent

At the same time local prices have dropped as shown in the following list:

Soybean	10 percent
Cotton	13 percent
Soybean meal	18 percent
Cotton expeller	19 percent
Petit grain	11 percent
Coffee	38 percent

The regional market has also been seriously affected by money devaluations in Brazil and Argentina (during the first half of 1981 the cruzeiro was devalued by 35 percent and the Argentine peso by 66 percent).

The result is that the productive sector involved in exports has been discouraged by the low prices paid for national products, partly due to the "undervaluation of the dollar in the official market" (in which that sector operates). This problem is aggravated by the devaluation policy followed by neighboring countries. On the other hand, that decrease of exports exerts pressure on the official exchange market--which sticks to the rate of 126 guaranies to the dollar--by dint of a basic economic law that the scarcity of a "good" (in this case the dollar) determines the increase of its price (that is, its exchange rate). Consequently, the monetary policy now creates difficulties for both the export sector and the Central Bank (concerned with protecting the official rate of exchange).

Furthermore, the fiscal policy implemented by the Finance Ministry this year seems, from the national point of view, negative inasmuch as it encourages the substitution of domestic products by imports, thus generating a greater need for foreign exchange. This means that there will be increased pressure on the foreign trade sector and consequently on the exchange market.

Therefore, the critical situation which the exchange market is experiencing, in turn, merely reflects the problems which affect national production, whose deterioration is greatly due to the inconsistency of the various policies implemented by the public sector.

CUELLAR'S REJECTION, ARIAS STELLA'S RESIGNATION VIEWED Details Given

Lima EQUIS X in Spanish 13 Oct 81 pp 14-16

[Text] On Tuesday, 6 October, at 11 pm, shortly before the first hour on Wednesday, the seventh, which was the birthday of President Belaunde, the president and an intimate group of friends met for dinner at the exclusive Agua Viva restaurant, at the invitation of Foreign Minister Javier Arias Stella. It was a cheerful and friendly dinner that went on until after one in the morning. That same Wednesday, after working in his office all morning, FBT [Fernando Belaunde Terry] went to relax in Mala. Arias Stella spent the whole day in his office in Torre Tagle. At 6:00 pm Arias Stella received an urgent call from Senator Oscar Trelles. To his complete surprise, that afternoon the vote had been taken to ratify the ambassadors, and Javier Perez de Cuellar had been voted down. On learning this, Arias Stella canceled all his future engagements and started to write his resignation. It was a short text in which Arias Stella essentially points out that he accepted the Foreign Ministry position to serve Peru's higher interests and that, because he considered the nonratification of Perez de Cuellar contrary to these interests, he felt obligated to resign.

Two Hour Conversation With Ulloa

With his resignation in hand, Arias Stella went to the palace at 7 pm on Wednesday, the seventh. President Belaunde had just returned from Mala, and he was resting for a few moments. Arias Stella spoke with Violeta Correa, and explained what had happened. About his resignation he said, "Please deliver my letter to the president tomorrow. I do not want to bother him on his birthday."

Violeta promised that she would do this, and she did. On the following day, very early in the morning, the President received news of the voting down and of the resignation. He immediately spoke by telephone with Ulloa, who at that moment was in the United States. Their conversation lasted more than 2 hours. Conclusion: not to accept Arias Stella's resignation and to personally inform Javier Alva Orlandini of his displeasure over the arbitrary action committed against Perez de Cuellar.

Perez de Cuellar's Statement to EQUIS X

"The Senate's failure to approve my appointment as Peruvian ambassador to Brazil did not surprise me so much because it is a denial of confidence as because it is the result of an obvious maneuver by a minority of 19 senators comfortably taking cover behind their secret vote. What this means is that I do not consider myself rejected by the Senate but by a ridiculously low fraction of its members. However, the result of this maneuver is the same as that of a genuine majority rejection. For this reason I believed it my duty to resign the post that I currently hold as legal adviser to the Foreign Ministry. It seems to me that this is the reaction that must be shown by a diplomatic official who for 41 years has rendered service to the nation and who does not believe that he has to adapt himself to any kind of partisan political maneuvers."

Voting Down With Treachery and Profit

The voting down of Perez de Cuellar was not the result of chance but of a long parliamentary "operation" that was carefully planned and calculated. Let us look at the proof. The list of ambassadors to be approved was presented to the Senate months ago and the voting on this matter was postponed time and time again, until it was decided, secretly, to have the voting on Wednesday, the seventh. Why? Because on that day many senators were going to be absent from the session, some on leave and some with permission, and several because, since Thursday was a holiday, they wanted to take advantage of the long weekend. In fact the following did not attend the session: Luis Alberto Sanchez, Jorge del Prado, Carlos Enrique Melgar, Manuel Ulloa, Genaro Ledesma, Carlos Manuel Cox, Rolando Brena, Ricardo Napuri and several more who certainly would have voted for Perez de Cuellar. Thus there would not have been any kind of voting down. Those who engaged in the maneuver to insure the success of their "operation" proclaimed to the city and to the world that the session would be devoted exclusively to the Strike Law. The approval of ambassadors was absolutely unexpected.

Explosive Letter From Bustamaente y Rivero

Before leaving for Spain, former president Jose Luis Bustamaente left a letter addressed to the president of the Senate protesting in extremely harsh terms the injustice committed against Javier Perez de Cuellar and demanding that it be corrected immediately. In view of Perez de Cuellar's resignation, however, the Senate no longer has anything to do. This resignation makes Javier Perez de Cuellar available for diplomatic service in such a way that he can be called at any moment for another important post that the government may choose "and that I might accept" Perez de Cuellar told EQUIS X. Nor does his resignation affect his candidacy to the secretary generalship of the United Nations, for which his chances are increasingly greater.

AP Leaders' Attitude Criticized

Lima CARETAS in Spanish 12 Oct 81 p 22

[Article by Manuel D'Ornellas: "The Hard Line"]

[Text] It seemed like the rerun of an old film or the repeat of a persistent nightmare: there was Javier Alva Orlandini rebelling against an initiative by the chief and founder of his party, Fernando Belaunde Terry, at the moment of voting in the Senate, together with the group of members of parliament loyal to him--the appointment of Javier Perez de Cuellar as ambassador to Brazil.

Like forgotten storm clouds, old confrontations cleaved one's memory between FBT [Fernando Belaunde Terry] and Mario Villaran Rivera, at the beginning of his previous government and with Edgardo Seoane Corrales, at the end of his first administration.

The recurrence of this phenomenon reduced the impact, last Wednesday, of the collision between the president and the senatorial bench of his party. We already know that novice emotions--in love as in politics--cannot be reproduced.

But the Perez de Cuellar "affair" is, however, different from those cases--which are well known--of populist lack of discipline. In the episodes protagonized by Villarae and Seoane one easily observed an ideological undertone that today not even the most dilligent of Diogenes' rivals would go forth, lamp in hand, to seek.

What collided on this occasion is the vision of what the government must be: the expression of a party--People's Action--or the crystallization of national unity. For Alva, the government must exclude those who did not follow, firmly, the partisan line in all spheres, which is what he said Friday in Huancayo. For Belaunde, Peru needs the cooperation of its best elements, no matter where they may have been in those 12 long years of military dictatorship. The Alva faction, in other words, is hoisting the flag of intransigence; FBT is raising the banner of tolerance and effectiveness.

It is a mistake, however, to think that only Alvaism stoned Perez de Cuellar in the upper chamber. All indications are, rather, that together with the Alva sector there were also members of parliament close to Sandro Mariategui because, truthfully, this hidden intransigence has won almost the whole partisan body. Let us remember that last year most of the populist leadership opposed the agreement with the PPC (Popular Christian Party) that Belaunde finally imposed at his own risk, and that the AP top brass tried to convince FBT--in vain--to retire the high-ranking military officers who were most active during the previous government.

In the official party, said in another way, the hard line prevails, whose greatest exponent--does anyone doubt it?--is the priestly senator from Cajamarca. In the palace, on the other hand, moderation is established.

If we strictly consider this dichotomy, we will see that it was constantly present in the relations between Belaunde and his party. The chief of state always boasted that he was the "president of all Peruvians" before bragging about his position as leader of a partisan movement. This was so in his previous administration and certainly now.

But this opposed point of view did not cause bigger problems while the partisan spokesman kept to their own sphere, respecting the presidential area. On violently entering a field that constitutionally was alien to them until the Magna Carta of 1979 was passed--the ratification of ambassadors--the first conflict between hard and soft liners occurred. And People's Action became, in fact, the opponent of the executive from its parliamentary position, with the unpredictable consequences that this brings.

ALVISTAS' PLOT REPORTEDLY LED TO DE LA JARA'S RESIGNATION

Lima EQUIS in Spanish 13 Oct 81 p 24

The representatives locked at each other, most with satisfaction (the Alvistas) and a few with dissatisfaction (the Ulloistas). They all recalled the threat or warning made a few days earlier by Jose Maria de la Jara: "If the party group in parliament decides to invite me to the chamber, I will resign." It was an understandable announcement. The diminutive minister knew, and knows, that the Alvistas wanted his head (according to the president of the Senate, Javier Alva, de la Jara was hiding his head like an ostrich) and that his coming to the lower chamber would not result even in a superficial resolution of his problems.

Belaunde had hardly stepped down from the small platform used at Monday meetings, leaving Luis Percovich and Javier Alva in charge, when the rumors began flying in all directions through the room: "The president has changed his mind," "The president has decided de la Jara must go." The one who was visibly upset was Deputy Pablo Antonio Calle, (He believes that every leftist is a terrorist and vice versa.) In fact it was Calle, who, after the meeting had discussed what the government's priority projects should be, stood up and said to Belaunde: "Minister de la Jara, at the last meeting in this same room, and at the palace, Minister de la Jara again, this time with General Ipinze present, explained the situation and we agreed that the minister of the interior would not be invited to parliament. But a few days later, much to my surprise, I learned that a group of deputies were collecting signatures toward a motion to invite the minister. I learned they had collected a great number of signatures. An agreement has been violated. I would like to know your opinion on this, Mr President."

Once Belaunde gave his support to the motion opposed by the Ulloista Calle, the Alvistas felt entitled to continue advancing with greater energy. A few minutes after Belaunde left the meeting, Dagoberto Laynez brought out from one of his pockets the motion, signed by a significant number of deputies, and asked for the signatures of all of them. Since the president had spoken, even friends and spirited defenders of Minister de la Jara like Elias Mendoza added their names.

No one declined to sign; there was complete unanimity. The motion was to be presented on Tuesday, 6 October, or Wednesday, 8 [sic] October.

While signatures were still being collected, however, Luis Percovich and Javier Alva had to leave and the chair devolved on Rodolfo Zamolloa, the populist leader in the Chamber of Deputies. It was he who convinced the chamber to table the motion "in order to reflect on it further" until this week, when a decision was to be made.

The Alvistas, who control the majority in the populist ranks, have already made their decision: to invite de la Jara to the chamber. This decision was to be ratified by the weekly meeting of the government parliamentarians at the palace yesterday, 12 October. So de la Jara's hours were numbered, unless at the last minute Belaunde himself were to save him.

CIRCUMSTANCES LEADING TO CABINET RESHUFFLE ANALYZED

Lima EQUIS in Spanish 13 Oct 81 pp 4-6

[Text] If the cabinet crisis expected throughout the national political scene for weeks had not taken place before today, that fact is due entirely to President Belaunde's conviction that one of the total of two errors he admits he committed during his first administration was that he changed ministers too much. (The other was not to appear often enough on television.) As a result, in this second administration he tries to hold on to them against winds and tides. (The only exceptions have been Eduardo Orrego, who preferred to be mayor of Lima rather than minister of transport, and Luis Felipe Alarco, who was "kicked upstairs" to UNESCO in Paris.) As for television, the chief of state is now making the opposite mistake of appearing even when he is in no condition to do so, which is much worse.

But the simultaneous and unconcealable failure of several of the present members of the cabinet led by Ulloa and Kuczynski, including the failure of the two principal figures, seems at the verge of forcing the hand of architect Belaunde and causing the first ministerial change of his second administration. The crisis should have occurred on 1 October. Only the proximity of the 13th (unlucky number!) anniversary of the Velasco revolution could have postponed the outcome.

As it happened, the minister of war, Gen (ret) Jorge Muniz Luna came within an ace of being an unexpected factor precipitating the fall of the cabinet. He is blamed for the unusual delay in this year's military promotions, which by now should have been announced and hailed with praise. General Muniz has been called responsible for the lack of an announcement. It is stated that the minister tried to influence who was to be promoted, tried, since his role is political, to change the list on political grounds, and that he collided with the resistance of the army commander, Gen Otto Elespuru, who reportedly was defending a strictly technical and military rationale. Besides, this figured in with a whole series of confrontations between the War Ministry and the High Command, one involving the exhibition of the evacuation hospital (a gift from Russia from the time of the Huaraz schism), which General Muniz opposed, because it constituted an implicit refutation of populist Senator Angeles, who had stated that the hospital had "disappeared." Another minister in a notably weak position is clearly the minister of the interior. De la Jara had announced that he would automatically resign if the populist representatives voted to invite him to report to the Deputies or to the Senate on the declarations of PIP [Peruvian Investigative Police] leader General Ipinze against leftist members of parliament falsely accused of pressuring the judiciary in favor of the terrorists. It is known that the "Alvistas" have considered this another proof of de la Jara's "weakness" and that they intend to invite him to appear in the course of the present debate on the subject. Also there is the proposal of Javier Alva himself to establish a "mandatory term of service in the police force" in order to fight terrorism. This measure is considered one which will strengthen the Civil Guard and drive the minister of the interior to distraction: either he supports the plan of the president of the Senate or he has to go. (The idea that there are two "military services, one the army and the other the Civil Guard," has not been welcomed at all by the green party, however; they have pointed out correctly that this would lead to having two armies.)

Health Minister Uriel Garcia, in turn, has been called by his own cabinet colleagues "the zombie" or "walking corpse" after becoming a laughingstock during the medical strike. His recent attempt to "return to life" through promoting the Amauta award for the teacher Alberto Hurtado has been counterproductive, because it served to remind everyone of the need to replace him.

Whatever the president may say, it is true that Energy and Mine Minister Kuczynski presented his resignation because of the possibility that, in order to reduce the fiscal deficit, there would be a revocation of the tax exemptions for mining companies which Kuczynski had managed to put through. Kuczynski had made his move not only in order to defend middle-sized Peruvian mining companies but also because he fears the elimination of the exemptions for large foreign mining companies (Southern) and multinational oil companies (Oxy, Superior, Shell) whose interests he serves.

EVENTS LEADING TO STATE OF EMERGENCY DECREE DISCLOSED

Lima CARETAS in Spanish 19 Oct 81 pp 15-16

[Text] It is clear the entire democratic regime--and not just the minister of the interior--would have preferred not to be forced to suspend civil liberties just 15 months after the government was formed. However, last week the Tambo massacre as well as other circumstances made necessary a decision in accord with the proponents of the hard line--and with the terrorists also. This is what they wanted, a certain kind of validation.

It was Monday, 12 October, 1000 hours, when in their weekly meeting Jose Maria de la Jara y Ureta and his assistant interior minister, Hector Lopez Martinez, posed to President Belaunde the urgent need for a state of emergency decree in the five provinces of Ayacucho.

Lopez Martinez, who is a historian as well as an attorney, cautiously termed "misguided" the persons responsible for the escalation of violence, in order to avoid contradicting the thesis supported by the president himself that there is a certain similarity between the present wave of terroism and the terrorist strategy of "other nations."

Before going to Nana to have breakfast with his coreligionists, the president had already made his decision. The constitution gives the executive a range of options for declaring a state of emergency in a district, a region or the whole nation. He can choose simply to act administratively through civil authorities or he can put a specific area under complete control of the military. The middle path is to suspend certain constitutional guarantees, to establish a curfew, and to engage in vigorous police action.

The president chose the limited, selective approach. That afternoon, at 1630 hours, the subject was discussed at the National Defense Council and shortly afterwards at a special meeting of the Council of Ministers. There was unanimous support for the adoption of extraordinary measures and a consensus that the public opinion of the nation, and not only that of Ayacucho, is in support of a show of force in order to control the violence.

Negative Aspects

However, there are negative aspects to a state of emergency. Abroad, it creates the impression of instability. At home, it pleases the partisans of authoritarianism.

The events it brings about run the risk of irritating or radicalizing fringe elements who do not practice violence but can be pushed into it.

That is, after all, one of the goals of terrorism. One could even say that last week terrorists sought actively to extend the state of emergency to the entire nation through diverse acts of provocation. For although the number of bombings diminished in the controlled zone, in Cuzco three explosions caused damage worth 200 million soles at a commercial gallery and chased the guests of two hotels from their beds. In Lima, by placing three explosive devices at installations of Radio America and Channel 4--and making timely anonymous warnings--the terrorists won their greatest propaganda victory.

The directors of the Peruvian Broadcasting Sompany, S.A., their nerves understandably on edge, finally aired an editorial which, somewhat contradictorily, shouted to the television audience, "We have been left to the mercy of the terrorists," because "we have had help only from the Republican Guard and PIP [Peruvian Investigative Police]." They added, "These agencies do not have sufficient forces," and security "will be possible only when the minister of the interior gives more priority to this issue." They continued, "To sum up, terrorism is gaining and the government is doing nothing to stop it. Enough inactivity! We demand action!"

De La Jara's Head

Thus, live and direct, Channel 4 joined a vocal group calling for the head of de la Jara, a group which at times seems orchestrated by Javier Alva Orlandini himself. The Senate president, who in turn is joining in with the brutally realistic school of journalism which seems guided by some terrorist planner, declared emphatically on 16 October that no longer is there "any doubt that there are foreign terrorists working in Peru."

When CARETAS spoke with police authorities, they responded that they would like to have the information cited by Alva, because to date they had arrested only one suspicious French woman in San Miguel.

In any case, considering the real terrorist attacks, the new bloody events, combined with crude realism from certain politicians and the magnification provided by a press prone to exaggerate any incident, this mysterious outbreak of industrious sedition was achieving its main goal, that is, to create terror.

One indication: so far this year there have been 12,000 requests for gun permits, three times the number for 1980.

Meanwhile, the actions of the joint command of the Ayacucho police operations confirmed that quite apart from speculations about a connection with Colombian drug trafficking or with schizophrenic Cuban support, it is a fact that in this ancient, beautiful and poor part of Peru we have a curious phenomenon, indigenous and extremist Andean Maoism, which, though it consists of only a few persons, has succeeded in spreading violence and attacking democracy.

EDITORIAL LAMENTS POLITICIANS' ALIENATION FROM PEOPLE

Castries THE WEEKEND VOICE in English 17 Oct 81 p 2

[Editorial: "Political Behaviour"]

[Text] IT must be asked what it is that makes persons in political power get on in this peculiar way.

What is it that makes people, once they are ushered into office kick the ladder by which they did ascend.

The former Prime Minister Mr. Louisy was famous for reminding us soon after the 1979 election that the politician is the "servant" of the people and not the other way round. But, Mr. Louisy, when the time for him to demonstrate recognition of this fact, performed just like the other politicians. He did so by denying the people their demand for new elections following the defeat of his budget in April and during the political crisis which followed.

Successive governments in St. Lucia appear to have fallen into the same pattern of alienating themselves from the populace to the extent where they are completely out of touch, display arrogance in responding to the cries of their people and refuse to bow to popular demands.

The leadership struggle was another case in point where politicians fooled themselves in believing they were championing the cause of the people. We continue to pay the price of this folly to this day.

Acting Governor Boswell Williams was no different. In separate discussions with delegations from the Chamber of Commerce and Teachers' Union at the height of the post-budget crisis, Mr. Williams is said to have displayed complete amazement when told that there was a popular demand for new general elections.

The way spokesmen for these two delegations told it, the acting governor could not, or refused to understand why people should be protesting and calling for the dissolution of Parliament.

Now Mr. Josie, all the way in New York has followed the same trend. Mr. Josie is reported to have told North American investors that recent reports of financial mismanagement and political instability in the Government were mere ploys by the opposition to "create confusion in the minds of St. Lucians". He also said that the fact that St. Lucia's economy was in trouble did not make St. Lucia unique in that respect.

One could understand why the Minister should say these things to an overseas audience, but we fail to understand why the Minister should have such statements conveyed to the ears of St. Lucians at home who are well aware of the TRUE state of things in the country.

In saying all that, however, we must admit that we are heartened by the news relayed by Mr. Josie that investors are now returning to St. Lucia "and are beginning to take an active part in the economic life" of the island. And we hope, for St. Lucia's sake that these investors do not suffer any change of heart.

For the past two years and three months of Labour Party rule, St. Lucians have had many promises but little to show for it.

NATIONAL FREEDOM PARTY LISTS 20 CANDIDATES FOR ELECTION

Port-of-Spain TRINIDAD GUARDIAN in English 23 Oct 81 p 1

[Text] NATIONAL Freedom Party (NFP), one of the outsiders in the elections race, yesterday announced 20 of its proposed 34 candidates in the November 9 polls.

The presentation of the candidates at the Hotel Normandie, St Ann's indicated that so far the NFP led by barrister-at-law Ramdeo Sampat-Mehta is pinning its faith primarily on men.

Of the 20 candidates — average age 32 — five of them are women.

In an address at the ceremony which was held outdoors after an electricity outage threatened to mar proceedings Mr. Sampat-Mehta declared that the nation would wake up shocked on November 10, the day after General Elections.

FROM BEHIND

He said the People's National Movement (PNM) and the Organisation for National Reconstruction (ONR) were struggling for the votes of 30 per cent of the electorate but the NFP was aiming to capture the remaining 70 per cent.

The NFP leader pointed to his colleagues who like himself would be facing the electorate and stressed that they were representative of the grassroots of Trinidad and Tobago.

"We are coming from behind and we will win by a six-length lead. When the votes are counted the people of Trinidad and Tobago are going to wake up to one of the biggest shocks in their lives," a confident Mr Sampat-Mehta declared.

He added that NFP had criss-crossed the country with its meetings and would be coming to the rescue of dissatisfied nationals in Trinidad and Tobago like a bolt from the blue.

Earlier, Mr Sampat-Mehta had claimed that it appeared the authorities were trying to sabotage the NFP because it was the third time for the current election campaign that lack of electricity threatened to dampen a function organised by the party.

The next 14 candidates are due to presented on Sunday at a NFP ceremony scheduled to start at 1 p.m. at Charleville near to the curry factory.

The following are the candidates so far for the NFP:

FELIX GIROD, 38, auto garage proprietor ... Tunapuna;

MS BERNADETTE JOSEPH, 21, accounts supervisor ... St Augustine;

COURTNEY ROSALES 31, shipping agent ... Arouca;

AMEER ALI, 49, electronics specialist ... Siparia;

MS LORNA BAPTISTE, 23, fashion designer ... St Ann's West;

NARINE SINGH, 28, businessman ... Naparima;

NAZRUDEEN YACOOB, 26, labour consultant ... Tabaquite;

NATHANIEL FERGUSON, 31, agriculturist ... Port-of-Spain South;

SURESH LAKSHMAN, 30, engineering technician ... San Fernando West;

JOSEPH SANKAR, 41, building contractor ... Couva North;

HERBERT JOHNSON, 30, agriculturist/farmer ... Laventille;

MISS DEBRA MARIN, 19, sales trainee ... Diego Martin East;

RAMLOGAN SINGH, 56, businessman ... Couva North;

FAISAL ZAINOOL, 22, teacher/accountant ... Oropouche;

MISS PRABHUDAI RAMDHANIE, 21, catering supervisor ... Princes Town;

KENRICK CHARLES, 26, businessman ... Port of Spain;

AZIZ KHAN, 30, businessman ... Nariva;

GERALD ASSEE, 28, insecticide manufacturer ... Caroni East;

MS DULCIE JOHN, 44, businesswoman ... Arima; and

RAMDEO SAMPAT MEHTA, 43, barrister-at-law ... Chaguanas.

CHAMBERS OUTLINES POLICIES IN PRE-ELECTION ADDRESS

Port-of-Spain TRINIDAD GUARDIAN in English 22 Oct 81 p 1

[Article by John Babb]

[Text] The Trinidad and Tobago Government has not closed its mind, or the door, on regional matters of a joint venture nature aimed at removing the English-speaking Caribbean territories from the stranglehold of the developed countries, Prime Minister George Chambers told a large audience at San Juan on Tuesday night.

Ignoring any sort of celebration and opting to speak on "Foreign Policy" on the night of his 25th wedding anniversary, he assured the cheering crowd that "Williams's policies are now Chambers's."

Mr Chambers was speaking at a public meeting organised by the People's National Movement (PNM) of which he is Political Leader. It was held in support of his candidacy in St Ann's East in the forthcoming General Election, November 9, as well as the candidacy of his party colleagues--Mr Sham Mohammed (St. Joseph), Mr Kamaluddin Mohammed (Barataria) and Mrs Muriel Donawa-McDavidson (San Juan).

The meeting was chaired by party foundation member and former Minister for Home Affairs, Mr Gerard Montano.

Mr Chambers said he was replying "to a certain political leader who is very fond of three-piece suits, and of television, who had accused the Government of surrendering leadership in the Caribbean; that the Government had erected a cold wall, and had lost contact with the outside world."

Seven Areas

He said he did not wish to deal at length with the United Nations (UN), the Organisation of American States (OAS), the Non-aligned Movement, the Third World, and the international financial community. But Mr Chambers pinpointed seven areas in foreign policy where Trinidad and Tobago made its mark.

Since the establishment of the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund (IMF), he recalled, the only country in the Caribbean which has had the distinction of having its Minister of Finance (Mr Chambers himself) elected as chairman of the Bank and the IMF was Trinidad and Tobago.

"And there was a certain irony about this," he recalled.

At the meetings at which he presided as chairman there were the Minister of Finance of France, who subsequently became President of France; the Minister of Finance of Germany, who later became Chancellor of Germany; the Minister of Finance of Nigeria, who became President of Nigeria; the Minister of Finance of Mexico, who is now President of Mexico; the Minister of Finance of Canada, who became a contestant for the leadership of the party which now controls Canada.

"And now by curious coincidence," he said, "the Minister of Finance of Trinidad and Tobago, who is now Prime Minister."

Right of Accession

Mr Chambers also recalled that soon after Trinidad and Tobago's accession to Independence, the PNM began to consider what it should do in respect of the OAS. He had the distinction of serving on the party's committee on this subject. After parliamentary approval, Trinidad and Tobago became a member of the OAS, thus also gaining automatic right of accession to the Inter-American Development Bank (IADB).

On entry into the OAS, one of this country's first directives was the question of Guyana, which, under the OAS Charter, was debarred from membership because of its border problem with Venezuela.

It was the late Prime Minister who raised the matter initially with the then President of Venezuela. Ultimately, Trinidad and Tobago began to fight at the level of the IADB, as distinct from the OAS,pressing for the admission of Guyana on the ground that there was no justification for a struggling Third World country to be debarred from accession to funds made available to Third World countries in the Hemisphere, just because that country had inherited a dispute over which it had no control.

Charter Amended

"We fought that battle in the Bank without any tremendous amount of support from Caribbean colleagues," said Mr Chambers. Eventually, the Bank's Charter was amended to permit Guyana entry.

The Prime Minister also spoke of Trinidad and Tobago's effort in relation to the Caribbean Development Bank (CDB) whose President was a distinguished Trinidad and Tobago national.

It was on the initiative of the late Prime Minister that Trinidad and Tobago established a Special Fund to provide counterpart funds for the less developed Caricom territories who wanted loans from the CDB.

He spoke also of Trinidad and Tobago's role in the decision of establishing an Interim Committee on General Development of the bank and Fund, which paved the way for current discussions on the new international economic order.

Founding Member

Mr Chambers also revealed that Trinidad and Tobago was one of the founding members of the Group of 24--a U.N. agency. "We have been so effective," he said, "that the chairmanship has now fallen to Trinidad and Tobago. And pretty soon, the chairman, Mr Victor Bruce, will be hosting the Group of 24 in Trinidad and Tobago," he said.

The Prime Minister dealt also with the Caricom Oil Facility--a facility that was set up on the initiative of the late Prime Minister to assist Caricom countries who were suffering from high energy bills.

Mr Bruce was also chairman of this facility which offered the less developed countries loans at two per cent interest, and the more developed, at three per cent, with generous moratoria.

"And if they don't have the money to pay us back, they can pay us back in products which we buy from them," explained Mr Chambers.

In respect of liquidity, Mr Chambers also told how the IADB and the CDB were permitted to raise money on the Trinidad and Tobago market to assist other countries.

ONR RELEASES MANIFESTO ON FOREIGN POLICY, ECONOMY ISSUES

Changes in Taxation

Port-of-Spain TRINIDAD GUARDIAN in English 23 Oct 81 p 1

[Text]

ORGANISATION for National Reconstruction (ONR) plans reviewing the entire taxation structure in the country aimed at removing tax burdens on income earners and incentives to the business sector.

Proposals for the revision are contained in the party's manifesto presented at Woodford Square last night and, according to Mr. Karl Hudson-Phillips, the political leader of the party, will be in the provisions of the 1982 budget under an ONR Government.

The comprehensive 164-page manifesto is divided into 19 sections dealing with all aspects of life in Trinidad and Tobago.

On personal income tax, the party has proposed an increase in the personal allowance to $5,000 and the non-working spouse allowance to $2,500 and child allowance to $1,500.

The allowances for housekeeper and dependent is proposed at $2,400 each.

Unemployment levy will be abolished, according to the ONR, while on Corporation Tax the rate will be revised and provisions made for different rates of taxation for different types of corporate activities including the small business sector.

Citizens over 60 years will also be granted additional monthly tax free allowances of up to $1,000 under the proposals of the ONR.

DOUBLED PENSIONS

The party also had pledged to double the present pension of $100 a month for old age pensioners.

ONR according to the manifesto appreciates that the public attitudes towards the existing tax structure "are purely negative and the manifesto goes on: "Their negative attitudes are as a result of the excessively high marginal rates of taxation and the misuse of the tax revenues by the existing Government."

On Taxation, the ONR Manifesto states:

The ONR's proposals for Personal Income Tax will contain the following characteristics:

(1) The existing tax structure will be simplified

(2) There will be an annual depreciation allowance for owner-occupied property which will be deductible for tax purposes. A 100 per cent allowance will be made on the installations of guttering, water tanks and cisterns.

(3) There will be allowances for rents paid by land, residential and agricultural tenants.

(4) Provisions will be made to increase personal, child, spouse, housekeeper and dependent relatives allowances:-

(a) Personal allowance will be increased to $5,000.00

(b) Non-working spouse allowance will be increased to $2,500.00

(c) Child allowance will be increased to $1,500.00

(d) Housekeeper and dependent relatives' allowance will be increased to $2,400.00

(5) Capital Gain's Tax for individuals will be revised to encourage the individual to invest and retain investment as opposed to investing for trading purposes.

(6) Union dues paid by employees will be deductible

(7) Donations to certified charitable, cultural, social and sports bodies will be deductible.

(8) An additional monthly tax free allowance will be granted to citizens sixty (60) years and over. Receipts, whether by way of income or pension, of less than $1,000 a month will be tax free.

OVERTIME TAX

(9) A reduction of taxes

paid on overtime work. A special regime will be established for over-time payments, with a limit of twenty cents (.20°) in the dollar.

(10) Special Allowances (Maintenance Grants) will be given for secondary, technical and vocational students in Trinidad and Tobago and for those attending UWI full-time or part-time. These Allowances will also be provided for any courses of study not available at UWI.

The ONR's Tax structure recognises that the non-oil sectors of the economy do not have tax incentives which are sufficient to encourage investment in new plant and equipment, and in developing and expanding job opportunities in the nation.

The ONR is also aware that when incentives and concessions have been granted to specific sectors and groups, the private enterprises have, more often than not, failed to provide the population with goods and services in sufficient quantity, of high quality and at reasonable cost.

The ONR's proposal for Corporation Tax will contain the following characteristics:-

(1) The rate of corporate tax will be revised. Provisions will be made for different rates of taxation for different types of corporate activities, eg:

- the small business sector
- the introduction of new and improved technology
- the establishment of completely new activities which widens and deepens the country's industrial base
- the production processing of locally grown agricultural produce (including fisheries)

(2) New plant and machinery costs will be allowed to be written off within five years for taxation purposes. For the basis of costing of goods and services, plant and machinery will be allowed to be written off over the economic or technological life, whichever is shorter.

(3) All employers in the manufacturing sector will be allowed to write off the expenses incurred for each new job position enlisted after January 1st, 1982 at these rates:-

Year One - 125% of employee's wages
Year Two - 120% of employee's wages
Year Three - 115% of employee's wages
Year Four - 110% of employee's wages
Year Five - 105% of employee's wages

(4) Export allowances will be simplified so that there will be no corporate tax due on the profits from locally produced goods and services which are exported. Additionally, an Export Insurance system will be immediately implemented.

(5) To encourage corporate social responsibility, full deductions will be granted for all expenses incurred in the provision and support of charitable, cultural, social and sports bodies.

(6) A complete review will be undertaken of the negative list, the import licensing and quota systems, purchase tax, etc.

These incentives to the business sector will be supported by safeguards which will ensure that the citizens of the country and the Government will be protected from unscrupulous practices which may occur.

Commitment to Caribbean

Port-of-Spain TRINIDAD GUARDIAN in English 23 Oct 81 p 3

[Text]

THE ORGANISATION for National Reconstruction will use four principles to guide its foreign policies if elected to form the next Government.

This is contained in the manifesto of the party presented at Woodford Square last night.

Policies are:

- Opposition to racism, extremism, oppression and colonialism;
- Careful promotion of the vital interests of Trinidad and Tobago;
- A commitment to the Caribbean and its peoples; and
- Non-intervention in the domestic affairs of other countries and non-proliferation of nuclear weapons and armaments in the Caribbean and Latin American areas.

In its plans for foreign policy, the ONR has stated it will take steps to protect and advance the vital interests of the people of Trinidad and Tobago.

There will be a special place for the Caribbean in the foreign policy of an ONR Government, it was also stated.

NO COMPROMISE

The manifesto stated that the ONR was committed to the maintenance and strengthening of the democratic way of life in the Caribbean

On Foreign policy the manifesto states in part:

"The ONR will be vocal against racism in sports. While we congratulate the peoples of New Zealand for their heroic opposition to the South African Rugby Tour of their country, we condemn the fact that the United States Government has permitted the same Rugby Team, as a representative group from racist South Africa, to tour and play in that country. We will discourage sporting ties with all countries and sportsmen who encourage, by participation and otherwise, apartheid in sport.

"The ONR will not compromise on the questions of racism and oppresion of people anywhere in the world."

Promotion of the Vital Interests of Trinidad and Tobago:

"The ONR will take positive steps to protect and advance the vital interests of the people of Trinidad and Tobago. In this regard, the ONR will reappraise the cost, functioning and purpose of existing embassies, missions, consulates and offices of the Trinidad and Tobago Government and its agencies abroad.

"This re-appraisal will emphasise the usefulness of these offices in terms of the political and commercial interests of Trinidad and Tobago abroad. In addition, increased emphasis will be put on the necessity of service and information to Trinidad and Tobago nationals abroad.

"We will actively encourage our non-resident citizens, particularly those who are trained and qualified, to come back home to assist in the national reconstruction.

"The ONR is committed to the closing down of the office of the International Marketing Organisation in Geneva.

"Where on examination any mission, embassy or office is to be disbanded, personnel will be redeployed in the service.

ONR Commitment to Caribbean Peoples:

"The Caribbean must have a special place in the foreign policy of an ONR Government. This must be so because of historical, cultural and economic considerations. The present Government has no policy for the Caribbean. The ONR will increase the level of diplomatic relations with the Caribbean by direct representation or by accreditation.

PEACEFUL SOLUTIONS

"The ONR is committed to the maintenance and strengthening of the democratic way of life in the Caribbean. While we strictly adhere to the principle of non-interference in our internal affairs, or by any, in the internal affairs of Caribbean nations, we will not support racism, oppression or the violation of fundamental human rights.

"We will accept ideological pluralism but will resist any attempts to impose alien or foreign domination in any form on the Caribbean people.

"The ONR will resist the importation into the Caribbean of super power conflict and will avoid being embroiled in the time consuming international ideological debate. We are against the Caribbean becoming a theatre of conflict for the super powers and will work for the peaceful resolution of all areas of conflict within the Caribbean basin and Latin America.

"The ONR will seek to revitalise and widen the framework of the present CARICOM agreements. We reaffirm our commitment to our regional institutions while insisting that Trinidad and Tobago take its rightful place as the logical leader, economically and culturally, of the region.

"We will play a positive role in assisting in the elimination of social inequalities and injustices in the region as a necessary element in strengthening the democratic framework of our peoples.

"The ONR stands firmly committed to the preservation and maintenance of the University of the West Indies as a Caribbean Institution of international academic status and repute.

"In support of this stand, and in recognition of the very poor and inadequate student housing accommodation on the St. Augustine Campus, the ONR proposes as a matter of priority the immediate construction of adequate student residences to meet the needs of that entire student body.

Non-Intervention in the Affairs of Other Countries:

"The ONR Government will neither intervene in the domestic affairs of other countries nor will we permit interference by any country in the internal affairs of Trinidad and Tobago.

"While we see ideological pluralism as a fact of international life, we will not tolerate attempts from any quarter to destabilise Trinidad and Tobago, politically or otherwise.

"We will respect the sovereignty and territorial integrity of all States. We believe that there must be a rational and peaceful settlement, without resort to arms, of all territorial disputes. Such disputes must be settled by recognised international arbitral procedures.

"Within the limits of our resources, we will support the right of self-determination for all subject peoples. We will continue the struggle against colonialism until such a system is banished to the history books.

HIGHEST RESPECT

"We will accord respect to all nations but we will demand, on behalf of the people of Trinidad and Tobago, that we as a nation are accorded the highest respect.

The Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons and the Arms Race:

"The ONR is in favour of the peaceful uses of nuclear energy. We will be against the proliferation of nuclear weapons and will condemn the useless build-up of armaments on the international scene. We believe that genuine peace can be achieved through mutual respect and dialogue without the necessity for massive investment in armaments and new weapons of war.

"In a related sense, the ONR is against international terrorism, hijacking and like crimes which use the lives of innocent people for international blackmail of any sort.

International Institutions:

"The present Government has failed to make use of the vast opportunity being provided for information, training and the transfer of technology provided by the various international organisations of which we are a member.

"In addition, our diplomacy has been characterised by a non-profile and non-presence in several important international forums. The ONR believes that it is time we had a voice in the world.

"The ONR will actively support the United Nations and all its specialised agencies and obtain the maximum benefit for our country and our citizens from these bodies.

"We will continue an active support of the Commonwealth and retain an active presence in the groups of the ACP countries and the OAS.

"Under the ONR, Trinidad and Tobago will be more actively involved in the North/South dialogue and will take steps to encourage the formulation of a new international development strategy with emphasis on the achievement of national self-reliance in the Third World.

The Ministry of External Affairs:

"The Ministry of External Affairs' Headquarters in Port of Spain will be restructured in order to provide the necessary direction and information to all Trinidad and Tobago missions and offices abroad. It will be made to keep in close touch with all areas of national policy and the Ministries and agencies carrying out the same.

"In this way it will be equipped to provide full back-up services and information on matters touching the vital interests of Trinidad and Tobago.

"The Ministry of External Affairs will be a separate and independent Ministry held by a Minister who will have no other portfolio. The posts of Inspectors of Missions will be reviewed as an important element in ensuring high level functioning of all overseas offices and agencies.

POSTAL BALLOT

"There will be regular rotation of diplomatic officers on due notice by specific tours of duty with proper arrangements made for disturbance allowances for officers on transfer according to comprehensive regulations to be redrafted.

"The salaries and terms and conditions of diplomatic and locally recruited staff will be reappraised in the light of local variants, inflation and other peculiar circumstances in the particular foreign country.

"Provision will be made for all diplomatic representatives of Trinidad and Tobago abroad to be permitted to vote by postal ballot

"The restructuring and reorganisation of the Ministry of External Affairs will take into account the special role which Trinidad and Tobago has to play as the economic and cultural leader of the Caribbean.

"In this regard, consideration will be given to the creation of posts of Cultural Attaches, particularly in the Caribbean and North America.

"Such Officers will be complementary to the provisions which the ONR Government will make with respect to our artistes, composers and performers.

"Commercial Attaches will be appointed, bearing in mind the specific commercial and economic interest of Trinidad and Tobago and the 'Exporting to Survive' programme which will be instituted."

EDITORIAL SKEPTICAL OF BISHOP'S PROMISES FOR GRENADA

Port-of-Spain TRINIDAD GUARDIAN in English 9 Oct 81 p 8

[Editorial: "Bishop's Dubious Promises"]

[Text] MR. MAURICE Bishop, the Prime Minister by coup of Grenada, is either slowly coming to his senses or he is becoming even more slippery and devious than ever.

That is why we look askance at his announcement in Melbourne, Australia, that he is likely to hold general elections in his country in answer to questions posed at a news conference towards the end of the Commonwealth Prime Ministers conference.

Mr. Bishop reportedly said, "Our own preference in terms of the timing of the election is that the election should in fact come after a new constitution has been drafted — a constitution which we would like to see submitted for popular discussion through a consultative assembly and thereafter submitted for popular approval through a national plebiscite and under this new constitution we would like to see the elections coming.

"An exact date I cannot give you at this time."

This is all too good to be true and we think Mr. Bishop's track record would make the introduction of the new constitution the longest of long shots for coming into existence. We suppose that the constitution will come into effect sometime after the promised Press policy under which he will (as promised) permit the establishment of independent newspapers in Grenada.

In our view the release of proper formal trial of those hundreds of people now so long detained by the Bishop regime would be the first sign that Mr. Bishop intends to lead his country back to democratic paths.

The unfettered re-introduction of free and independent newspapers in Grenada would be another genuine omen while the orderly preparation of the electoral procedures are undertaken.

In advance of all this, of course, we await the encouragement to other voices than those of Mr. Bishop's cronies to discuss the affairs of Grenada openly.

The silence from people like Mr. Herbert Blaize and his supporters is curious — and damning, if Mr. Bishop and his cohorts really mean what Mr. Bishop says.

TRADE UNION LEADER ACCUSES U.S. OF 'INTERFERENCE'

Bridgetown ADVOCATE-NEWS in English 28 Aug 81 p 1

[Text]

A Trinidad and Tobago Trade unionist has charged here that there was massive interference in the internal affairs of his country by the United States Government.

Mr. Michael Als, president of the Bank and General Workers Union, and also general secretary of the Council for Progressive Trade Unions in the twin island Republic, made the allegation at a news conference here yesterday.

He explained that the interference was manifested in what he said was the support being given to the Organisation for National Reconstruction (ONR) which is one of the parties expected to contest the upcoming general elections in that country.

Mr. Als pointed out that an American Public Relations firm which had successfully assisted candidates in the United States and Jamaica presidential campaign and general elections respectively had been giving professional advice to the ONR.

He said that the ONR was currently spending enormous sums of money in newspapers advertisements, adding that this money was being raised externally.

Mr. Als, who is also Chairman of the political organisation calling itself the People's Popular Movement (PPM), said the U.S. assistance to the ONR had prompted the Trinidad and Tobago Government to complain to the U.S. about the matter.

He said the threat from what he called the right wing forces had also prompted a number of organisations in the country to become united against the ONR. These include the National Joint Action Committee (NJAC), the official opposition, the United Labour Front (ULF), the PPM and other peoples organisations.

Mr. Als said it was in the interest of Trinidadians to block the ONR from coming close to the corridors of political power.

Mr. Als added that the ONR was getting the bulk of its support from certain sections of the business community, upper middle class, and sections of the Police, Army and Coast Guard Officials.

CUSTOMS, SECURITY MEN IN CRACKDOWN ON ARMS, OTHER IMPORTS

Port-of-Spain TRINIDAD GUARDIAN in English 22 Oct 81 p 3

[Text] SCORES of venders stood bewildered as they were confronted by heavily armed policemen with self-loading rifles (SLR's) in and around the Caricom Jetty, Queen's Wharf, Port-of-Spain, yesterday morning.

It was the start of a massive joint exercise involving Customs and Excise officers, members of the Trinidad and Tobago Police Service including plain-clothes men as well as seamen, soldiers with their metal detectors and Port Authority security guards.

Comptroller of Customs and Excise, Mr. Victor Cockburn, headed the Customs contingent; Asst. Commissioner (Crime) Winfield Hinds, the detachment of detectives while Asst. Supt. Desmond Prime led the uniformed policemen.

THOROUGH SEARCH

In the exercise many persons were stopped and a thorough search was made of vessels. Cargo was passed through the scanner to detect arms or ammunition, and bags and baskets were searched for narcotics and smuggled goods.

Mr. Cockburn, who had to hurry off to a meeting, left Customs Officer Neville Bridgewater and about 15 men to assist in the rummage of goods.

Information revealed that the exercise stemmed from numerous reports made by acting Sgt. Alic Prosper of Port Authority Security Guard Force with respect to the manner with which the venders were effecting sales in the area.

This, he said, conflicted with the Market Bye-laws which banned such sale of marketable produce within the one mile city limit. There were also complaints of littering in the area.

Customs Officer Bridgewater disclosed that all schooners coming to Trinidad from all Caricom countries, are to be properly checked for arms, ammunition and narcotics.

"We will be working round-the-clock in this exercise and busiest days will be between Tuesday evening to Thursday morning," he added.

Yesterday morning a number of boats were first checked by Immigration Officers at the Boarding Station, Wrightson Road, before mooring alongside the Caricom Jetty.

There crates, bags, cartons and boxes containing avocado pears, limes, corn, mangoes, dry coconuts, plantains, bananas, plums, sugar apples, chataigne and pommecythere among other commodities were opened and checked.

The M/V Gliding Star also brought in a cargo of sheep and goats which up to 1 p.m. were still on board awaiting arrival of the Port Medical Officer.

Bona Fide venders were allowed to enter the area in batches at varying intervals to avoid over-crowding. The exercise continues this morning.

ENVOY FROM MEXICO--Mexico has assigned its first resident ambassador to Trinidad and Tobago seven months after it established the embassy. Yesterday, Mr Antonio C. Villalva Acevedo presented his credentials to President Ellis Clarke as Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of Mexico. The embassy was established in March to foster even more the excellent relations between both countries and to increase cooperation in the educational, scientific, technical cultural and economic fields. PROTEST OF 'GUARDIAN'--Trinidadians continue to protest distorted and malicious press reports about the Grenada Revolution in their local media. Last Friday, members of the Committee Against United States Aggression (CAUSA) picketed the offices of the TRINIDAD GUARDIAN, to protest the propaganda campaign in the two daily newspapers. According to the EXPRESS of last Saturday, a CAUSA spokeswoman said CAUSA was determined to bring an end to attempts to destabilise the PRG, and to give Grenadians a chance to chart their own path of social development, "and further establish ties with any states and peoples in accordance with their rights to self-determination." CAUSA is also demanding that the Trinidad and Tobago government establish normal diplomatic and trade relations with the PRG immediately. SOCIALIST COUNTRIES MEET TO DISCUSS IDEOLOGICAL STRUGGLE

Caracas EL NACIONAL in Spanish 29 Oct 81 p D-12

[Article by E.B.]

[Text] "There are some minds who are able to dream and even to expound on the ways to improve socialism, who seem not to understand what to do, and that consolidating the revolution implies dealing with the consequences of reactionary activity, the aggressiveness of imperialism, and that it imposes a series of conditions that must be heeded. Cuba, blockaded more than 20 years ago and assaulted in all ways imaginable, is an example of the dramatic reality of this alternative."

This paragraph, taken from the speech by Jorge Barrata, member of the Historical Institute of the Worker's Movement from Cuba, and adjunct to the Communist Party Central Committee, reflects two concepts agreed upon by many of those attending the forum on "The Real Dimension of True Socialism".

The first of these concepts is that true socialism is what exists currently in socialist countries. It is that which strives for the material and spiritual well-being of mankind; that which does not permit inequalities between classes, which does not accept the exploitation of man by man. That which--as Miguel Acosta Saignes says--strives for peace.

The second thought refers to the obstacles to the full achievement of this "true socialism". The basic impediment can be summarized in one term: Capitalism.

The forum on "true socialism" is taking place in the Central Park in the midst of an austerity that would make President Herrera envious, with the participation of common people, workers, farmers as well as professionals, technical experts and outstanding ideologists, anthropologists, sociologists and academicians from the majority of the world's socialist countries, and in a climate of serious participation, without any conflict whatsoever.

Yesterday morning around 200 people were present. The international delegates pay all of their own expenses. The wealthier Venezuelans registered for 300 bolivares and the workers and farmers for 100. There is no display of interpreters or microphones, nor any appetizers, coffee breaks or cocktail hours. Only pamphlets, books and lofty ideological discussions are in evidence everywhere.

The absence of Poland, Rumania and Yugoslavaia was notable. They were all invited, according to Radames Larrazabal, one of the organizers of the event, but they all declined for one reason or another. Poland apparently spoke of its internal situation, which takes precedence for them at this time.

Anyway, many of the socialists present at the meeting in Central Park blame the communist party of that country for its current problems.

Yesterday the representatives of Cuba, Czechoslovakia and Venezuela spoke during the morning session.

The Soviet Union and the German Democratic Republic were scheduled to speak, but they did not arrive in Venezuela on time. They are expected to arrive today.

The objective of the forum is to hear directly from the representatives of each country the problems facing socialism. "Since the information about socialist countries that reaches Venezuela is for the most part distorted, we felt it was very worthwhile to hear from the socialist delegates themselves their statement of the difficulties they face in developing socialism within their respective nations. They have also listened to the questions posed by those attending the forum," said Miguel Acosta Saignes of the event.

Caracas has become an ideological discussion center with the realization of this forum, which constitutes a challenge by true socialism to bourgeois ideology in all of its forms," stated Radames Larrazabal.

"The reasons motivating the convening of this seminar belong to the realm of the ideological struggle. More than espousing a body of knowledge, it has to do with defending it against distortion from any source" explained the Cuban delegates.

The Czechoslovaks, through the voice of the head of their delegation, Jaroslav Kase, believe that "true socialism" is the satisfaction of the vital needs of the entire population.... Many of the opinions expressed about this ideal and the obstacles to achieving it, are, in one form or another the focus, the purpose of those participating in this forum.

PRESIDENTIAL VISIT SEEN STRENGTHENING TIES WITH PRC

Caracas EL NACIONAL in Spanish 30 Oct 81 p A-8

[Editorial by Gregorio Montiel Cupello: "Another Goal"]

[Text] President Luis Herrera Campins' trip to China marks the highest point recorded to date in another of the foreign policy goals of the current Venezuelan administration: that of forming closer ties with Peking.

Since Venezuela and China established diplomatic relations in 1974, Caracas had not shown as much interest in relations with the People's Republic as has the Herrera Campins government and the governing COPEI [Social Christian Party] as well.

During the last 2 years Venezuelan political leaders of such prominence as Eduardo Fernandez, Rafael Caldera, Pedro Pablo Aguilar and even the minister of foreign relations himself, Jose Alberto Zambrano Velasco, have visited China.

When Caldera was in Peking together with Chinese leaders, he made an unsettling toast to the friendship between the Venezuelan and Chinese people, and the COPEI and Chinese Communist Party.

When Zambrano Velasco visited China along with the leaders of that country he announced his condemnation of Cuban and Soviet expansionism in Central America and the Caribbean, disseminated throughout the world by the international agencies. In Caracas, the minister's attitude was viewed dimly by some observers of the international scene, who interpreted it as being a form of Venezuela's meddling in the extremely delicate problem of the China-USSR conflict.

For its part, Peking, which is highly interested in expanding its relations with Latin America, has made its own overtures to ally itself with Caracas. Various delegations of the Chinese Communist Party and the Government of the People's Republic of China, among them Chancellor Huang Hua, have come recently to Venezuela.

Under Romulo Betancourt's government any relations with China were impossible due to the resolute anti-communist position of the deceased leader of Democratic Action. Also, it must be remembered that that time the only country on the American continent with which Peking maintained diplomatic relations was Cuba, whose government was one of Betancourt's prime enemies.

Because of the distancing between China and the Soviet Union, the USSR's tehnical experts left Chinese territory and the people's republic began the rough road on its own.

But the enmity with Moscow and the growing need for modern technology made it more and more imperative for China to form some new kind of alliances. Besides, the West, due to matters of international strategy, also needed to approach the communist Chinese and use the friction between the two communist giants to its advantage.

Thus China began making important changes in its foreign policy with Richard Nixon's historic visit.

With the death of Mao and the imprisoning of the ultra-leftist"Gang of Four," lead by Jiang Qing, widow of the "Great Helmsman", the rapprochement with the West as well as a series of internal modifications were strengthened.

In this way China, which previously showed sympathy for the Latin American guerrilla movement, today joins with Venezuela in supporting Napoleon Duarte's government in El Salvador.

Also, just as Peking--within the framework of its present foreign policy--has strengthened its ties with Pinochet's Chile, has warmly greeted the Turkish military dictatorship, and has even come to support the frustrated military coup in Spain, so Venezuela--for its own international ends--did not hesitate to rub elbows with the most ill-fated of the Latin American dictatorships in order to counteract Mexico's and France's statement with regard to El Salvador.

This latter is very reminiscent of the positions taken by Ronald Reagan's government in upholding its preference for authoritarian governments cast in the military mold, over those that are communist and totalitarian in nature.

It is not unfounded that the leaders of the Venezuelan Communist Party, like Radames Larrazabal, have begun to signal the existence of a new Washington-Peking-Caracas axis.

For the time being, the Venezuelan Government has insisted that President Herrera's current tour through Asia is only an attempt at greater rapprochement between Venezuela and the Far East.

Meanwhile, President Herrera is making an interested visit to a China that has introduced changes into its way of understanding communism in order to escape its extreme poverty, and which has nothing at all to do with the days of the "let one hundred blossoms'" liberalizing campaign, "the Great Leap Forward" or "the Cultural Revolution." This is another China, that may well still call itself Communist, but that had no trouble in presenting an ostentatious parade of Pierre Cardin fashions in the streets of Peking, nor in welcoming Coca-Cola.

CHIVOR PLANT TO GENERATE 500,000 KW

Bogota EL TIEMPO in Spanish 20 Oct 81 Sec B p 1

[Article by special correspondent German Navarrete: "Chivor Will Generate 500,000 Kilowatts"]

[Text] Santa Maria (Boyaca), 19 October-- After 27 years of studies and projects which required investments of 20 billion pesos and gave direct and indirect employment to over 12,000 persons, the Chivor Hydroelectric Powerplant is ready to be subjected to water tests in November, and to go into service in December, thereby solving the energy crisis that confronts the country.

This announcement was made by the manager of Electric Interconnection, Inc (ISA), German Jaramillo Olano, upon the completion of an inspection, together with EL TIEMPO, of the powerplant works, attesting to how this project has benefited thousands of farmers in 30 rural areas of Boyaca adjacent to the powerplant, with waterworks, sewerage, health stations, schools, secondary schools, roads, churches and other services.

Jaramillo Olano supplemented the announcements made the day before by the minister of mines and energy, Carlos Rodado Noriega, regarding the date of the lifting of rationing for electric power, which has been in effect for a year and 20 days as of today, declaring:

"In mid-November, the Alto Anchicaya Hydroelectric Powerplant will be in operation again, contributing 340,000 kilowatts to the national interconnected system; and, in December, we shall start generating half a million more kilowatts from Chivor. This means that, by the end of this year, Colombia will be receiving an additional 840,000 kilowatts."

The ISA manager, Jaramillo Olano, and the chief of operations at Chivor, engineer Jose Rodrigo Viteri Martinez, underscored the importance for the final solution to the energy rationing represented by the starting of the second phase of Chivor; because it will guarantee that, in 1982, Colombians will be able to normalize their systems of family, commercial and industrial activity.

27 Years of Effort

Jaramillo recalled that, in 1954, mention was made for the first time of the possibility of regulating the water of the Bata River, in Boyaca, on a site that is reached after nearly 5 hours over bare road via the Bogota-El Sisga-Guateque-Santa Maria route, which is currently under military patrol and police control because it is an area with abundant emeralds.

The exploration of the volumes of flow, the analysis of the type of soil on which the work would be done, the geological conformation of the Eastern Cordillera, where the digging of tunnels would take place, and the construction of powerhouses and additional works gave rise to the preparation of prefeasibility, feasibility and design studies on the part of the Bogota Electric Power Company which lasted for 15 years.

The construction was undertaken by ISA in two stages. The first began in 1971 and ended in 1977. The second started in 1976 and, with the exception of the conduit well and the installation of the pressure piping, the work was finished last year.

The powerhouse, the equipment and the upper tunnel will go into service upon the completion of 3 percent of the construction work that still remains to be done, but which will end within a few days.

What Is Chivor?

Chivor has a capacity to generate 1 million kilowatts. It is the first major powerplant built by Electric Interconnection, Inc, and is one of the most important projects that the present government has promoted to extricate the country from the energy dilemma that has been experienced since 1980.

For its operation, the water from the Bata River is used, with an average volume of flow of 62.3 cubic meters per second, formed by the confluence of the Somondoco and Garagoa Rivers.

The area in which a dam 237 meters high was built to contain the water from the Bata River, as well as the powerhouse in which the million kilowatts will be generated, is typified by a series of mountains with barren soil (where, according to the farmers, "one can only plant with a shotgun"), where a dwelling is found only occasionally.

The Bata River water is carried through 5,910 meters of tunnel which is 5.40 meters in diameter, and 2,444 meters of pipework which is 4 meters in diameter, to the powerhouse, located on the left bank of the Lengupa River, thus utilizing a net fall of 756 meters, according to the explanation given by Rodrigo Jaramillo Velasquez, ISA's publicity chief.

The reservoir formed by the Bata water has a volume of 758 million cubic meters, 633.5 million of which correspond to the effective reservoir.

In order to replace the section of the national highway between Guateque and Santa Maria flooded by the reservoir, a new Mondragon-Presa-Muros road was built, 27 kilometers long, 6.5 kilometers of which are in the tunnel. The route from Bogota to the powerplant is marked by 14 tunnels, which turn the trip into an adventure.

Jaramillo Olano emphasized the benefits accrued by the residents of 32 rural areas of Boyaca as a result of the construction of the hydroelectric powerplant, and said that they include particularly the residents of Tona, Suguique, Boya I and II, Hipaquira, Los Cedros, La Vega, Volador Grande and Volador Chiquito, Pantanos, Quebradanegra, Limon, Naranjos, Media Estancia and El Guavio. A second stage of construction work will benefit San Rafael, Calichano, San Agustin, Guayabal, Azada, Chiquita, El Pino, Chivor Centro and Chivor Chiquito, Guali and Higueron.

Increase From Reservoirs

Jaramillo Olano explained that the confidence of the government and the electrical sector in the solution to the energy crisis that caused the rationing has been heightened recently by the increased volume of flow from the reservoirs as shown below, according to yesterday's records:

Reservoir	Region	Percentage
Muna	Bogota	45
Agregado (Sisga, Neusa and Guatavita)	Bogota	30
Miraflores	Antioquia	65
Troneras	Antioquia	62
El Penol	Antioquia	66
Calima	Valle	52
Alto Anchicaya	Valle	71
Chivor	Boyaca	90

The construction of the Chivor Hydroelectric Powerplant the dam of which is located in a narrow gorge of the Eastern Cordillera became a real challenge for national engineering. At the bottom of that gorge, for many years thousands of men worked day and night, withstanding water and sun, to make the facility that will provide an additional 500,000 kilowatts.

10-YEAR ELECTRIC POWER PLANS DISCUSSED

Bogota EL ESPECTADOR in Spanish 27 Oct 81 Sec D pp 1, 4

[Text] During the next 10 years, the national electric sector will generate 10 billion watts with the hydroelectric and thermoelectric projects, the majority of which are under construction, and are expected to be in operation by the end of this decade.

According to data from the semiannual report of the National Integration Plan, there are studies for the next 10 years on 10 hydroelectric and 12 thermoelectric plants. The former will generate a total of 8,846 megawatts, and the others, 1,331, making a total of 9,817 Mw. In December of last year, the installed capacity of the hydroelectric plants was 2,903 Mw, and that of the thermoelectric plants was 1,922 Mw; which means that the increase in the generation of power for this decade will be approximately 200 percent, in comparison with the current capacity.

The Projects

During the period between this month and August of next year, the Paipa III powerplant with 66 Mw, the Chivor III plant with 500 Mw, the San Carlos I project with 620 Mw and the emergency project designed for the present crisis, consisting of several turbogas plants for generating electricity with a total potential of 199 Mw, will go into operation.

Also, before the end of this year, it is expected that the Chivor II hydroelectric plant with a capacity of 500 Mw, and the Thermo-Paipa III thermoelectric plant with 66 million watts will go into service.

The following power generating plants have been planned for next year: Ayura, with 19 Mw; Thermo-Cerrejon I, with 170 Mw; and San Carlos I, with the capacity already cited. Planned for 1983 are: Termo-Zipa V, to generate 66 Mw; and the Bogota Power Company's Paraiso La Guaca project, with 600 Mw. In 1984, the following will go into operation: San Carlos II, with 620 Mw; the Jaguas powerplant, with 170 Mw; Thermo-Tasajero, with 150 Mw; Salvajina which, in addition to producing power, will control the flooding caused by the Cauca River, with 270 Mw; and the Medellin Public Enterprises' Guadalupe IV project, with 213 Mw.

In 1985, Thermo-Cerrejon II will generate 150 Mw; and, in 1986, the Playas Powerplant (200 Mw) and ICEL's [Colombian Electric Power Institute] Betania, with 500 Mw, will go into service. There are plans for a thermal plant for CORELCA [Electric Corporation of the Atlantic Coast], on the Atlantic Coast, with a capacity of 150 Mw, and two others to be run by the Bogota Electric Power Company and Electric Interconnection, Inc, respectively, each with 150 Mw, which have been planned in anticipation of some delay in the Guavio and Aburra powerplants. By 1987, the Rio Grande II project, with 204 Mw, and the Miel I, run by the Caldas Hydroelectric Company (CHEC), with 384 Mw, will be ready. In 1988, the Guavio hydroelectric complex, with 1,000 Mw, and that of Urra, which is the largest project on the Atlantic Coast, run by CORELCA, with the largest dam in the country, which will generate 1,050 million watts, will go into service. By 1990, it is expected that the work on the Cana Fisto powerplant, of Electric Interconnection, Inc, and the second phase of the La Miel hydroelectric plant, run by ICEL and CHEC, will be completed.

The Crisis

The energy rationing is expected to be ended throughout the country next April. This began over a year ago, as a result of the widespread drought which marked the year 1980, causing the country's main reservoirs to show the most critical levels in their history. Moreover, complications in the construction work and problems of a financial nature hampered the progress of the projects planned midway in the 1970's, which were supposedly due to start generating power between 1980 and 1983.

There is still a deficit in the installed capacity, and the reservoirs have not yet recovered; but it is anticipated that this year's winter (which has already started) will succeed in reestablishing them. For example, in Bogota, consideration is being given to stopping the rationing on 16 December, because a considerable increase in the water level has already been noted.

Financing

One of the factors which has perhaps had the greatest effect on the current rationing is that of the financing of the electrical sector. For the construction of the various powerplants, whether they be hydroelectric or thermoelectric, there are two main sources of financing, external and internal.

The deficiencies in the latter, as well as the unforeseen factors in the construction, have caused the projects to take more time than planned. But, apart from the lag caused by the procurement of external credit, there is the problem of local financing, which is the most serious one.

Energy sales are the basic resources of the companies in the electrical sector and, owing to the low rate that existed during the 1970's, the local resources were minimal. In 10 years, these rates rose only 1 centavo per kilowatt hour; in other words, during 1970 a kw/h cost 22 centavos, and in 1980 it cost 1.53 pesos which, in 1970 pesos (taking the devaluation into account), would be equivalent to 23 centavos.

This year's budget for the electrical sector was 9 billion pesos, which were appropriated for investment and payment of the foreign debt.

Special Line

A special line is being installed for an electric interconnection of the Coast with the central section of the country which, by the second half of 1983, will carry 500 kilovolts. This line is expected to go into partial operation during the first half of next year, with a capacity of 220 kilovolts which, in the event of another drought and a lower level in the reservoirs of the interior, could provide power from the thermoelectric plants in that part of the country, which operate primarily with coal or gas.

CERREJON TO ADD 15 MILLION TONS TO COAL PRODUCTION

Bogota EL ESPECTADOR in Spanish 27 Oct 81 Sec D p 5

[Article by Gabriel Angel Ardila: "Cerrejon Reinforces by 15 Million"]

[Text] Coal production in Colombia which, in 1979, reached indexes of 3.5 million tons per year, will receive the not to be underestimated amount of 15 million tons per year that can be obtained from El Cerrejon by 1985. So, that product has become the great energy and economic hope for national production.

The foregoing does not take into account the 134.5 million tons of proven reserves in the central and northern parts of the country.

The research carried out at El Cerrejon indicated that its thermal coal is high-powered. Thus, Colombia has cokable types for the iron and steel industry that will allow for gasification and liquefaction processes in order to obtain appropriate fuels for replacing fuel oil, and even gasoline itself.

Future Coal Promise

By 1990, an annual production of 35 million tons has been estimated, according to reports from the Ministry of Mines and Energy. The consumption margins will allow for exporting by 1985.

And the future of coal exports could not be better, according to the prospects set forth by the International Energy Organization, IEO. It cites the possibility that, by the year 2000, all the European countries will be importing coal, except for the United Kingdom, which has the best chances for exploitation.

The exporters' plan for the years following 1990 is in this order: Australia, the United States, Canada, Mozambique, Indonesia, India, Colombia, South Africa and China.

But the progress of coal will require a new dimension in the management of the sector. Among other things, it will be necessary to change our port policies. There will have to be ports with a capacity for over 80,000 dead weight tons. Elsewhere in the world, such docking places are used only for the steel industry, "rather than for power plants."

Countries with very high rates of energy consumption, such as the United States, will cut their oil imports. North America will do so by about 3.2 million barrels per day by 1990, and 7.3 million barrels per day by the year 2000.

Current Energy Picture

Colombia's future in the energy field appears promising, despite the current gloomy picture, with rationing and everything. At least the economist Hernan Medina Torres, in detailed studies for ANIF [National Association of Financial Institutions], cites the national energy situation in such terms, "without any great shocks."

He notes that it is obviously impossible to emerge from rationing before April 1982, since it will intensify during the summers from January to April, and then decline in the winter from May onward. However, he cautions that, despite the new plants and watercourses that will be diverted, as well as the interconnection with the Atlantic Coast, "the entire sector will be at the mercy of the whims of the weather."

Measures for the Medium Term

Scheduled for March 1982 is the diversion of the Pajarito, Dolores, Nachi and Guadalupe Rivers, in northern Colombia, sources which will contribute 9 cubic meters of water per second to the hydroelectric system.

In April, a small plant with 19 Mw will go into service in Antioquia (Ayura), accompanied by the winter season, "which should extricate the country from rationing." There will also be results from the expansions in Guadalupe and Troneras, carried out by the Medellin Public Enterprises, which are due to start commercial operation with 126 Mw by June 1982. In Dr Medina Torres' assessment, there will be available 12.5 cubic meters per second from the Tunjita River in the Chivor reservoir; which in July will enable the country to insure the operation of Chivor II, " and with it a minimal level of energy that will make the system partially independent of the uncertainty of the rainfall."

The specialist's data claims that there will be a second half of 1982 without shocks, upon the entry into operation of the San Carlos I project, with an installed capacity of 620 Mw, in October of that year. Dr Hernan Medina Torres stressed that this powerplant is one of the largest built to date, with a capacity for 1,000 Mw.

Energy and Coal Future

There is no concealment of the government's concern with completing the projects that have been started, on which both the nation's energy development and its economic development will depend. Nor is there any concealment of the critical position assumed by the analyst Medina Torres, when in his reports, he states that Colombia's energy problems are more closely related to the rate of economic development and the financial management of the projects than to the weather factors that have been argued.

CHILE, ECUADOR TO NORMALIZE RELATIONS--Santiago, 18 Nov (AFP)--Abelardo Posso Serrano, Ecuadorean charge d'affaires in this capital, told AFP that Ecuador and Chile are very well-disposed to normalize their diplomatic relations which deteriorated 3 months ago when the Ecuadorean Government recalled its ambassador from Santiago. This afternoon the Ecuadorean diplomat met with Fabio Vio, chief of the Chilean Foreign Ministry cabinet, in what he termed a routine meeting. He stated, however, that no date has yet been fixed for the return to Santiago of Ambassador Gustavo Cordovez, who was recalled for consultation by the Ecuadorean Government in August in a reaction to statements attributed to Chilean Foreign Minister Rene Rojas Galdames. In these statements Rojas Galdames maintained that the 1942 protocol signed between Peru and Ecuador was still in force. The Ecuardorean authorities had requested a revision of the mentioned protocol after the border incident between the two countries in the Condor Mountain range in January. After these statements Ecuador requested an explanation from Chile. Chile delivered its answer through diplomatic channels, according to what was disclosed. Chile is one of the four guarantor countries of the 1942 protocol, together with Brazil, Argentina and the United States. [Text] [PY191351 Paris AFP in Spanish 0036 GMT 19 Nov 81]

DAILY HAILS REAGAN'S PRESS CLUB SPEECH

PY242205 Buenos Aires LA PRENSA in Spanish 23 Nov 81 Section 2 p 1

[Editorial: "A Historic Proposal"]

[Text] Recently, the world has been informed of President Reagan's speech at the National Press Club in Washington, a speech which could be termed historic. It is not that proposals of this kind have not been made before, either by U.S. statesmen or by those of other countries, but because on this occasion the proposal appeared surrounded by an aura of feelings whose sincerity and depth was made obvious by the moderation with which they were expressed. Reagan urged the Soviet Union to "take a giant step for mankind," by joining the efforts of his government and people to carry out a substantial reduction of conventional and nuclear weapons in Europe and the rest of the world. "This would be a historic step" he said, and "like the first step on the moon, would be a giant step for mankind."

President Reagan cast aside all technicalities and went unhesitatingly to the core of the problem which today plagues the minds of the people in the world by basing his plan on "equitable proposals" because "we cannot reduce arms unilaterally. Success can only come if the Soviet Union will share our commitment; if it will demonstrate that its often repeated professions of concern for peace will be matched by positive actions."

However, President Reagan did not plead for peace. His stand was the opposite of that in Munich. He said: "The more effective our forces are, the less likely it is that we will have to use them."

President Reagan's historic speech broadcast by TV to all of the United States, to Western Europe, to Poland, Romania and Hungary behind the iron curtain, and also to various African countries to Lebanon, Japan, Egypt and China [not further identified], is a significant landmark in the quest for world peace.

By hastening to answer, Moscow made its most obvious mistake. No sooner had Reagan finished his speech than Brezhnev rejected the proposal terming it "mere propaganda" and negating Soviet superiority in Europe as far as strategical weapons are concerned and accusing Washington of seeking only to gain "prestige in the eyes of international public opinion."

President Reagan asked for "openness" and "creativity", that is truth and supporting facts, from the Kremlin. It is possible that the manner of speech of the U.S. chief of state has taken the "Politburo" top echelon by surprise, since they are used to less direct statements and to attitudes and moves which the Kremlin has interpreted as a weakening of the West's defensive will.

The official White House statement--which has revealed a far-sighted attitude and strategy--has instilled vigor in the spirit of the West. It has provided arguments and strength of conviction to those all over the world who see that world control by the Soviet Union, sought as a "feat of freedom," would mean a slip-back of centuries in the progress of humanity.

DAILY DOUBTS SUCCESS OF REAGAN PROPOSAL

PY242204 Buenos Aires LA NACION in Spanish 22 Nov 81 p 8

[Editorial: "Nuclear Disarmament, Proposal and Answer"]

[Text] With a remarkable mass media display President Reagan has informed the entire world--particularly Europe--of his proposal to the Soviet Union on disarmament. In essence the proposal calls on the Kremlin to dismantle its nuclear missiles--SS-20, SS-4, and SS-5 rockets--while the United States commits itself to cancel the deployment of its Pershing II and cruise missiles. In sum a reciprocal disarmament that will decrease the risk of an eventual nuclear war in the European continent.

The U.S. President stated that this was a historic decision in the path to achieve human coexistence and said it was as important as man's first step on the moon.

The importance of President Reagan's decision is obvious since it is an extremely important issue in view of the forthcoming round of negotiations--to be held on 30 November in Geneva--that the two powers will hold on the reduction of nuclear arms. Moreover, there is great concern in this regard and the so-called peace and neutrality movements, which openly oppose the installation of nuclear missiles by the United States, are obtaining large number of supporters. The timing and means chosen by President Reagan have made a spectacular impact but the real intent and his chances of being successful are doubtful.

But this can also be applied to the sudden and hasty answer given by Moscow. The most blatant denial was issued through the official Soviet agency, TASS, in such terms that can only be understood as an implicit refusal to dismantle the SS-20 missiles.

In addition Brezhnev today begins a 4-day official visit to Bonn. Undoubtedly one of the main subjects to be discussed in Brezhnev's third visit to Bonn--his first to the West in 2 years--will be Soviet-U.S. relations.

Although Moscow has not hesitated to reject this proposal, European countries have given their ample support to the U.S. President's proposal. The UK, France, and Italy have been categorical in their support. Mr Spadolini expressed his support at the end of a meeting with French President Mitterrand, while the French foreign minister, Calude Cheysson, said that it was "a desired solution" to the issue of the deployment of missiles in Europe.

Since detente and disarmament have resulted in a series of disappointments for those governments determined to achieve peaceful coexistence but which at the same time do not want to dismantle their garrisons in view of the Soviet expansion, it is best not to harbor any hopes in this regard and rather follow closely the forthcoming negotiations between Haig and Gromyko scheduled to be held shortly. It is not expected, moreover, that Brezhnev--who seemed to be taken by surprise by President Reagan's tactic--will disclose his real intentions on this issue during his stay in the FRG capital.

At any rate the blatant denial given by the Soviets reveals how displeased they are at having been out flanked by the United States. Public opinion in Europe and the rest of the Western world seems to have understood--and it is hoped this has been the case--the fallacy of Moscow's arguments to justify its strong deployment of missiles and its opposition to the installation of missiles by NATO.

In view of all these things that can be appreciated by those who are outside foreign ministry circles, it is suitable for them to follow closely subsequent diplomatic negotiations with a realistic outlook.

The first step has been taken, a sort of warning to Moscow: a stop to the deployment of missiles must be reciprocal. If there is indeed a desire to achieve peaceful coexistence, it will be hard but not impossible to establish those regulations that will lead to the path of peace.

BRIEFS

UCR DOCUMENT AT ISSUE--Cordoba, 24 Nov (NA)--Gen Cristino Nicolaides, commander of the Third Corps has submitted to Federal Judge Manuel Gonzalez Pizarro the background information related to the communique issued by the Cordoba Radical Civic Union (UCR) Committee, in the belief that this communique has violated the national security law. The general's report tied the UCR document published by the newspaper LA VOZ DEL INTERIOR to the above mentioned law which is aimed at repressing subversive activities and the dissemination of news related to these activities. On request from the commander of the Third Corps the Cordoba UCR committee reaffirmed the contents of the questioned document which, among other things, had stated that the government has "made the country kneel before the multinationals." The conflict has shaken the political circles of the nation and the UCR has publicly stated its solidarity with the Cordoba committee. PASSARINHO DISCUSSES CHURCH, MILITARY, VIOLENCE IN SOCIETY

Rio de Janeiro MANCHETE in Portuguese 19 Sep 81 pp 24-26

Jarbas Passarinho is not only an upright man of pure feelings, he is a man with a brilliant intellect which distinguished him in his military career and is projecting him in political life. To converse with him for 3 hours around the luncheon table was an enriching experience. Dona Ruth served shrimp salad, roast beef with beans and manioc meal and white wine. Jarbas Passarinho displayed his verve, his intelligence and his erudition, seasoning our meeting with a pleasing spice that many are familiar with since his speeches in the Porto Alegre Military School and in Realengo, or from the fiery speeches in the military clubs and at the foot of the tomb of Major Vaz in August 1954.

I recall that during presidential travels in which he participated, Senator Passarinho stayed in his plane seat, when he was not in President Figueiredo's cabin, absorbed in reading some foreign book. And he read everything: political essays, philosophy, novels, economy, religion.

When he arrived for lunch he had a religious book in his hand: "Speeches of the Pope in Brazil," based on the texts distributed by the National Conference of Brazilian Bishops (CNBB). He opens the book, saying, "This is my church," and reads the words of the Pope in Morumbi Stadium: "The common good cannot be gained through violence...even when it is sought to impose the necessary changes." And further on: "The class struggle is not the road that leads to social order because it carries with it the risk of elevating the disadvantaged to the role of privileged. It is not built with hatred and the destruction of others."

He is preparing a speech which he will make within the next few days in the senate on the incitement to the invasion of land by some sectors of the Church. This charge, made in an interview with FOLHA DE SAO PAULO, has made him the target of intense criticism by the bishops.

"Just see how the Pope was clear here in Brazil about the Grassroots Ecclesial Communities":..."the grassroots to which we are referring is of a clearly ecclesial and not merely of a sociologic or other nature. I also underscore that ecclesiality because the danger of diminishing that dimension, if not letting it disappear in exchange for another, is not unreal or remote; rather, the danger of interfering in politics is always present and particularly persistent." Another form to which the Holy Father refers: "The interference, therefore, can appear in the form of the political or ideological manipulation of the communities that had been established within an ecclesial perspective." That is, they are established within an ecclesial perspective and are politically or ideologically manipulated to become instruments for that purpose. It is a warning by the Pope; he would not have said that if he had not wanted to issue a warning. He speaks about the communities that grew in Latin America, "because they knew how to maintain the ecclesial dimension without deviations or changes." His Holiness said that in Manaus, explained Passarinho, leafing through the book.

We are going to go to the table. The senator receives a quick visit from his son Jarbas Junior, who is a doctor, and kisses him affectionately. He and Dona Ruth have five children--three girls and two boys--and seven grandchildren, all living in Brasilia. Dona Ruth is still the directress of the Tiny Thumb Home, where she today houses about 100 orphan children, children of tubercular parents. "She gained 100 children and I became an orphan," kids Passarinho. We sat down and he recalls the visit he made to the church in Coruca, in the interior of Para, where banners with the slogan "Oppressed of All the Rural Countryside, Unite" filled the nave of the church, covering the statue of Christ. I cite the complaint of my mother who went to church in Porto Alegre last Sunday and all she heard was the priest talking bad about Minister Delfim Netto.

"There is a CNBB document titled "Christian Reflections on a Political Juncture." Perhaps we should write a "Political Reflection on a Christian Juncture," said the senator sarcastically.

"I Have Never Accused Any Member of the Catholic Church of Being a Communist"

[Question] According to you, the sermons have become political rallies.

[Answer] Many people are fleeing from the Church because of preaching that is not only secular but typically political. The option in favor of the poor is correct. The poor should be the greatest object of concern by the priests. But the Pope spoke about a "preferential" not "exclusive" option. So it does not mean that whoever is not poor is a bad Christian.

[Question] Some bishops responded to your interview with FOLHA DE SAO PAULO by saying that you do not have any proof that the Church is inciting invasions.

[Answer] I do not pretend to have proof that the Church is inciting invasions because I understand the Church as an institution. I have proof about facts pertaining to some members of the Church. I am going to make them public within a few days. Those two arrests of French priests in Sao Geraldo do Araguaia are the result of the testimony of the perpetrators of the ambush that killed the federal delegate and wounded government officials. They named the priests as the masterminds of the ambush. The other day, a native of Bahia, who bought land in Para with the savings of a lifetime of work told me that his property has already had 200 invaders. He asked them who directed them and they replied: "The priests and the bishop of Maraba." The thing reached such a point that he blurted out: "I am not going to give up anything else. Either they kill me or I will kill them." Another typical example is the invasion of the campus of the Federal University of Para. I arrived there and found banners with: "The Right to Land Is a Natural Right," all well written, with the crasis and everything. I asked one of them: "Are you a university student?" "No," he replied, "I am a homesteader. I lived with an uncle of mine in Belem before invading this here." Then a highly intellectualized girl interrupted him: "Never say that you are an invader. You are a homesteader." And the university is a land-grabber. With that simplistic logic: "Every invader is a homesteader and every property-owner is a land-grabber"; it is difficult to understand.

He offers me more salad. "Do you want more Para shrimp? It's delicious."

[Question] You say that there is "an authentic socialist party in Brazil." Where is that party?

[Answer] It is in that wing of the Church, in that Christian socialist wing. It is a socialist party because it acts as such. So much so that it rejects any form of capitalism and declares that socialism is the solution. We have all already heard statements in that regard: Dom Helder, Dom Valdir Calheiros, the bishop of Joazeiro, Dom Jose. I did not see that in Populorum Progressio or in Mater et Magistra [papal encyclicals].

[Question] But isn't it a social Christianity?

[Answer] No. They call it Christian socialism. In that order of priority. They say that socialism as a political and economic system is the only one that is compatible with the doctrine of the Church. But the Pope speaks of the need to be ecclesial and not political. The CNBB says they should not be partisan but the tracts that are being published say the opposite; they attack the PDS in the harshest manner, as well as the PP. The Workers Party is the ideal party for them. The Brazilian Democratic Movement Party (PMDB) comes in as an alternative, with the Democratic Labor Party (PDT) coming in last, although today's Brizola identifies himself with social democracy.

[Answer] I never called anybody a communist, not even Dom Pedro Casaldaliga. What I say is that many are using the Marxist doctrine. I never accused anybody of belonging to the Communist Party.

Jarbas Passarinho receives the plate from Dona Ruth, who served him rice, beans and roast beef with manioc meal. "A cardinal, acting like a first-term concilman, immediately believes the story of the reporter who asks him: "What do you have to say about Senator Passarinho, who accused the Church?" He did not read what I said and immediately attacks me. Another one, whom I respect very much, who has the odor of sanctity, says from the lofty height of his 90 years that I am an overgrown boy. True, I am 61 years old. Then comes another: "I make it a point to call him colonel." Perfect. It is an honor for me. I gained that rank in two competitive exams: first, in the Military School, where there were 3,000 candidates for 200 vacancies; then, I had to go to post-graduate school and the general staff school in another competitive exam. I do not know how many bishops were requested to attend the seminary and later were appointed by the Pope. So, between the two positions, I consider mine, that of a colonel, very honorable. Nor was I requested to be a cadet. Three sons of generals and I, the son of a machinist and merchant marine engine officer, passed, and I take great pride in that. I was not appointed a colonel by the personal preference of anybody. I was promoted by what I achieved. So I do not feel demeaned when a man, in the heat of emotion, says that. However, for my taste, he should not be a bishop but a good opposition leader (Dom Angelico Sandalo). Fragrant and angelic [literally, "angelic sandalwood"], but terrible when he opens his mouth and speaks. I admire him but he in his field and I in mine."

"The Politicians Think of Extension; the Ministry, of Elections"

[Question] On the eve of 1964 there was only one case of a shootout over a land claim, in Minas, and fires in some canefields in the Northeast. The dimensions of the confrontation today are much wider. What are the consequences of that?

[Answer] I believe that we all want to live in a free society. But that type of violence, which the Pope condemns, also leads to violence. So that to denounce that now seems to be a duty, to prevent us having to submit tomorrow to a step which would result in the taking of power by one of the extremes. And that would not be good. So, if we want democracy, we have to believe--in what pertains to the Church--in what the Pope says. He is a reformer who wants peaceful reforms. He does not preach and does not accept violence. Now, with priests of that kind... They remind one very much of the communist deputy who was the wife of Maurice Thorez, the secretary general of the French Communist Party after the war. She was speaking with extreme anger and a deputy, alarmed, said: "I have never seen so much hatred in the heart of a woman." She heard it and replied: "One cannot love the oppressed people without hating their oppressors." That is what I am seeing in those people: they all seem like Thorez' wife. But I want to praise the latest document of the CNBB, which disavows the partisan connotations in the actions of the dioceses, parishes and communities. The Church cannot refrain from being political. It is political like all of us. But not partisan. When it represents one segment, it ceases to be universal and catholic.

[Question] I see in your curriculum vitae: "profession: military." In that capacity, how do you see the position of the military today? What do the military think with regard to the economic crisis, to the elections? It is said that they think this way or that. What do they really want?

[Answer] I would translate all of that in a very short answer, which is not my style: while the military are making successive statements about the elections, saying that they will be assured, the politicians are talking about the extension of terms....They are concerned about terms. The military are not concerned about terms. They may be concerned about promotions...because to extend their assignment means to keep them in their ranks indefinitely. What is needed in this country is a greater understanding between the two societies: the civilian and the military. And both have mutual prejudices which keep reemerging.

Now see who it was that said that the military could not turn over power to some radicals it was a civilian, Minister Galveas. There are many civilians who believe that the military spend their lives going right-face, left-face--more right than left--and for that reason they are dummies. And there are military men who believe that only the military are patriotic, that every civilian is a profiteer. That exists, but I do not interpret it as general thinking. But they are segments that can complicate things. How many times have I heard, after a conversation, "Why, you don't even seem like a military man," in supposed praise.

Dona Ruth offers more dessert and her husband accepts it. "As for bitters, that clerical opposition is already enough for me."

[Question] Someone told me that you were discouraged, ready to leave politics when your term ends in 1983. Your friend Daniel Monteiro, here at our side, has just told me that it is not fair to the nation for you to do that.

[Answer] That talk, what it has caught me!

[Question] I remember that when the than President-elect Joao Figueiredo said that it would not be fair for you to go and govern Para and cease being his leader in the senate....

[Answer] The president told me: "Without any disparagement to Alacid, he cannot do what you can do for me in the senate." And he went further, using this expression, which I had never revealed: "And without any disparagement to Para, Alacid can govern the state."

[Question] You still have not answered my question.

[Answer] I was really prepared to leave. It was before the campaign for the 1974 elections. I was prepared to end my career. There were some disappointments, frustrations, some deviations of the movement that I had helped create--all of that added to the deep ingratitude of those in Para whom I had elevated to positions that they would never have achieved, as is the case of that Alacid. When I concluded my service in the Medici administration, I made a request, something that I did for the first time, inasmuch as everything I became was by invitation not by my express wish. The request was to go into the General Accounting Court. I have always been poor. Today I have an apartment in Balem through the inheritance of my wife, and a house in Lago Sul, which I bought after having sold an apartment in Rio, also gained by Ruth. I improved my situation when I left the ministry for the senate and I bought an apartment on term in Brasilia. Today I have another one which I bought after selling the first one. At that time, I saved the salary of reserve colonel (today I receive 130,000 cruzeiros) with a position in the management of the Banco Sul-Brasileiro [South Brazilian Bank]. When I purchased the apartment, it was the first time that I ceased to be the husband-of-the teacher. I wanted to go into the General Accounting Court, thinking that in retirement I would receive the salary of a four-star general. But I ended up fighting for reelection to the senate and I was one of the two senators of the National Renewal Alliance (ARENA) in the whole country who won in their capitals. But I went to Golbery and to the president and they used an expression similar to yours, very kind, saying that I was not doing the right thing, that it was too early to end my political activity. So I suggested pacifying Para by the elimination of my presence in politics, which nobody accepted.

"I Considered Party Politics Incompatible With Military Life"

[Question] How did you get into politics? I see that I am before two of the most brilliant speakers of Realengo (Passarinho and Daniel Monteiro, also a reserve colonel and leader of the South Brazilian Group).

[Answer] Octavio Costa is not here. I was president of the student council of the Paes de Carvalho High School in Belem, and president of the academic society of the Realengo Military School. That already demonstrates a certain political vocation. Daniel Monteiro interrupts: "I was a student at the Porto Alegre Institute and during a visit to the military school I heard a speech by student Jarbas Passarinho. That speaker left a mark on me until today."

Passarinho was chosen as speaker at Realengo and unanimously elected president of the supreme council of the school—as happened when he was chosen president of the senate. As a captain, he was going to speak at an assembly in the Military Club at the side of General Juarez Tavora. Estillac Leal finally prevented the meeting. But Captain Passarinho became nationally known when he delivered a speech at the foot of the tomb of his classmate, Air Major Rubem Vaz. Later, he spoke at the Air Club. When he was preparing to speak to army officers, he received the information that the war minister was going to arrest him.

"As long as I am under arrest, then I am going to say everything," he said. The aggressiveness of his oratory helped him because instead of arresting him, the minister furnished him explanations. Tancredo Neves was minister of justice and even today he kids Passarinho: "One of the serious mistakes I committed was not ordering your arrest at that time. Perhaps the history of Brazil would have been different. I was going to my office, lamenting: "That terrible major, making speeches." And they followed him day and night, in the August 1954 conspiracy.

"In 1955, I was not plotting, but I was involved on the morning of 11 November. I got to enter Catete Palace (together with Passarinho was the now General Newton Cruz, chief of the central agency of the National Intelligence Service (SNI)), at the moment that the minister of war Fiuza de Castro, who had been appointed but had not yet assumed his post, was speaking. It was in the elevator that I first saw that famous personality who was Colonel Golbery. Mascarenhas de Moraes interrupted the speech. "Enough, general, you are under arrest." Alcides Etchegoyen, who was with his two armed sons, asked Fiuza: "General, are you going to accept the arrest order of a mutinous general?" Lima Brayner and Maurell Filho were also there. It was a tense moment. I grasped the handle of my 45. Then Mascarenhas told Etchegoyen: "You are also under arrest." "In whose name?" asked Etchegoyen. "In the name of the minister of war," informed General Mascarenhas, adding: "Very well, general, then do not consider yourself under arrest but present yourself at the ninth floor of the ministry." "I will go only if I am accompanied by only my two sons," Etchegoyen declared. Everybody was going to be arrested and I decided not to get arrested. I went out the front door inquiring loudly, "Where did Lieutenant Braga go?" And to this day, they think I am looking for 'Lieutenant Braga.'" "Nini" (Newton Cruz) was led under arrest to the Reserve Officers Training Center (CPOR). I left, avoiding being recognized. At the corner of the Novo Mundo Hotel, a lieutenant recognized me. I asked what his mission was. "It is not to let anybody leave or enter." "Very good," I told him, "that is exactly what the marshal is concerned about. Don't let anybody leave." And I left. When I completed the Command and General Staff School, the audience broke out in applause when my name was called. Lott turned very red and pointed to the last one at the table to hand me my diploma. The applause increased even more at that point: it was General Castello Branco. I went to Belem and there the invitations began: mayor, deputy, senator. I did not run because I considered party politics incompatible with military life.

Passarinho, the organizer of the revolution in Para, was made governor of the state in June 1964, while still on active duty. When he decided to run for the senate he went into the reserve. His 18 months of good administration are paying him political dividends to this day. He was elected senator with 83 percent of the valid votes. He was Costa e Silva's minister of Labor and of Social Security, and Medici's minister of education. Reelected senator, he received the largest number of votes, even in the capital.

[Answer] Medici told the officers of the Third Army that he wanted me to be president because he wanted a new man who would popularize the revolution, with the ability to communicate with the people, according to what the then Colonel Resstel told me. I was in Belo Horizonte, as minister of labor when the report came out. When Daniel Krieger told me that he had even agreed to be my vice president, my jaw dropped. But then I paid dearly for that because every person who thinks I may become a candidate for the presidency seeks to topple me, from the other side as well as from my own. Even today, to be honest, I prefer to go to the General Accounting Court.

Jarbas Passarinho looks serious and remarks:

"But if the country has to catch fire, I do not want to be in the General Accounting Court. I have to be fighting."

AMNESTY LAW DECLARED CONSTITUTIONAL

Bogota EL TIEMPO in Spanish 23 Oct 81 Sec A p 18

[Text] Yesterday, the Supreme Court of Justice found the Amnesty Law approved by President Julio Cesar Turbay Ayala on 23 March of this year to be constitutional; but, at the same time, it decreed that Article 11 of the same law was unconstitutional.

The Court found unconstitutional the portion of Article 11 which states: "At the termination of the period cited in Article 2, and depending upon the satisfactory progress in the restoration of peace achieved by this law, the government will order the initiation of the procedures for granting amnesty to those who have been arrested, tried and convicted, who must file their petition within the following 2 months." The entity was of the opinion that the government could not order amnesty, because this function is incumbent on the Congress alone.

The other articles in the Amnesty Law, which was approved by the Congress for the purpose of enabling the armed rebels to resort to it and to achieve the pacification of the country, were found constitutional.

The Constitutional Division of the Court defeated the motion by Magistrate Carlos J. Medellin which, it was learned, declared several articles and paragraphs of the law unexecutable.

The proceedings have been turned over to Magistrate Humberto Meza Gonzalez, so that he may write up the respective findings.

As is common knowledge, a suit was filed against the Amnesty Law, as soon as President Turbay approved it, by several lawyers, including Humberto Criales de la Rosa, Enrique Cipagauta Galvis, Alvaro Moreno Novoa, Miguel Antonio Cano and Alvaro Echeverry, who considered several of its articles and paragraphs unconstitutional.

It was learned that the Court's decision has not taken effect, inasmuch as the Amnesty Law expired on 23 July of this year.

CONSTITUTIONAL REFORM, SUPREME COURT DECISION

Court Declares 1979 Reform Null

Bogota EL TIEMPO in Spanish 31 Oct 81 Sec A pp 1, 8

[Article by Ramiro Castellanos: "The Constitutional Reform Collapsed"]

[Text] After heated debates lasting 6 months, the Supreme Court of Justice has declared the Constitutional Reform approved by the Congress in 1979 impossible to execute in its entirety.

As a result of the decision, there has been an overthrow of, among others, the new Penal Procedure Code, which was due to go into effect next year, the Office of the Attorney General of the Nation, the Superior Council of the Judicature, the Congressional Planning Commission, the Statue on the Judicial Profession and the Congressional Reform.

President Julio Cesar Turbay Alaya's Constitutional Reform (Legislative Act No 1, of 1979) was "buried" by three votes at the end of a session of the Full Court held on Thursday night, and lasting for 5 hours.

It was learned from totally reliable sources that there were 17 votes for the total unexecutability of the Legislative Act, and 11 for its partial unexecutability, which had been proposed by Magistrate Ricardo Medina Moyano. The Court found that the Constitutional Reform had flaws in its makeup.

It was learned that the Full Court did not take a secret vote, and that there will be a drawing by lots of the associate judge who will prepare the findings, which will be approved next week.

Prominent jurists, including Horacio Gomez Aristizabal and Marino Jaramillo Echeverry, described the Court's decision as "serious and with unpredictable consequences."

A suit had been filed against the Legislative Act by the attorneys Manuel Gaona Cruz, currently magistrate of the Court, Climaco Giraldo, Oscar Alarcon, Tarcisio Roldan and Antonio Jose Cancino, who had charged that it was unconstitutional.

The fate of the reform was heatedly debated by 12 magistrates and 16 associate judges; and, finally, a motion from Magistrate Ricardo Medina Moyano, who proposed that two articles and six paragraphs of the reform be declared unconstitutional, was defeated. Authorized sources claimed that the magistrate did not back his motion.

While progress was being made in the analysis of the Medina Moyano proposal, another group of magistrates submitted a study wherein it was proposed that the entire legislative act be declared unexecutable, owing to the improper accumulation of the three proposals which were approved in the Chamber's first vote, namely, the reform of the administration and the Congress, and the creation of the Office of the Attorney General of the Nation.

Other magistrates, in turn, were in agreement that the legislative act should be declared unconstitutional, but because of the illegal formation of the First Commission of the Chamber of Representatives, based on a previous decision of the Council of State.

The 1979 Constitutional Reform had many enemies, and that opposition was such that, rather than going into effect, it was subjected to a suit before the Court. Obviously, that action was rejected, inasmuch as the entity decides only on acts which are in effect already.

Subsequently, when the reform was in effect, the action was repeated.

From the very time that the Supreme Court of Justice began making the study of the suit against the Constitutional Reform, those who disputed the act challenged the associate justices Alvaro Suarez Castro, Alvaro Tafur Galvis, Julio Cesar Uribe and Ildelfonso Mendez. The challengers alleged that the associate justices were impeded, because they had already pronounced judgment on one of the main aarguments against the reform as a whole.

In view of this situation, it was necessary to suspend the terms established by law and to deal with the incident through the auspices of Magistrate Fernando Uribe Restrepo.

Although great secrecy has been kept regarding the decision which "toppled" the Constitutional Reform, it was commented in well informed circles that the Full Court has apparently been convoked for next Thursday, in order to approve the finding.

As a result of the all-important decision, the Superior Council of the Judicature has collapsed, and from now on will not be able to send lists for the appointment of justices of the Court and magistrates for the lower courts, and so has the Disciplinary Court.

Also brought down are the defense of human rights, 10 percent of the national budget for the administration of justice and the appointment of four magistrates for the Constitutional Division of the Supreme Court of Justice, namely, Mario Latorre Rueda, Jorge Velez Garcia, Humberto Meza Gonzalez and Oscar Salazar Chavez.

The same fate has befallen the establishment of the political parties, their financing and the compulsory vote; the ban on the reelection of the comptroller general of the republic and the attorney general of the nation; the regulation which stipulated that the Congress could convoke public hearings to try state officials and private citizens; the disqualification of congressmen and the loss of investiture; the economic and social development plan; the standing commission for the plan, and the procedures for the passage of the laws; the political control of Congress; the attorney general's authority to name his representatives; and the accusatory system.

Eliminated are the lists for the appointment of judges (there is a return to the co-opting system), the terms for the magistrates, the Penal Procedure Code, the Office of the Attorney General of the Nation and the bringing of the salaries of congressmen, Court magistrates, the Council of State and the prosecutor under the UPAC [Savings Certificates with Constant Purchasing Power] system.

Some Opinions

This newspaper interviewed several jurists in order to learn their views concerning the Court's decision on the Constitutional Reform. Two of those interviewed were Horacio Gomez Aristizabal and Marino Jaramillo Echeverry, former member of Congress and head of the National Bar Association.

Gomez Aristizabal remarked: "So long as we are not thoroughly apprised of the exact terms of the judgment pronounced by the Supreme Court of Justice, it is not easy to give a clearcut opinion. In any even it is a problem with unpredictable consequences, because the Reform which is part of an organic whole has been broken down and has lost unity.

"Holy Mother Church has doctors. I have always thought that we in Colombia suffer from an explosion of laws, and any legal instrument is suitable if it has the benefit of honest, capable and wise man who, in turn, are endowed with the tools which modern technology provides. Obviously, everything that is human is dynamic and evolves. The laws, beginning with the Constitution, need to be updated.

"As for the future, there is a void that is impossible to fill so long as there is lacking a new reform that will amend and correct the stalemate which has occurred; because otherwise, there would be an incomplete, shaved and unsuitable reform."

Jaramillo Echeverry commented: "The news received today concerning the decision on the Constitutional Reform will have very serious repercussions, because all the basic aspects which reformed Congress as a constituent body and which dealt with the creation of the Office of the Attorney General of the Nation and the Public Ministry, and hence Congress itself and the Judicial Branch, have collapsed.

"The serious part of it is that, at the present time, there is no possibility of correcting procedural errors, nor of approving any constitutional reform that could surmount the legal difficulties which have cropped up with the decision; because any constitutional reform would have to be subjected to two legislatures in different years. Insofar as this year is concerned, it is impossible for the Congress to concern itself with a constitutional reform."

"Hence, we have embarked upon a serious institutional crisis, owing to a void that cannot be filled, for which only a constituent assembly can compensate.

"I was an advocate of the constituent assembly convoked by President Alfonso Lopez Michelsen, and I still advocate that the executive branch, through the Congress, convoke a constituent assembly that would be essentially concerned with the fundamental reforms required by our Constitution to put the country in progress, as it should be next year."

Brief History

The legislative act consists of 65 articles. It was issued on 1 November 1979, and went into effect on 20 December of the same year, upon being published in the Official Journal.

As an immediate effect, the reform went into operation on the incompatibility of congressmen holding certain public offices.

Some members of Congress had to resign from their public offices out of fear of losing their seats.

The then minister of justice, Hugo Escobar Sierra, repudiated the attacks against the constitutional reform and, in a public address at Neiva on 15 December 1979, described the demands as "advertising exhibitionism."

On that occasion, Escobar Sierra termed the charges against the reform "inept" and claimed that the debates regarding it had been extensive, with the participation of congressmen who were friends and foes therein; that no one had been denied the right to speak, and that during the discussion of the proposal the Congress regulations had not been disregarded.

In addition, fully reliable sources stated yesterday that the judges and other officials penalized by the Superior Council of the Judicature and the Disciplinary Court would be entitled to request reinstatement, inasmuch as these two entities have gone out of existence as a result of the decision of the Supreme Court of Justice.

President Julio Cesar Turbay Ayala, for his part, in sanctioning Legislative Act No 1 of 1979, declared on 4 December 1979 that this was an operative constitutional reform which would not attempt to compete with any of the previous ones, nor to demolish the former state structures.

He added: "Without boasting, I daresay that none of the changes made in the by now century-old Charter of 1886 has greater operative scope than the reform which I am now sanctioning in the presence of such eminent witnesses."

He reiterated that, "This reform is a decisive step to enable the country to live in full legal normality in the not too distant future, without having to address upsets in public order with the disturbing frequency that this has required in recent years."

On 4 December, former President Carlos Lleras Restrepo, in turn, commented in an editorial note in NUEVA FRONTERA that no one in Colombia should challenge President Turbay Ayala for the political paternity of the constitutional reform just approved by the Congress, which "has not moved the nation" despite the fact that the minister of government, German Zea Hernandez, considers it "one of the most important historical events of this century."

The constitutional reform was defended against all criticism by President Turbay Ayala and by his ministers, Hugo Escobar Sierra and German Zea Hernandez.

The congressmen Jaime Pinzon Lopez and Luis Villar Borda became the fiercest enemies of the reform, and they bombarded it during the process in the Chamber.

One of the major failings of the constitutional reform from the ouset was that of having converted into only one,and having approved the three proposals associated with the reform of the administration of justice and the Congress, and the one which proposed the creation of the Office of the Attorney General of the Nation.

The constitutional reform was approved by the Chamber of Representatives on 21 November 1979, amid great tension, and with the negative votes of congressmen Jaime Pinzon Lopez and Luis Villar Borda, who claimed that, when the terms were executed in the plenary session without prior approval of the records of its handling by the First Commission, the proposal was invalidated.

With the exception of Article 52 of the proposal, which provides for parity in the top-ranking judicial organs, the voting on the rest of the terms received a large majority vote from the members of the Chamber.

Bogota EL SIGLO in Spanish 3 Nov 81 pp 1, 3

[Text] Through a decree issued last night, the National Government stipulated that the decisions handed down by the Supreme Court of Justice on legislative acts to reform the National Constitution must be voted by a three quarters majority, and not a simple majority.

The measure goes into effect immediately, and therefore the announced Court finding on the suit brought against the Constitutional Reform of 1979, currently in force, will have to be voted by that qualified majority.

The president issued the decree after the Council of Ministers, meeting last night, recommended that he take steps to use the authority conferred upon the executive branch by the Constitutional Reform of 1968 to issue regulations pertaining "to the voting system that the Court must use in studying and deciding on the matters within its jurisdiction."

The decision made last night concerning the qualified majority had already been used by several jurists, as EL SIGLO reported in its edition of last Saturday, when it announced the Court's anticipated decision to declare the Constitutional Reform of 1979 unconstitutional.

As is public knowledge, the final decision has not yet been made, because the Full Court, consisting of 12 magistrates and 16 associate justices, is due to meet next Thursday to consider a new motion. This is because, at the meeting held last week, it confined itself to a few test votes regarding the motion that had been submitted by magistrate Ricardo Medina, whose propositions were not accepted by 15 of the members of the court, whose views were opposed to the reform, but without reaching agreement on the reasons for vetoing it.

According to jurists consulted by EL SIGLO, now that the three quarters majority has been established by the decree issued last night, it may be claimed that the crisis to which the Court might have exposed the country by overthrowing the 1979 reform has been averted.

Message From the Ministers

At the conclusion of the Council of Ministers meeting, all of them without exception signed the following message:

"The Council of Ministers, after having studied painstakingly letter C of Article 76 of Legislative Act No 1 of 1968, recommends to the President of the Republic that he take steps to implement it by issuing the regulations pertaining to the voting system that must be used by the honorable Supreme Court of Justice in instances of voting on descisions related to legislative acts to reform the National Constitution."

The Authorization

Letter C of Article 76 of the Legislative Act of 1968 cited in the ministers' message states:

"The government is authorized to adopt the necessary administrative measures for the establishment of the services of the Constitutional Division of the Supreme Court of Justice, and to issue, so long as the law does not do so, regulations relating to its operation and procedures for studying and deciding on the matters within its jurisdiction."

CULTURE MINISTER REAFFIRMS COMBAT READINESS OF PEOPLE

FL162333 St Georges Domestic Service in English 2300 GMT 16 Nov 81

[Text] The Cuban people are prepared and ready to face any aggression that might be unleashed against them by the Reagan administration. This was stated here today by Ricardo Alarcon, Cuba's deputy minister of foreign affairs. Senor Alarcon was speaking at a press conference this morning at the Cuban Embassy in (Mon Jalou). He said that the Cuban people are in a state of combat readiness. He said that his people have already indicated to the United States' imperialist that if they attack Cuba they will be met with fierce resistance from a strong and determined people most of whom are already trained members of the country's territorial troops militia units.

Addressing himself to the increased aggressiveness of the Reagan administration in the region, Senor Alarcon said that the administration takes on extreme right-wing approaches to all issues and tries to make the genuine struggles of the peoples of the region appear as a so-called communist threat. However, the Cuban minister said this would not stop the struggles of the peoples because the realities of the region are a different matter.

The Cuban official said that it is easier to understand the Reagan administration's policies in psychiatric terms than in political terms. The administration is trying to perform magic tricks to take itself out of the present grave crisis facing U.S. imperialism, he said, and it is already faced with tremendous internal contradictions.

Senor Alarcon concluded that the administration's social policies and its foreign policy would bring about its own defeat and that in the end the American people will be on the side of Cuba.

FIVE YEAR REPORTS ON NEW POLITICAL DISTRICTS

Pinar del Rio Province

Havana BOHEMIA in Spanish 2 Oct 81 pp 36-41

[Article by Alberto Salazar and Julio Fumero]

[Text] Pinar del Rio, the tip of our long, narrow island, was characterized for a long time by its poor socioeconomic development.

It was only known for the famous Vueltabajo tobacco, the Matahambre copper and the beauty of Vinales. These were sources of wealth for the minority and poverty for the majority.

This "Cinderella" did not come out of its trance because of enchantment or a lost glass slipper. It was due to the creative work of a revolution which opened undreamed of horizons for this territory that now proudly shows complete transformation.

When the new administrative divisions came into effect in 1976, Pinar del Rio was not greatly changed. However, its internal structure was simplified, according to law. It went from five regions and 28 municipalities to 14 municipalities.

This westernmost province is third in the country in area (10,901 square kilometers) and seventh in population. It has more than 640,000 inhabitants for an approximate density of 60 people per square kilometer.

About 48 percent of its population is female and 52 percent is of working age; both fitures are for 1980.

The Sierra de los Organos and Sierra del Rosario have explored caves which are among the largest on the continent. These are typical of the mountainous landscape in the territory.

That rough topography and limited water resources mean that the province has poor soil in general. Nevertheless, its valleys and agricultural zones (hoyos) are famous for their fertility, especially for growing tobacco.

There are also appreciable forestry, mining and fishing resources. In addition to tobacco, there are large areas used for sugar cane, livestock, produce, vegetables, rice and citrus.

The basic direction of future development in the territory will be the growth of a diversified economy in which tobacco, sugar and mining will have priority.

Overall Economy

During the period 1976-80, gross production of all economic sectors in Pinar del Rio grew steadily. It reached its greatest volume in 1978 of more than 470 million pesos.

Then a decline began. In 1980, production was higher than in the first year of the period but less than 460 million pesos.

As to economic efficiency indicators, the cost for each 100 pesos of gross production reached its best level of 95 pesos in 1977. During the next 2 years, it was over 100 pesos but came down again in 1980 to 98 pesos.

The relationship between average wage and work productivity was generally unfavorable since only in 1978 did the latter increase more than the former.

The principle of socialist distribution based on work had serious problems at the beginning of this period in implementation, control and analysis caused by lack of priorities and levels of leadership, a situation that led to stagnation and, in some cases, regression.

In 1979, a process of frank recovery began and the next year it became stronger which meant better results.

The revision and updating of work norms also ran into difficulties, especially in quality, since the percentage of workers who went beyond the established parameters was very high. However, by the end of the period, this was being adjusted.

Implementation of the SDPE [Economic Management and Planning System] was supported by hard political work.

This meant that the efforts made translated positively into the reorganization of economic controls, making it possible to make decisions on more solid bases.

In spite of advances in the application of the SDPE, its results are still not used fully by the administrative directorates as an economic management tool.

In addition to drawing up guidelines for the 5-year period 1981-85 during this stage, there was work on future development until the year 2000. Both tasks required great effort and dedication.

Investments in the productive and nonproductive sphere were irregular. They peaked in 1979 at more than 135 million pesos.

Agricultural-Livestock Activity

Activities in the agricultural-livestock sector centered on advances in food production for the people, exportable goods and raw materials for industry with an average annual increase of 4.7 percent.

Some sectors went down each year, especially tobacco which suffered a marked decline due to objective and subjective problems which are now being solved. The plan for the 5-year period 1976-80 was 3,235,200 quintals but only 2,550,000 quintals were produced.

In the first place, as is known, virulent blue mold attacked the crop and caused real disaster in the tobacco fields, noticeably cutting production.

Other negative factors were decreases in sown area, problems in obtaining basic resources, inadequate land improvement and plant quality, poor application of agrotechnology, manpower shortage and administrative and organizational problems.

The most obvious sign of the degree to which these problems were eliminated is the 1980-81 harvest of 54,828,000 tobacco poles which is a provincial production record.

That was achieved in spite of the effects of Hurricane Jeanne at the end of 1980. It destroyed 250,000 "canteros" and 175.9 caballerias already planted.

This success was only possible due to the decisive mass participation in the tobacco harvest. At times more than 100,000 people were mobilized.

The immediate objectives in this sector include improvement of the land used for tobacco, more sown areas and cultivation in general, mechanization of feasible activities and gradual reduction of the work force to 50 percent of the present one.

The planned figures were not reached in sugar production either. The planned industrial yield was not achieved, there was underutilization of industrial capacity and a lower supply of cane. This was partially caused by rust, a disease that attacked the Barbados 4362 variety.

For example, the production plan for the sugar harvests from 1977 to 1980 was 516,440 metric tons but 90 percent or 464,800 tons were produced.

The shortage of raw materials during this period totaled 29 million arrobas of cane. A yield base 96 of 10.48 had to be obtained but it was about 10.12 so more than 16,000 tons of sugar were not processed.

Plans for this sector include production stabilization. The 30 de Noviembre mill which was in operation during the 1980-81 harvest and the Batalla de Cacarajicara mill to be constructed in the northern part of the province will help this objective.

The production of tubers and roots increased 1.3 times during this period, reaching 1.2 million quintals in 1980. That same year the highest figure in the period was reached in coffee by harvesting 17,200 quintals of coffee.

More than 440,000 quintals of citrus were harvested last year, an increase of 110 percent compared to 1975.

Also milk production increased that year about 21 percent and beef about 40 percent with 35.2 million liters and 23,300 tons respectively.

In 1980, there were also increases of 27 percent in pork with about 7,000 tons, 300 percent in poultry with more than 11,435 tons and about 16 percent in egg production with almost 244.22 million units.

During that period, there were investments that increased the productive capacity of the sector. These included 20 typical dairies for 6,400 cows, five calf-raising centers with capacity for 2,700 and 13 weaning centers for 5,200 head.

In addition, six poultry farms for 1,615,000 birds and a swine breeding center for 400 began to operate.

New dams increased the reservoir capacity to 436 million cubic meters, more than twice the amount at the beginning of the period. Therefore, more than 100,000 hectares now receive the benefits of irrigation.

In its progress toward superior forms of agricultural-livestock production, the province had 189 cooperatives with more than 6,300 peasants and 2,504 caballerias, 13 percent of the area belonging to the private sector, as of May 1981.

Most of the cooperatives--160 of them--grew tobacco; the remaining ones raised cane (8), produce and vegetables (12), coffee (6), fruit (2) and livestock (1).

Basic Industries

When mining in Pinar del Rio is mentioned, copper which has been mined in Matahambre for many years immediately comes to mind. Nevertheless, Matahambre is not the only place that produces copper and not just copper is mined in the province.

There are a number of metallic and nonmetallic minerals in the Vueltabajo territory that are the basis for different industries.

During this period, copper production was overfulfilled with good results in the extraction of iron pyrite and silica sand used in the construction materials industry.

The production of phosphoric rock which began in 1977 to help solve shortages in fertilizer production showed promising results with 99 percent of the plan.

The main investments in mining were the phosphorite processing plant that permitted mining of this deposit and projects for the Jucaro mine, first of its type built by the revolution. Copper concentrate is mined there.

Geological work is very important for the development of this branch. Advances in these 5 years increased the level of geological knowledge in the province from 6 to more than 30 percent.

Those advances led to the detection of a phosphorite deposit in Pimienta, Minas de Matahambre, and important polymetallic deposits in the municipalities of Mantua and Mina.

The electric power sector showed sustained increases in the number of consumers, about 90,000, and the energy supply which grew at an annual rate of 14 percent.

That sector also included the construction of 1,157.5 kilometers of lines at several voltages and 30 substations as well as the installation of 1,722 transformers.

There were 1,538 projects of different types by the provincial organisms including the Ministry of Basic Industry (749), the Ministry of Construction (288), the Ministry of Agriculture (129) and the people's government organs (253).

There was an important increase in the production of mixed fertilizer since it increased 25.5 times by 1980 compared to the beginning of this period.

During this period, work on two significant investments in the basic industries sector began: a typical parts plant and the electronic complex.

Construction Work

Construction dynamics in the province are reflected in the fact that projects worth more than 500 million pesos were built during this period.

Excluding housing, roads, hydraulic and hydrologic works, 308 of the 391 projects planned were built. Broken down by program, 38 were industrial, 56 agricultural-livestock, 111 educational, 7 health and 96 miscellaneous.

More than 7,600 housing units were finished, some 355 kilometers of roads graded and another 805 kilometers paved.

In the hydraulic program, more than 19,000 hectares of crops, mainly rice and citrus, were irrigated. There were 32 basic projects and reservoir capacity increased by some 117 million cubic meters. Most of this corresponded to the El Salto dam with some 66 million cubic meters.

The hydrologic program carried out projects worth more than 5.6 million pesos. These included the construction of the Bahia Honda aqueduct, conductors to several economic and social objectives, the installation of two filtration plants, sewerage for some cities and expansion of the supply source to Pinar del Rio.

Industrial projects included a food complex, a factory for small clay parts and another for acetylene, a citrus-packing plant, a poultry slaughterhouse and a prefabricated plant.

Agricultural-livestock projects included 26 dairies, 13 weaning centers, 4 development centers and 1 breeding center. In the poultry branch, three fattening units and one incubation plant were built. There were also a swine breeding center and five other installations of different types.

A large part of the construction effort in the province was aimed at educational projects which added approximately 52,000 new seats during this period.

These included 16 Giron-type ESBEC [Basic Secondary Farm School], 9 wooden ESBEC, a Camilo Cienfuegos military vocational school, a school for daycare teachers, 2 for special education, 18 urban basic secondary schools, 12 primary schools, 2 technological schools and 19 daycare centers.

In the health sector, a dental clinic and six polyclinics were finished. These extend health services to more than 100,000 people.

Other buildings finished were a 138-room hotel, a telephone central, four supermarkets, four theaters, a laundry and 17 fish stores.

During this period, there was progressive increase in the quality of the projects with provincial meetings and the constant adoption of pertinent measures.

Attention was focused on achieving optimal quality in finishing, waterproofing and prefabricated parts.

There was also a good effort to improve quality, not only in specific details of projects but in straight construction, keeping in mind the minimum areas and volumes of the plan as well as the elimination or replacement of imported materials.

Recently steps were taken to draw up the budget and plans for large housing and hydraulic projects with the cooperation of foreign technicians.

Transportation and Communications

An analysis of the economic management of the automotive and railway transportation branches indicates that the plans for each year were generally fulfilled with increases from one year to another.

More than 104 million passengers were transported by different means while trips increased more than 25 percent, all due to the replacement and increase of the vehicle pool and priority attention to that activity.

There was work to preserve the equipment. Its use was noticeably affected in 1980 by breakdowns and shortage of spare parts.

Truck and railroad freight increased more than 50 percent in physical units and value compared to before the new administrative division.

It should be pointed out that, during this period, appropriate use of buses to transport students from rural schools was organized and structured.

Omnibus Nacionales is represented in the province by an administrative unit with eight agencies in eight municipalities which carry out their program systematically.

A major step was taken in transportation service at the end of last year with the replacement of the Skoda buses on the Pinar del Rio-Marianao route with Hino buses which are more modern and comfortable.

Transportation construction included the Havana-Pinar highway which is 146.7 kilometers long; 62 kilometers are already paved.

Meanwhile, there was also notable progress in communication services. Three automatic centrals were inaugurated and 61 automatic telegraph lines were put into operation. There were also increases in the number of telephones installed and telephone lines in service and, therefore, telephone traffic.

The mail, telegraph and press distribution sector improved a lot due to increased automation and the superior work of the distribution network with the construction of newsstands everywhere in the province.

Public Health

Pinar del Rio made significant advances in the health sector during this period in indicators of vital importance for service and improvement of quality in the treatment of the people.

Six polyclinics--two of them as replacements--and a dental clinic which means an additional 19 chairs were constructed. Also an old folks home that should be completed this year was started.

There was also remodeling, expansions, adaptations and construction of minor projects in several installations like hospitals, medical offices and polyclinics.

Consultations increased about 400,000 while the rate of consultations per inhabitant increased from 3.7 to 4.1.

The number of doctors grew by 208 and dentists by 29 which meant 1 doctor for every 996 inhabitants and 1 dentist for every 4,276 inhabitants.

The total number of workers in this sector increased to about 7,800. There was a 139-percent increase in nurses, 52 percent in technicians and 57 percent in X-ray technicians.

Cooperation abroad also had its expression in Pinar del Rio since there were 453 internationalists during this period.

One of the health indices which the revolution has worked on most is the infant mortality rate.

In the Vueltabajo territory, the rate in 1976 meant that 30 children out of every 1,000 born alive died. This was reduced through constant work to 20.9 in 1980.

Education, Scientific-Technical Activity, Culture, Sports

A large part of the population in the province is studying. More than one out of every three Pinar del Rio residents is in some type of education.

The growth of advanced education stands out during this period. There were more than 7,000 students enrolled and the elevation of the general cultural level and the flow of top-level professionals to the economy and education were guaranteed.

Primary education tended to decrease; it stabilized at over 100,000. This decline was due to the lower birth rate and the effectiveness of the educational system. The average continuation and promotion rate during this period was over 98 and 94 percent respectively.

There was important progress in special education since the number of centers for students with problems grew from 2 to 11 while there were also substantial increases in the number of specialists and teachers.

There is now a diagnostic and guidance center to pinpoint the problems in those cases. There will be increased capacity with the opening of eight new schools.

Enrollment in basic secondary schools more than doubled in this period compared to 1975. Today there are more than 46,000 students which explains the need to build more than 30 schools. School continuation and promotion rates were over 93 percent.

Preuniversity education was characterized by rapid growth with an enrollment of more than 8,000 students in 1980. School continuation and promotion rates were close to 92 percent in both cases.

Enrollment in technical and professional schools remained stable in the last 3 years but there are problems in retention. There is an acceptable 94 percent promotion rate and some 6,000 intermediate technicians and skilled workers graduated during this period.

The youth movement has better results in continuation and promotion although it should be pointed out that it includes many youths from 13 to 16 years of age who are not in school.

In adult education, the province had the honor of being the first large province to complete the battle for sixth grade with more than 60,000 graduates.

The tie between study and work in primary education is carried out basically with school gardens. These students take care of parcels, miniparcels, nurseries and gardens. More than 62 percent of the enrollment and 95 percent of the schools participate.

The students in the rural schools are a valuable source of manpower. They take care of more than 2,000 caballerias of citrus, coffee, tobacco, produce, vegetables and nurseries.

The School to the Country plan has had good participation (95 percent) and positive economic results. One activity that was added is productive work by university students during their vacations; this must be gradually improved.

Training the teaching personnel was considered satisfactory with outstanding achievements like the certification of primary teachers and physical education teachers.

During this period, advancement courses for directors, teachers and methodologists in primary and intermediate education and courses in Marxist-Leninist theory started and continue successfully. At the same time, almost 3,000 teachers began degree work in primary education.

The training of labor teachers and advancement seminars for adult education, basic objectives to win the battle for ninth grade, continued.

In the 1980-81 school year, the Educational Advancement Institute began a new stage to achieve a highly efficient system in the scientific-technical, political-ideological and pedagogic-methodological training of teaching personnel with a dialectic materialistic concept. It permits the practical merger of educational methods and a greater role in organization, planning, direction and control.

The principal successes in scientific-technical activity included the construction of meteorological stations in San Juan y Martinez and Santa Lucia, the creation of the Multisectorial Center for Scientific-Technical Information, the Museum of Natural Sciences, the Provincial Meteorological Center, the Archeology Work Group and research on the Guanahacabibes peninsula which includes drawing up a vegetation map, the study of flora and fauna and consolidation of soil data.

There is other research on erosive processes in the tobacco areas of San Juan y Martinez and on the fertilization of rice and citrus in addition to research done by the experimental stations for those crops and for tobacco and forestry.

There are more than 40 research topics connected to national development. Steps have been taken to improve the tie between the Academy of Sciences and the economic and educational units with the idea of cooperating in their activities. There is also development in the Youth Technical Brigades and the National Association of Innovators and Efficiency Experts.

The material base of culture was enriched by installations of different types like 2 libraries, 9 museums, 3 houses of culture, 1 art gallery, 1 theater, 1 exhibit hall, 11 movie theaters, 3 houses for cultural products and 1 house of song.

The amateurs groups practically tripled in this period although they must systematize their activities and continue to improve in quality.

One advance in work organization in this sector is the creation of the popular culture councils in the province and the municipalities.

In sports, the province is growing stronger in several disciplines (boxing, baseball, cycling, weights, handball and gymnastics) as well as in social and school sports in general.

Installations constructed include the provincial physical education school, an EIDE [School for Sports Beginners] with the capacity for 1,000 students and the first eight boxing gymnasiums in the territory.

Also an appreciable number of sports installations were remodeled, expanded or built in new-type schools.

In high-yield sports, the presence of 11 Pinar del Rio athletes in the delegation that represented Cuba at the Olympic Games held in Moscow was stimulating. Pugilists Bautista Hernandez and Hipolito Ramos won gold and silver medals respectively.

In recent years, recreation increased quantitatively and qualitatively, especially since the graduation of the first group of technicians in that field from EPEF [Elementary Physical Education School].

Programs in tour cycling, hiking, rally races, sports fishing and hunting, tennis, etc. are being developed now so that the youth and the people in general invest their free time wholesomely and constructively.

Tourism

Natural beauty and that created by man make Pinar del Rio an attractive place for national and international tourism.

The enterprise in charge of those services--created in 1977--did systematic work in this period which included the construction, expansion and remodeling of tourist units.

It is significant that 86,024 foreigners passed through tourist installations--including those who lodged there and those in transit--as did 51,165 people from the province and other parts of the country.

The hotel units in the territory include the modern Pinar del Rio built during this time.

Another project during this period was the installations at Laguna Grande which have comfortable cabins and other accommodations on the shore of a good place for fishing. There is also a prehistoric mural, a beautiful monument.

This includes projects carried out in Cayo Levisa whose beach has become more attractive due to improvements, the Hotel Libertad and the dance area in the Jose Miguel caves.

Remodeling, expansion or maintenance work was done in the Vueltabajo, Occidente, Los Jazmines and Rancho San Vicente hotels, the Indio, Soroa and Maspoton caves and others used for tourism.

During the first years, work in this sector was aimed basically at construction but then there was a turn toward the necessary maintenance of the units which was increasing slowly. The accumulated fulfillment in this period reached 120 percent.

An example of the quality is that, in 1980, the tourist enterprise won first place nationally at the technical-food service meeting for tourist services.

Nevertheless, there were problems due to lack of resources which negatively influenced the quality and variety of services to national and international tourism.

Increased Standard of Living of the People

The ratio between the people's income and expenditures during this period fluctuated although both continued to rise the entire time.

During the first 2 years, income was higher than expenditures but then the situation reversed which helped internal finances.

The increase in income from wages during this stage is significant since, at the beginning, it represented 73 percent of the total and last year increased to 80 percent.

At the same time, expenditures remained stable in the two most important indicators: purchase of merchandise (59 percent) and purchases at public eating places (24 percent).

One sign of how the purchasing power of the people and the concern to improve their standard of living increased is that, during this period, some 415,000 domestic appliances were sold.

These included 29,600 refrigerators, 62,500 televisions, almost 10,000 mixers, 86,000 electric irons, 46,500 radios and 24,000 washers.

There was an increase in income for retirement, pensions and subsidies between 1976 and 1980 since it was 7 percent in 1976 and 10 percent in 1980.

That increase is a clear example of the importance that the revolution gives to social security measures.

During this period, there were new possibilities for consumption and enjoyment by the people in the most diverse areas which expanded the horizon of individual development.

Prospects for the Next 5-Year Period

Pinar del Rio will not stop its rising development.

This westernmost Cuban province will continue its progress along the path of socialist construction in the economic, social, political and cultural fields.

For the 5-year period 1981-85, there are plans for investments of some 800 million pesos which will increase production for export as well as for national consumption.

Tobacco must maintain its productive rate of growth with new areas used for this crop and through the practice of doubling. This means two harvests from the same land. The first example of this will be seen in this 1981-82 harvest when 3,700 caballerias--700 more than planned before--will be harvested; 200 will come from new areas and 500 from doubling.

The main guidelines also include increased sugar production with optimal use of the 30 de Noviembre mill which began operations during the last harvest. Another will be built in the northern part of the province which will become an extensive cane area.

Another prospect is the construction of other mills so Pinar del Rio will no longer be mainly a tobacco area but will become a sugar province also. There must be hard work in clearing, preparing land and sowing large areas, large industrial and agricultural investments and progress in the creation of cane cooperatives for more rational use of the land and resources.

As to produce and vegetables, there are plans to obtain large increases in order to liberate distribution to the people of Pinar del Rio in 1983 and begin to send surpluses to Havana City and other provinces.

The development of citrus plans will continue with new fields. There will also be rice cultivation and increased swine, cattle and poultry raising.

Irrigation will increase, especially for citrus and cane, but also for other crops like pasture, tobacco, vegetables and produce. Expansion of the irrigated areas will mean a reservoir capacity of some 200 million cubic meters.

The Havana-Pinar highway--one of the most important projects of the 5-year period in the province--will guarantee quicker and better access to the capital. Other large investments include the Castellanos mining complex, the first strip mine in Matahambre. The Santa Lucia sulfuric acid plant will be modernized and geological research of the subsoil will increase.

Many projects have been approved by JUCEPLAN [Central Planning Board]. They include: a parts plant, a plant to produce plate glass and a bottle plant, a mineral water bottling factory, a soft drink factory, a coffee processing plant, 57 typical livestock installations, a 630-bed hospital, 2 old folks homes, 5 polyclinics, 7 supermarkets and 10 minimarkets, 13,000 housing units and 7 polytechnical centers.

Matanzas Province

Havana BOHEMIA in Spanish 9 Oct 81 pp 9-14

[Article by Julio Fumero and Alberto Salazar]

[Text] Matanzas is a province with internationally famous beaches: the northern Varadero coast is internationally known for its beauty and the softness of its sand and the southern Giron coast is the symbol of the first great military defeat of imperialism on this continent.

Its territory is characterized by flat land, fertile red soil and vast water resources which are good for agricultural, livestock and industrial development.

Before the new administrative division in 1976, this province had five regions and 34 municipalities, a structure that was simplified to 14 municipalities.

It is second in the country in area--11,741 square kilometers--and its population is about 564,800 for a density of 48.1 people per square kilometer. There are 275,900 women and 180,360 people live in rural areas.

The province has one of the busiest ports in the country--Matanzas--and one of the most beautiful valleys on the island, Yumuri.

The capital city was called the Athens of Cuba due to the rise of culture there in the 19th century, a tradition that is being revived by increased activities in theaters, museums and other installations.

The future development of this territory which in 1974 was the experimental site for the establishment of people's government organs is oriented toward a diversified agroindustrial economy based on sugar production.

Overall Economy

It should be pointed out that gross production in the 5-year period showed an average annual rate of growth of 3.24 percent. It was precisely in 1980 that the best results were obtained, 693.5 million pesos.

In spite of the fact that the province is considered to have an agricultural-livestock economy, the industrial sector created more value--52 percent--mainly through the sugar branch which had the largest production volumes in the country.

Work productivity increased 10.3 percent during this period. The average wage-productivity ratio was positive since both increased but each person in Matanzas contributed more to society than he received in nominal wages.

With respect to economic efficiency, production costs increased from 86 to 94 centavos per peso between 1977 and 1979 but went down 2 centavos in 1980. Hard work is being done to continue this reduction since it is still high, principally in the agricultural-livestock, industrial and construction sectors.

Matanzas made unquestionable progress during these years in the gradual application of the SDPE in order to create mechanisms for better efficiency, better use of resources and increased economic awareness in the political and administrative cadres as well as in the workers in general.

Investments during the 5 years were directed at the development of the main productive sectors, particularly industries, with good results. For example, in 1980 about 141.8 million pesos were invested with 73 percent going to the production sector.

Agricultural-Livestock Activity

After industry, the agricultural-livestock sector is the second most important in the economy of the territory, contributing more than one-fourth of the production value in the period 1976-80.

Because of the effect that its branches have on feeding the people, creating exportable goods and supplying industry, they received priority attention and grew 42.8 percent in the 5-year period with annual average rates of 7.4.

The total amount in 1980 rose to 186 million pesos, almost 56 million more than in 1975. This result is attributable basically to increased productivity and yield per area and not greater area used.

In cane agriculture, the main efforts were directed at better use of irrigation equipment, land preparation, cleaning the fields and denser planting.

It led to higher yields year after year. For example, during the 1978 harvest, it was about 69,100 arrobas per caballeria but it totaled more than 80,000 in 1979.

Nevertheless, in 1980 it went down to 66,000 due to the rust--more than 3,000 caballerias of Barbados 4362 had to be replaced with other varieties--inadequate cleaning and unfavorable rains in July and August.

The situation is encouraging if it is considered that almost 5,000 of the 12,000 caballerias of cane planted in the province have irrigation systems. The 1981 spring campaign was the largest in the history of Matanzas with 70 percent certified seeds.

The technical personnel have a strong influence in achieving greater objectives. In the 27 cane enterprises in the territory, only four of the directors are not engineers although they have more than 15 years of experience in their jobs.

With respect to sugar production, the Yumuri people are justifiably proud of being the top producers in the country and having finished the 5-year period by processing 4,552,000 metric tons, 52,000 more than planned.

The best harvest in this period was in 1979. It was the second time in Matanzas history that more than 1 million tons were reached; the first time was in 1970.

Last year was the only year when the plan was not met--89 percent--due to the effects of rust, weeds, decreased volume of cane to grind and poor industrial efficiency.

Other successes in the agricultural-livestock sector were increased yields and increased production in branches like grains, produce, citrus, milk and meat.

It should be pointed out that potatoes increased from 15.1 tons per hectare in 1975 to 22.2 tons at the end of the 5-year period. This is the production level of developed countries for that crop. There was also a steady increase in rice, malanga and banana.

Enterprises rewarded by the revolution for high yields include the Maximo Gomez which produced 1 million quintals of produce on only 166 caballerias.

Another outstanding achievement in this sector in the province was 3 million quintals of citrus in 1980, more than seven times the 1975 production. The first step was achieving 1 million quintals in 1979 and then tripling the volume the following year. The investment process directed toward that branch will make it possible to obtain 10 million quintals by 1985.

Milk production also recorded levels that surpassed the most optimistic calculations. In 1975, the First Party Congress called for a 75-percent increase in that branch. Only about 54 million liters were produced in Matanzas.

By the Second Party Congress and in salute to this event, the people of Yumuri happily revealed production of 100 million liters. The Matanzas Livestock Genetic Enterprise contributed the largest volume (more than 50 percent).

That victory was also due to an increased number of dairy cows and the increased yield of each animal--about 7.2 liters per cow, almost 2 more than in 1975.

The production of poultry meat was very important. It rose during the 5-year period to 19,000 tons.

The same was true about beef and pork which totaled more than 21,000 tons and 6,000 tons annually. Egg production reached 240 million while the average consumption of the province is 90 million.

With regard to henequen production, it should be noted that the province was advised to stop increasing sown areas because of the market. Therefore, only 4,500 tons were produced annually, 80 percent of the national figure. Now there are prospects of reaching 6,000 tons.

Basic Industries

The production in the province of complete fertilizers, an important branch of the chemical sector, was 1.4 times greater during the 5-year period 1976-80 than it was in the preceding period in spite of the fact that the processing enterprise did not fulfill its plans during the first 4 years.

That growth was basically due to the production of 292,000 tons in 1980 which was a record.

Problems during this period included nonstabilization of production due to poor maintenance of the installations caused by lack of material resources, parts and guarantee by the mechanical industry.

As to paper and school notebooks, there were production problems that led to instability during this period.

At the end of 1979, a rising trend in the results of the enterprise began. In the following year, the plan was fulfilled and the highest number of notebooks in history (85.2 million) was produced.

The production of rayon and fabric remained below the installed capacity and at the same level as in previous periods. This was caused by limitations in the necessary resources for both products.

During the present 5-year period, there will be work to modernize and make capital repairs on the enterprise in charge of those branches since the supply of parts and raw materials from the socialist area has improved.

The electric power sector did well in construction of lines and substations, new consumers and services provided while consumption decreased at the end of this period.

In Matanzas there is an enterprise for drilling and extracting oil in central Cuba. It is involved in geological prospecting, well drilling, tests to determine their productive potential and experimental extraction of crude oil.

Construction Work

Construction work in the province during this period materialized in about 389.1 million pesos of gross production and an important number of economic and social projects.

These last include 34 ESBEC, 133 agricultural-livestock projects, 6,089 housing units, 5 polyclinics, 14 daycare centers, a sodium sulfate recovery plant, a poultry slaughterhouse, a liquid feed plant, a torula yeast factory, an ice factory and the Bellotex textile factory.

Also there is a preprocessing station and a meat-packing plant.

Most of the agricultural-livestock installations--119--were for cattle. There were five for poultry and three for swine.

Hydraulic projects completed during this period benefit more than 3,400 caballerias of cane, 1,200 of citrus, 600 of pasture and forage, 210 of rice, 76 of produce and 34 of beans.

The value of roads totaled more than 42.6 million pesos and included the grading of some 655 kilometers and the paving of 301 kilometers as well as 61 bridges.

Problems basically with supplies kept the construction sector from fulfilling its plans in any of the years of the 5-year period but there were important increases.

It is also encouraging that, as of May 1981, there had been 11 consecutive months when the province had fulfilled its construction programs.

There was progress in the finishing quality, the elaboration of projects and the production of prefabricated parts but problems still persist. The party and the pertinent organisms are working on them.

Transportation and Communications

During this period the gross production of the transportation sector grew about 46 percent in general. This was mainly due to the 40-percent increase in work productivity.

There were increases in the bus sector since the vehicle pool increased 57 percent and trips doubled. In rental cars, the number of vehicles increased 290 percent and roads increased 59 percent.

Nevertheless, one problem during this period was their limited use due to inadequate supplies and problems in operation.

Freight transportation by truck and railroad increased in gross production by 42 and 30 percent respectively while railroad passenger traffic tripled.

There was increased efficiency in the ports of the province during this period. It suffices to say that, in spite of increasing loading and unloading levels, four of the installations did not have to pay for extra lay days.

It was significant that technological development in port activity continued with the introduction of new auxiliary equipment which permitted greater productivity and considerably improved working conditions.

With respect to communications, there were increases in telephone service (63 percent) and in radio communications (tripled) but postal and telegraphic services showed a decrease caused by problems in the quality of the automatic systems.

During this period a set of satellite and matrix plants were put into use for automation and teleselection in the territories of Colon, Jaguey Grande and Limonar which included other municipalities like Los Arabos, Calimete and Perico.

Other successes in these sectors were improvements in the cable transmission system and in long distance circuits, modification of the television transmission system installing better quality and more powerful equipment and the completion of the national microwave system throughout the province.

Public Health

The increased quality in public health services and care during the last 5 years brought many benefits to the people of Matanzas.

To mention only one example, the province had the lowest infant mortality rate in the country in 1980 with 14.5 deaths for every 1,000 born alive. It was 20.1 at the end of 1976.

The network of health care installations in the territory increased with five polyclinics, dental service, an oncology office and a psychiatric teaching hospital. A hygiene and epidemiology laboratory and a health polytechnical school were also constructed.

During this period, 205 doctors, 143 specialists and 1,328 intermediate technicians graduated while the total number of beds for patients reached 2,137 or 3.7 for every 1,000 inhabitants.

Matanzas already has 917 doctors and 227 dentists which means that there are 16.1 doctors and 4 dentists for every 10,000 Yumuri residents.

The number of medical and dental consultations increased during this period. There were 15 million medical and 3.4 million dental consultations.

Education, Scientific-Technical Activity, Culture, Sports

Provincial enrollment in all levels and types of education totaled more than 205,000 students. In other words, more than one out of every three inhabitants increases his cultural or technical level.

During this 5-year period, promotion rates were always over 91 percent with the best percentage in the 1979-80 school year when it reached a formidable 96.5.

Those results led to the graduation of 4,294 intermediate technicians, 6,732 skilled workers and 1,580 advanced level professionals (not including pedagogic specialties). Thus, the economy received a healthy influx of skilled personnel.

Also the 43,000 adults who obtained their sixth grade certificates are in a better position now to contribute to the development of the territory.

Since development will demand more and more skilled manpower, the classrooms continue training personnel to satisfy this requirement. At this time, 77,000 students are enrolled in primary schools, 45,000 in secondary schools, 10,800 in preuniversity schools, 2,000 in teacher-training centers, 15,200 in technical and professional education and 8,600 in advanced schools.

In order to have room for that large number of students, 10 rural preuniversity schools, 20 ESBEC, 9 urban secondary schools, 1 vocational school, 1 EIDE, 1 pedagogic school, 1 school for daycare center teachers, 1 health polytechnical school, 3 semiboarding primary schools, 1 special education school and other installations were built during this 5-year period. They noticeably increased school capacity.

Concerning training and advancement of educational personnel, 1,780 primary school teachers graduated and all those in practice--1,711--were certified as were 75 percent of the physical education teachers.

Also 1,493 in basic secondary, 594 in the pedagogic detachment and 697 at the advanced level graduated from directed studies at the Educational Advancement Institute.

Concerning improvement of education, the application of new school programs in all general polytechnical and labor education, adult education, technological and professional education and in the pedagogic classrooms stood out.

In mentioning the main achievements in scientific-technical activity, it is necessary to refer to the work of the experimental pasture and forage stations.

The first called Indio Hatuey made six studies that will be generalized for the entire country. They should yield an annual dividend of more than 11.5 million pesos. These studies include the search for new pasture varieties and conservation techniques, agrotechnical systems and systems for milk production, meat production and raising young cattle.

The Antonio Mesa experimental station for cane did important research on cane varieties and sowing. The Victoria de Giron station for citrus had its most significant success in producing 2 million plants free of viral diseases.

Other important results in the scientific-technical sector are the creation of the multisectorial information center and expansion of the network of meteorological stations which now total seven.

The tie between the Academy of Sciences and the economic and educational units improves each day with possibilities of cooperating in their activities. The activities of the Youth Technical Brigades and the National Association of Innovators and Efficiency Experts are also stimulated.

In the cultural field, the increase of cultural installations is noticeable. During this period, 9 movie theaters, 24 libraries, 4 museums, 20 houses of culture and 7 bookstores opened. The amateurs movement experienced quantitative and qualitative improvements but better work is still possible. In that context, the work done by the 20th Anniversary Brigade and the ESBEC's in Jaguey Grande stand out.

In the sports sector, new areas opened for practicing different sports and training teaching personnel in that branch. There were also new baseball and boxing academies, the EIDE and EPEF.

It suffices to say that each of the rural schools built has a module with seven sports installations. Also the Victoria de Giron stadium and several boxing gymnasiums were built.

The progress in the province in social sports is reflected in the second and fourth places it won nationally in 1979 and 1980. Its contribution of 70 athletes to the high-yield teams was valuable.

Concerning recreational activities, Matanzas has programs for hiking, hunting, sports fishing, etc. so that the youth and the people in general invest their free time wholesomely and educationally.

Tourism

Matanzas has two enterprises in its territory devoted to national and international tourism: Varadero, the most important in Cuba, and Cienaga de Zapata.

The former has lodging for about 5,070 people. Its rate of occupancy at the end of 1980 was 71 percent, an internationally impressive figure.

There was sustained growth in the number of rooms starting in 1978; by 1980, there were 529 more. In 1981, Hotel Atabey opened with 136 rooms.

From 1977 to 1980, there was an increase of 402,911 tourist-days lodging while the total figure for those 4 years was 5,244,431.

In Cienaga de Zapata--which includes Guama, Playa Larga and Giron--the rates also rose.

With the opening of 25 more rooms in Playa Giron in 1980 (another 98 will open in 1981), the total increased during this period to 234.

It should be pointed out that neither enterprise fills its rooms for the entire year but only for 3 or 4 months, basically in the summer season.

There is work in those places for rest and recreation toward better service through worker training, increased demand of the personnel and good evaluation of criticisms and complaints from the guests.

Increased Standard of Living of the People

One of the indicators that measures the increased standard of living of the people best is the relationship between income and expenditures per capita.

It should be noted that the monetary per-capita income in Matanzas increased 129 pesos from 1975 to 1980 while each Yumuri resident spent 204 pesos more in the last year than in the first.

Until 1977, income was higher than expenditures but in that year they were the same. After 1977, expenditures were higher. In 1980, each citizen spent 35 pesos more than he received in nominal wages.

Trade circulation during this 5-year period showed uninterrupted growth. Sales to the people increased about 76.8 million pesos and sales in public eating places increased 32.4 million pesos.

One reflection of how the purchasing power of the people and concern for improving their standard of living increased is the sale of some 62,200 domestic appliances, practically double the number in 1975.

During this 5-year period, Matanzas homes received some 172,000 of these appliances including 22,800 refrigerators, 23,600 televisions, 13,500 washers, 30,200 fans, 11,100 mixers and 70,800 electric irons.

It can be stated in general that, during this period, new possibilities for consumption and enjoyment by the people opened in the most diverse fields to expand the horizon of individual development.

Prospects

Matanzas' plans for the 5-year period 1981-85 total 995.7 million pesos in gross production, 29.6 percent more than in the previous 5-year period.

Investments play a fundamental part in this growth. They include a 325-megawatt thermoelectric powerplant, a new sugar mill in Los Arabos with the capacity to grind 600,000 arrobas daily and a supertanker base.

Other projects to be constructed include a citrus complex and 3 packing plants in Jaguey Grande, a rock crushing plant in Alacranes, an IMS plant in Cardenas, 71 agricultural-livestock projects, 3 polyclinics, a medical science school, a surgical hospital with 630 beds, remodeling of tourist installations in Varadero and 12,600 housing units, 1,000 of them for agricultural-livestock cooperatives.

At the end of the next 5-year period, the province will have about 582,200 inhabitants and the prospects for their standard of living are encouraging. The number of beds for medical care, doctors, dentists and daycare centers will increase.

Enrollment in preschool, primary and intermediate education will total 181,000 students. More housing will be finished and distributed than in 1980.

Villa Clara Province

Havana BOHEMIA in Spanish 16 Oct 81 pp 8-13

[Article by Alberto Salazar and Julio Fumero]

[Text] Santa Clara was the last stronghold of the Batista tyranny during the final stage of our wars for independence.

Com Ernesto Guevara fought the historic battle there that ruined the few hopes of the reactionary military dictatorship to maintain its control over the island. Che's invading column that joined Camilo's left from there to carry out Fidel's clear order to take the main military bastions in Havana to prevent a military coup and thus consolidate the revolutionary triumph.

At that time, Santa Clara was the capital of Las Villas, a territory that increased when the administrative division went into effect in 1976. Now that city is the capital of Villa Clara Province located in central Cuba.

Its 8,782 square kilometers make Villa Clara sixth in the country in area and fourth in population with more than 776,000 inhabitants for a density of more than 88 people per square kilometer.

This territory is mainly flat although the Sierra del Escambray is in the south. Its fertile lands are good for sugar cane. With this raw material, it is one of the top provinces nationally in production.

Sustained work during these years led to economic diversification which permits the province to have important industries and a strong agricultural-livestock sector. The land is distributed almost equally between these two sectors.

Future development of this province includes increased agroindustrial growth with sugar production maintaining its main role.

Overall Economy

The balance of the overall economic results in the province during the 5-year period 1976-80 was satisfactory. Proof is the increase in gross production of more than 143.3 million pesos with an average annual rate of growth of approximately 5.4 percent.

A significant detail is the dynamic increase shown by the construction sector--third in importance--which rose to 10 percent. The best years for that sector were 1978 and 1979 which were characterized by a strong investment process.

As to economic efficiency indicators, the cost of production increased from 79 centavos per peso in 1977 to 95 centavos in 1980. There was serious work to lower that index which is so important for the production process.

Work productivity increased at an average annual rate of 5.7 percent and the average wage increased 2.5 percent.

Since 1977 the enterprises and budgeted units in the province have been working to implement the subsystems of the SDPE but the results were not always encouraging.

With respect to the materialization of the socialist principle of distribution based on work, the period showed a low level of development in payment for yield.

The reasons for that included lack of priority which meant less demand and control by the administration, a situation that is being solved.

Agricultural-Livestock Activity

The growth of the branches in this sector led to more supplies for the people and industry as well as the creation of a greater flow of exportable goods.

This can be seen in the fact that gross production was 105.6 million pesos in 1976 and rose to 131.3 million pesos in 1980.

There was steady growth in that indicator until 1978 when it peaked at 140 million pesos. It went down to 124 million in 1979--the lowest in this period--and later recovered to the level mentioned above.

In spite of this fluctuation, it should be noted that the average rate of growth for the 5-year period was 3.2 percent, basically due to an increase of almost 7 percent in productivity.

It should also be noted that this fluctuation was largely attributable to factors like rust and blue mold which noticeably affected the cane and tobacco fields. There were also organizational and subjective problems which can be improved.

During this period, cane agriculture showed steady development in its indicators with a decline in 1980 because of a considerable drop in the delivery of cane. This was due to the destruction in sown areas which had the Barbados 4362 variety --more than 40 percent of the total--which were affected by the rust.

The low agricultural and industrial yields were also a factor but they are now being improved with favorable agrotechnical work under the cane recovery policy.

In that context, it should be mentioned that cane sowing reached its peak in 1980, 57,700 hectares. More was done by the "cantero" system which means denser planting in areas with poor drainage and a considerable reduction in losses.

Raw sugar production totaled 753,000 tons in 1976. In the next 3 years, it was more than 835,000 but in 1980, due to the factors already cited, it only reached 650,300 tons.

Its rate of growth was 6.8 percent from 1976 to 1980 and the biggest harvest was in 1978, 885,000 tons.

In the production of produce and vegetables, it should be noted that, although the planned levels were not reached by the end of the 5-year period, the results in 1980 were much higher than in 1976.

Tubers and roots rose from 21,000 tons to 78,000 tons with favorable results in potatoes which went from 2,100 tons to about 16,700.

The increase in vegetables was noticeable. The 29,000 tons harvested in 1976 were more than tripled in 1980. Citrus rose from 3,900 tons to more than 10,000 tons.

There were fluctuations in the livestock branch. For example, the number of cattle went down from 518,200 in 1976 to 490,000 in 1979 because of slaughters to achieve a meat balance. There was a recovery in 1980 to 494,000 head.

The number of swine fluctuated due to adjustments in production plans by the administration of that branch. The number went down from 59,900 in 1976 to 49,000 in 1979. Nevertheless, the increase in 1980 was significant; it rose to 77,100, the highest figure during the 5-year period.

Poultry, including meat and eggs, had a steady rate of growth attributable to new capacity in the different sectors of this branch. These included two farms for laying hens, three for breeders, two for replacement of laying hens and two for incubation plants.

The increase in dairy cows and yield per animal translated into greater milk production. It went from 40.5 million liters in 1976 to 53.2 million in 1980.

Progress toward superior forms of agricultural-livestock production in the province is shown by the formation of 125 peasant cooperatives which cover 2,116 caballerias and have 4,365 members.

Of those cooperatives, 55 are devoted to cane, 53 to tobacco, 2 to livestock, 12 to produce and vegetables and 3 to coffee.

It is the intention of ANAP [National Association of Small Farmers] in Villa Clara to form 35 cooperatives in 1981 covering about 440 caballerias and 1,300 members.

Basic Industries

The economic and productive results obtained by the enterprises in the basic industries sector can be considered satisfactory.

In the Fabric Aguilar Noriega enterprise for mechanical construction--now undergoing major expansion--there was acceptable work in the fulfillment of its plans for production of equipment and spare parts, basically for the sugar industry--especially the new mills.

To cite only one example, the enterprise set a record for cast steel in 1979 with 6,100 metric tons. It had an annual rate of growth of 0.9 percent.

Another large industry in the territory is the Primero de Mayo domestic utensils plant. It had serious problems in recent years due to irregular supplies of raw materials and essential components.

The Neftali Martinez enterprise which produces spark plugs had favorable results in fulfilling its plans. It produced about 5.3 million units during this period and had an annual rate of growth of 1.3 percent.

The Elpidio Sosa electrochemical plant in Sagua la Grande met its goals during this period in spite of problems with supplies of some raw materials and other important materials.

The enterprise in charge of geological projects gave a satisfactory response to the plans. These included a geological relief map of Escambray and conclusion of its final report which will reveal the mineral wealth of that region and mining possibilities.

Work in the electric power sector in Villa Clara was done by the territorial enterprise for transmission and distribution in central Cuba. It did good work in eliminating illegal connections ("hookups") and constructing high voltage lines and substations.

As to that last aspect, the Santa Clara-Havana, Santa Clara-Cienfuegos and Santa Clara-Vicente segments (all 220-kilovolt lines) and substations in Manicaragua and Remedios (both 110 kilovolt) and Yabu (220 kilovolt) were completed.

Work by the mechanized column in the province was good since they overfulfilled their objectives during this period.

Construction Work

The construction sector created gross production values of 764.1 million pesos in the period 1976-80 with an average growth of 7 percent. This indicator went down about 15 million from 1979 to 1980.

The increase since 1976 is encouraging since it went from 108.8 million pesos to 154.2 million.

The largest amounts were for: hydraulic projects, 184.5 million pesos; industrial, 130.1 million; educational, 82.3 million; housing and urbanization, 62.8 million; and agricultural-livestock installations, 34.2 million.

Compared to 1975, industrial projects more than quintupled by 1980 even though there was a decline compared to 1979.

The 38 educational installations completed during this period provided more than 33,000 new seats. There were 15 intermediate schools, 1 advanced school and 4 daycare centers.

More than 5,200 housing units were finished which increased living space by some 248,000 square meters.

The central railroad in the province is now 116 kilometers long. Its projects increased more than six times compared to 1975. The national highway, already joined to Havana by one lane while the other is being worked on, is also an important project.

The agricultural-livestock projects included 10 typical dairies, 7 poultry units--including one totally automatic farm for layers--a swine breeding farm, a liquid feed plant, a plant protection station, a fertilizer warehouse and a poultry slaughterhouse.

Other installations completed during this period were four polyclinics, the first stage of Hotel Elguea and three business centers.

Investments totaled more than 800 million pesos with the largest amount going to the production sector, especially basic industry and construction materials.

The main projects that received investments were the Desembarco del Granma textile complex, the plants for animal meal, oxygen, sodium chloride and torula yeast at the Perucho Figueredo mill, the repair shop for capitalist motors, the concrete pipe complex, expansion of the mechanical plant and the Sagua la Grande boiler factory.

There were noticeable quantitative and qualitative improvements in these projects with the introduction into the enterprises of systems of control and the creation of teams to achieve better use of manpower.

The internationalist spirit of the construction workers in the province is reflected in the fact that more than 900 of them went to other fraternal countries.

Transportation and Communications

The transportation sector showed an average rate of growth of 10.7 percent during this 5-year period. It was characterized by a constant increase in gross production and work productivity.

The vehicle pool increased with the addition of Giron IV and Giron V buses in 1978 and 1979 for intermunicipal, rural and school service. A year later, more Giron V buses reinforced the urban, intermunicipal and rural lines. There were also reconstructed Leyland buses which were all assigned to the city of Santa Clara.

This growth meant an increased number of trips and passengers transported although there are still problems in urban service, basically in the provincial capital.

During this period, there were fluctuations in automobile transportation caused mainly by a shortage of tires for taxis and the poor condition of the equipment.

Work in the truck sector was favorable with growths in transportation, number of vehicles, capacity--mainly due to incorporation of trailers--and productivity per unit.

The greatest increases in freight were achieved in 1977 and 1978; this remained stable in the last 2 years of the 5-year period. It increased 1.7 million tons from 1976 to 1980.

As to the communications sector, gross production had an annual rate of growth of 10 percent with a constant increase throughout the period. It totaled 2.6 million pesos more in 1980 than in the first year of the period analyzed.

Growth was slow in postal service due to the nature of the service itself. This was also true for telegraph services although this was affected by the continual increase of new telephone technology inside and outside the province which sped up communications.

An increase in the radio and television relay stations with subsequent benefits for the people characterized work in that sphere. There was also increased efficiency in plant maintenance.

During these 5 years, there were large investments in the entire sector, especially in telephone activities with the installation of centrals for direct long-distance dialing without operator assistance.

Those achievements represented 65 percent of the total production value in communications with an increase of 1.7 million pesos between the first and last year of the period.

Public Health

Work in the health sector during the period 1976-80 was satisfactory.

During this period, the infant mortality rate went down. It was about 16.4 deaths for every 1,000 born alive in 1976 and went down to 15.8 in 1980.

As to health care installations, there was one new urban hospital which opened for scholarship students of the Ernesto Che Guevara vocational school. There were four new polyclinics.

The number of beds only increased by 50--in the mentioned vocational school hospital--while those for social welfare remained the same.

There was an important increase in the number of consultations per inhabitant which went from 3.9 to 5.

Villa Clara has 840 doctors and 186 dentists or 10.75 doctors and 2.38 dentists for every 10,000 persons.

There are almost 900 nurses, more than 870 nurse's aides and more than 1,610 health technicians.

For training medical and paramedical personnel, the province has an advanced medical science institute, a health polytechnical school and a technological nursing school.

Education, Scientific-Technical Activity, Culture, Sports

Some 260,000 people in the province are studying at different levels and in different types of education. This means approximately one out of every three Villa Clara inhabitants is improving his cultural or technical level.

A comparative analysis of enrollment in the 1975-76 and 1980-81 school years shows increases in almost all cases: basic secondary enrollment went from 33,000 to 55,000; preuniversity education from 4,000 to 15,000; advanced education from 9,000 to 16,000; and technical and professional education from 6,000 to 13,000.

There were declines in primary education (from 145,000 to 115,000) attributable to stability in the rate of population growth and in adult education (from 31,000 to 18,000) because of the end of the battle for sixth grade. More than 43,000 people graduated from sixth grade in the past 5 years.

There were also decreases in training educational personnel and in the youth movement caused by the certification of thousands of teachers, including all the primary teachers who did not have certification.

Another advance was the certification of about 70 percent of those who teach in secondary and preuniversity schools. There were new school programs in all the general polytechnical and labor schools, adult education, technical and professional education and pedagogic schools.

Promotion was acceptable throughout the period and constantly increased, except in primary school. There it went down from 98.1 percent in the 1975-76 school year to 91.31 in the 1979-80 school year.

The educational projects that opened during this 5-year period included 15 ESBEC, 21 urban secondary schools, 3 preuniversity schools, a polytechnical institute, an advanced medical science institute, an advanced pedagogic school and 2 Camilo Cienfuegos military vocational schools.

In scientific-technical activity, research was directed basically at solving concrete problems of economic development in the country and particularly in the province. However, there should be a better tie between the research centers and the production centers.

Work in the cultural sphere was characterized by a growth in the material base and improved quality in the different activities.

There was greater stability in the amateurs movement and 26 artistic brigades were created.

Proof of success in this sector is the 19 national awards and 8 honorable mentions won by the province as well as first prize won by the artistic group 13 de Marzo at the Burgas (Bulgaria) international festival and the large Villa Clara artistic delegation to the 11th world festival of youth and students.

Another important aspect in this sector is the development in each municipality of days and weeks of culture and evaluation of historic sites. Some were declared national monuments: Remedios urban center, La Caridad theater and the birth places of Abel Santamaria, Jesus Menendez and Manuel Ascunce.

During this period, Villa Clara reached a total of 37 libraries and opened the only industrial museum in the country at the Abel Santamaria mill. It sextupled the functions of the amateurs groups, added 13 pieces of 35-millimeter movie equipment to the 37 it had in 1976 and quintupled the number of bookstores to 20.

In sports, there was a substantial increase in participation in school and social sports. There were 359,000 people involved in 1976 and 515,166 in 1980. The technical work force during that period increased by more than 200 trainers and physical education teachers.

The province is known for its strength in some sports like baseball, soccer and sailing. A plan was put into effect to advance in others like boxing and gymnastics which are poorly developed in Villa Clara.

The sports and sports education installations opened during this period have a great responsibility in the successes achieved.

These include the training school for physical education teachers, seven boxing gymnasiums, five baseball stadiums, the remodeling of five swimming pools and the construction of others.

Recreational activities increased with programs for sports fishing and hunting, rally races, hiking and tennis.

Increased Standard of Living of the People

The ratio between the income and expenditures per capita became favorable for internal finances in 1980.

Each person in Villa Clara received more monetary income than he spent in the first 4 years while in the last he paid out 4 pesos more than he received.

Both indicators increased during this period with annual rates of increase of 2.4 for expenditures and 1.4 for income.

The greatest increase in expenditures was caused by retail trade and the average monthly wage since the former--which equals 90 percent of the total per-capita expenditures--showed an average rate of increase of 5.5 percent while income increased 2.4.

Between 1976 and 1980, that trade went from 481 pesos to 596 and wages went from 134 to 148 pesos.

Prospects

Villa Clara Province has planned an important increase in gross production in all the economic branches for the 5-year period 1981-85. According to the plans, it must increase 36 percent or about 7 percent annually.

In the basic sector--sugar production--the planned increase is almost double. By the last year of the 5-year period, 84 percent more sugar should be processed than in 1980. This requires fulfillment of the annual estimates with increased technology in industry as well as in agriculture.

Already in the last 5-year period, construction of a new mill that should begin operations in the 1983-84 harvest began. Another mill will be built during this period to open during the 1985-86 harvest.

Large industrial investments in these 5 years include the Fabric Aguilar Noriega mechanical production enterprise which, when finished--scheduled for 1984 but a year ahead of plans--will produce a major part of the equipment that the national sugar mills need.

In the middle of the 5-year period, a factory for concrete ties and elastic fasteners should be finished for the railroad sector. Two lines are functioning this year.

This group of investments includes two plants for capital repairs of automotive transportation equipment from socialist as well as capitalist countries. They should be finished in 1982 or 1983.

The most important social project to be built in the 5-year period is the provincial surgical hospital which will initially have 600 beds. The project will later add 300 more.

Some 15,230 housing units, a figure never before achieved in a 5-year period, will be built. There will be an infrastructure of installations and skilled manpower that will permit achievement of more ambitious plans.

In agriculture, increases in branches like produce, vegetables and tobacco are important for the 5-year period. There is also a major plan for coffee development in the province.

The main efforts in livestock will be focused on solving food problems in order to guarantee growths in the meat and milk production.

Ciego de Avila Province

Havana BOHEMIA in Spanish 23 Oct 81 pp 8-13

[Article by Alberto Salazar and Julio Fumero]

[Text] Ciego de Avila is known for its agricultural-livestock development which is strongly influenced by its almost level topography and fertile soil. Citrus and pineapple make the territory first nationally in quality and production respectively.

Three-fourths of the tillable land in the province is used for cane. Its nine sugar mills--including some of the largest in the country--process approximately one-tenth of the Cuban sugar.

Given the importance of agricultural-livestock production in the Ciego de Avila economy, most of the industries are agricultural processors like pineapple processors, citrus packing, pasteurizing plants and kenaf and torula factories.

Livestock is also important in this province. In recent years, it went to modern systems of intensive exploitation. There was also development in the construction sector, basically in the construction of highways, dams, housing communities, dairies and public health and educational installations.

One thing that has always conspired against economic development in the territory is its small population. In spite of being eighth in the country in area, it is last in population.

This problem is receiving a strong response now. All the sectors are fighting to increase work productivity as a way to increase the material goods that the territory produces and, therefore, make up for its manpower shortage.

Ciego de Avila is now involved in the construction of important new projects in practically all the socioeconomic sectors including torula factories for feeding livestock and factories to make wood from sugar-cane bagasse.

The future development of the province is oriented toward the strengthening of its agricultural-livestock sector, mainly encouragement of the sugar-cane derivatives industry.

Overall Economy

The economic sectors in the province reached a gross production of 331.4 million pesos during this 5-year period, an increase of 35.4 percent compared to the previous period or 86.6 million pesos.

Work productivity and the average wage are important indicators that measure the efficiency of the labor process. They increased 29 and 20 percent respectively because of the general wage reform. In spite of this significant increase in the latter, the correlation between the two was favorable.

Concerning measures for work organization and wages, the province tied 52.5 percent of the work force in the business sector by the end of 1980; this was an overfulfillment of the plan. The plan for updating norms was also overfulfilled.

Another important task was the application of the general wage reform.

During this period, implementation of the SDPE advanced well but there are still problems being worked on. The mechanisms in the SDPE are being implemented; now they need to be perfected and expanded.

Agricultural-Livestock Activity

Since the administrative division, the sugar branch has made substantial achievements. It was significant that on only two occasions during this period were the volumes of this product below the 1970 sugar harvest. The figures reached in the basic parameters of industrial exploitation were also good.

During the period 1976-80, the average annual amount of sugar processed was about 765,000 tons, a 38-percent increase compared to the previous 5-year period. Comparing the first year of the 5-year period to the last, there was growth in the potential norm used and a decrease in oil consumption with the subsequent savings.

Cane production increased about 16 percent in 1980 compared to 1976 while the amount of cane that could be processed increased almost 17 percent.

Most of the cane cultivation activities--like fertilization, manual cleaning and application of herbicides--also increased substantially. There was a 132-percent increase in resowing which is so important in improving yields.

In noncane agriculture, there were slight increases in sowing and harvesting tubers and roots but there were considerable increases in the yields of some crops like potato, malanga and yucca. This was basically attributable to changes in varieties and technologies.

The province did not plan to expand citrus areas during the 5-year period but to limit increases to interplanting and resowing. The increase in yields meant an increase in fruit production from 870,000 quintals in 1976 to 1,461,700 in 1980. There was also a notable increase in exports.

Ciego de Avila obtained good results in its tobacco crop in the first 2 years but then the blue mold strongly affected the fields. For the 1980-81 harvest, 108 caballerias were sown under the plan for tobacco recovery which means gross production of 25,000 quintals due to the effort of the private and state sectors.

Projects for conservation of flora and fauna began in this territory in the middle of 1980. Six areas including Cayo Coco were declared protected zones. In spite of the short duration of these projects, they are being earnestly fulfilled.

There were decreases during this period in the number of cattle and milk and meat production. Nevertheless, there has been a recovery in livestock work in general since last year, stimulated mainly by the model units.

Nevertheless, pork and poultry production increased 117 and 55 percent respectively while the egg supply increased by 12 million.

Work with the peasants toward superior forms of agricultural-livestock production led to the formation of 80 cooperatives in the province; most (44) are cane cooperatives.

Those groups cover an area of 1,964 caballerias--30 percent of the land belonging to the private sector--and have 2,235 members.

Basic Industries

The mining projects were aimed at geological prospecting during these 5 years in order to determine the possible mineral and hydrocarbon reserves in the territory.

Deposits of mineral salt were found in the northern part of the province. They are under study to estimate the investments that will be needed for extraction.

There is other mineral potential in the northwest part of the territory although it has not yet been fully determined.

As to the electric power sector, a great number of economic and social objectives received electricity during this 5-year period like industrial complexes, dairies, tourist centers, polyclinics, urban and rural minidistricts, schools, agricultural-livestock plans and cooperatives.

During this period, 584 kilometers of electric lines of different voltages were constructed and 97 kilometers of the 220-kilovolt line for the province were finished.

Construction Work

During this period, all the branches of the construction sector created values of 181,031,000 pesos. The vice directorate of architecture achieved more than 53 million and the vice directorate of engineering more than 49 million. Housing totaled more than 31 million.

The 21 industrial projects completed during that period included the citrus-processing plant, two torula yeast factories, a rock crushing plant, a pasteurizing plant, a general carpentry shop and a cracker factory.

The 27 agricultural-livestock projects included 10 dairies, 5 weaning centers, 4 development centers and 3 breeding centers. There were one each for swine and poultry.

During these 5 years, 4,236 housing units, 50 social projects (including two modern hotels in the cities of Ciego de Avila and Moron) and 42 educational centers were completed. Also 406 kilometers of highway were paved.

Transportation and Communications

Passenger transportation is an activity that showed a rising trend in the province during the 5-year period. There was a 22-percent increase in the automotive branch (only decline was in automobiles) and a 2-percent increase in railroads.

As to the equipment pool, the number of regular buses increased from 199 to 350, school buses from 60 to 70 and railroad locomotives from 34 to 37.

Freight transportation increased 19 percent from the port of Jucaro and 108 percent by truck. The increase in the latter was basically attributable to work efficiency in the port-transportation-internal economy chain.

Agricultural aviation in the territory, used for fertilization and spraying herbicides and insecticides, has nine old airplanes that work thanks to the effort of the workers.

In the communications branch, the value of gross production more than doubled in the last year of the 5-year period compared to the first; it totaled 4,643,600 pesos. The cause of that growth was an increase in installed capacity and the higher level achieved in all production activities of the enterprise that directs that work.

During the 5-year period, 4,400 telephones were installed in the province, an 80-percent increase over the beginning of the period. Long-distance telephone traffic increased 191 percent. The automatic centrals increased from 5 in 1976 to 16 in 1980.

The general behavior of the mail, telegraph and press distribution sector was good during these 5 years. For example, postal service increased its value by 88 percent, telegraph went up 11 percent and press distribution increased 112 percent.

Public Health

During the past 5-year period in Ciego de Avila, public health services increased and improved. At the end of the previous period, the average life expectancy of the people was about 70 years but it rose to 75 by 1980.

The ratio of doctors for every 10,000 inhabitants increased from 6.8 in the first year of this period to 10.4 by the last year. There were also increases in the proportion of dentists (17 percent) and nurses and nurse's aides (24 percent). Medical consultations per inhabitant increased from four to five.

Another indicator that had a positive balance at the end of the 5-year period was the infant mortality rate. In 1975, it was 33.3 deaths for every 1,000 born alive but it went down to 21.4 in 1980.

During these years, there was work on the construction of a modern hospital in Moron which should be finished during this 5-year period. Its 630 beds will increase the total in the province to 1,510 and will increase the rate for every 1,000 inhabitants to 4.8.

Education, Culture, Sports, Recreation

After the application of the administrative division, 42 educational installations were built in the Ciego de Avila territory.

They included four ESBEC, one IPUEC [Preuniversity Farming and Academic Institute], two polytechnical institutes, two pedagogic schools, nine urban basic secondary schools, three primary schools and five daycare centers.

With that new capacity and the measures adopted to insure attendance to the classrooms by all the people in order to increase their general or technical level, it was possible for 101,486 people to enroll at all levels of education in the 1980-81 school year.

During these years, the plan to improve the educational system received priority attention due to its great importance for the development of technical and educational work.

In culture, there was an increase in quantity and quality in the amateurs movement. The small number of groups that existed at the beginning of the 5-year period increased to 481 by the end, including the 20th Anniversary brigade, winner of several awards at international events, and the Turiguano group.

The creation of the Ruben Martinez Villena art instructors brigade had a lot to do with that progress. It basically took care of the movement in the new-type educational centers. In 1976, Ciego de Avila only had 11 instructors but there are 53 in 1980.

Another factor that affected that growth in the amateurs sector was the work done by the houses of culture. Three opened during this period and four others are under construction.

During these years, four movie theaters were built and two were remodeled and a museum, a museum house, a theater and a house of song--the last two municipal--opened. At the same time, the Principal Theater in the Ciego de Avila capital and two libraries including the provincial library were repaired.

Referring to development in the sports sector during this 5-year period, it suffices to say that the territory contributed 23 athletes to national preselections in 1979 and 1980. At the same time, 15 entered the national ESPA [Advanced School of Athletic Improvement] and four entered the military school.

It is very impressive that six people from Ciego de Avila who were part of the Cuban delegation to the Central American and Caribbean Games held in Cali, Colombia, in 1978 won four gold and two silver medals.

During this 5-year period four boxing gymnasiums, one judo and one for weights were built and a chess academy opened. Also several baseball stadiums were remodeled and the construction of two swimming pools began.

Physical recreation has developed, not rapidly but steadily and systematically.

The plans established by the national directorate of INDER [National Institute for Sports, Physical Education and Recreation] for the use of free time by children, youths and adults were carried out. Some were well accepted by the people.

Prospects

For the 5-year period 1981-85, the Ciego de Avila Province has planned an annual rate of growth of production of 6 percent more than achieved during the previous period.

That figure is considered high for the territory but the party leadership and the state leadership feel it is possible to achieve it based on the general plans for the main productive categories, especially agriculture.

The planned levels of increase for this period are particularly high in the sugar sector, both the cane branch and the industrial branch. Other crops such as citrus, produce, fruits and vegetables should have large increases compared to the last 5-year period.

Important projects to be completed during this 5-year period include the bagasse board factory which is practically finished and the 630-bed provincial hospital that is being built in Moron.

Also included in the plans for the period are the citrus complex in Ceballos--area where there is an outstanding fruit enterprise--several meat-packing plants, factories for soft drinks, candy and industrial lighting and others that will be important for the industrial development of the territory.

Social projects to be built include polyclinics in several of the municipalities, a health polytechnical school, the Ciego de Avila university and educational installations that will reinforce the educational infrastructure.

The province is also involved in serious work to create the social conditions to retain technicians who live there or who come from other provinces to work since that skilled manpower is very necessary for the planned development of that territory.

U.S. BLOCKADE PLANS PROTESTED--Addressing a plenary session of the International Maritime Organization today, the Cuban delegate denounced U.S. plans for a (?coordinated) total or partial blockade of our country's ports. Carlos Trejo, Cuban charge d'affaires in the United Kingdom and head of the delegation to the 12th period of sessions of this intergovernmental consultative maritime organization, said that the threat alone by the United States to curtail the freedom of navigation of our ships is evidence of the absolute lack of respect for international (?navigation) principles such as sovereign equality and territorial integrity of nations. No form of international law, the Cuban delegate added, authorizes a state to impose a maritime blockade or curtail the freedom of navigation of the ships of other states. GDR'S HONECKER PLEDGES SOLIDARITY--Erich Honecker, secretary general of Germany's Socialist Unity Party, expressed the strongest solidarity with Cuba as it faces all the threats of aggression from the United States. Addressing the third plenary session of the Central Committee started yesterday in Berlin, capital city of the GDR, Honecker pledged unlimited solidarity between the brother nation of Cuba and the people and party of the GDR. CHANGES IN U.S. CARIBBEAN COMMAND--U.S. Secretary of Defense Caspar Weinberger Sunday voiced the possibility of his country's direct aggression in Central America. Today, the U.S. Department of Defense decided to increase the might of the anti-Cuban vigilance base at Key West, state of Florida. Beginning December, the U.S. high command for the Caribbean region will be headquartered there. In a case of need, this command will be able to get the assistance of naval, ground or air units. Rear Adm Robert McKenzie, chief of the Key West base, will head the Caribbean high command which will operate in a vast area including the Caribbean, Gulf of Mexico and the portion of the Pacific Ocean bordering on Central America. HART MEETS DELEGATES--On Saturday, Armando Hart Davalos, member of the Politburo of the Communist Party of Cuba and culture minister, met with the delegates who participated in the seminar on the situation of the black, Chicano, Cuban and Puerto Rican communities in the United States. This seminar took place in Havana this week. Santaigo Diaz, director of the Cuban Center for American studies, was also present at the meeting. This research center and Casa de Las Americas sponsored the seminar that has just concluded. During the meeting it was announced that such activity will continue and that a work group will be organized to exchange points of view and to schedule the subjects to be discussed in future meetings. [Text] [PA222101 Havana International Service in Spanish 1800 GMT 22 Nov 81] Using the words of Jose Marti as a warning against the racist policies of the United States, the seminar on the situation of the black, Chicano, Cuban, Indian and Puerto Rican communities was brought to a close. Santiago Diaz, director of the Center for American Studies, in closing said that the seminar served as a positive contribution to the social sciences of our continent, so dear to the Cuban national hero. During the seminar, which began 17 November, two working committees met to study the topics "the realities of the unique communities," "existing similarities, differences and contradictions" and "the concept of the national identity." 'BARBADOS CRIME' TRIAL DELAY--Cuba's Foreign Ministry [MINREX] has reported that on 13 November it received through the Venezuelan Embassy in Havana the rogatories for the orders to furnish better proof, which had been requested by the martial court of the Republic of Venezuela. The rogatories were required for the trial of the criminal saboteurs of the Cubana Airlines plane which killed 73 persons in 1976. The MINREX communique of 22 October 1981 states: The Foreign Ministry made it known that up to that date it had not received the rogatories or official requests relative to that trial. In order to clearly fix responsibilities for the delay of that process before international public opinion, before Venezuelan public opinion and before the nations having normal relations with Cuba, it is appropriate to point out that said rogatories appear dated and filed with the martial court of Venezuela on 15 June 1981. The rogatories were certified by Venezuela's Foreign Ministry on 28 September 1981, certified by the Venezuelan Embassy in Havana on 11 November 1981 and delivered to Cuba's Foreign Ministry on 13 November 1981 and dated the previous day. ISRAEL'S VIOLATION OF HUMAN RIGHTS--Before the UN Political Committee, Cuba has voiced indignation for the violation of human rights in Arab territories occupied by Israel and opposed maneuvers against the Palestinian people. Cuban delegate Emilio Caballero stated that the attempts to impose partial arrangements on the Arabs are directed at disregarding the rights of the Palestinians, destroying their existence and satisfying Tel Aviv's expansionism and U.S. positions in the region. He recalled that the nonaligned countries movement is seeking a just solution to the Middle East conflict and its fundamental problem, the Palestinian issue, with the unconditional withdrawal of Israel from all occupied territories as well as the materialization of the Palestinian people's rights, including the establishment of their own state. HART ATTENDS BULGARIAN EMBASSY EVENT--Armando Hart Davalos, member of the Politburo and minister of culture, last night attended the cocktail party hosted by Boyko Dimitrov, ambassador of the People's Republic of Bulgaria to Cuba. The activity, which was given on the occasion of the days of Bulgarian culture, was also attended by Julio Camacho Aguilera, alternate member of the Politburo, and Flavio Bravo, member of the Central Committee and vice president of the Council of Ministers, as well as other leaders and personalities. During the ceremony, poet Luis Suardiaz, director of the Central Committee Political Publishing House, presented to Dimitrov a copy of the book "On the Leninist Path in the Struggle for Socialism and Peace," written by Todor Zhivkov, the top Bulgarian leader. NAVAL DEVELOPMENT--Engineer Teresa Alvarez made a presentation at the fourth meeting on naval and port technology in Havana where she said that a proposal has been made to build a shipyard at Bahia Honda. Ships of up to 15,000 tons would be built there. The young specialist said that construction on the new shipyard would get underway at the beginning of the next 5-year period and that the research that will be carried out for its construction has already been approved by the Central Planning Board. VISAS NEEDED FOR ST VINCENT--Kingstown, St Vincent, 22 Nov (CANA)--Cubans may enter St Vincent and the Grenadines only if they are in possession of a visa, the immigration authorities here say. The comment comes in the wake of a recent incident in which four instransit Cubans were prohibited from remaining here. The Cubans, three men and a woman requested overnight entry at Arnons Vale Airport, but did not have the required visas. The visitors were intransit to Grenada from Barbados on a late flight and had to disembark along with other passengers at the airport, when the aircraft apparently developed problems. Reports say that the Cubans were held for 2 hours here by the immigration office and then deported. A top immigration official told CANA: "Certain people can only enter this country with visas," and Defense Minister Hudson Tannis in endorsing this said: "That's nothing unusual." CARLOS ANDRES PEREZ INTERVIEWED ON CURRENT ISSUES

Caracas EL UNIVERSAL in Spanish 6 Nov 81 p 1-12

[Interview with former President Carlos Andres Perez on the Venevision program "Impact", by Carlos Croes and Edgardo de Castro, on 5 November 1981]

[Text] At 2200 hours last night, on the Venevision (Channel 4) program "Impact", former President Carlos Andres Perez was interviewed by newsmen Carlos Croes and Edgardo de Castro.

The controversial political leader answered all the questions that were put to him: on the electoral colleges (of which he appeared to be a proponent), the precandidacies, his absence in New York when Betancourt was dying, the latter's files, the statements by his widow Renee Hartman, the presidential chances of Dr Rafael Caldera, the situation in Nicaragua, the Social Christian presence in El Salvador and also the travels of President Herrera Campins, the latest of which he thinks "has put us in a jam."

Following is a transcript of the former president's conversation with the newsmen heading the program:

Carlos Croes: Good evening. President, during the past few days there has been a series of political activities introducing to the country the beginning of the election campaign. Of the statements that have been made to me, I was struck by one from former President Caldera; and I think that you are quite concerned because he, as a former president, attempted to bring it to a successful conclusion and, as president, he will do this even more; because it appears that it will be incumbent on him to govern this country again. And I would like you, as an expert on Venezuelan politics, to make a comment for us on that optimism of Dr Caldera.

Carlos Andres Perez: Forgive my immodesty, but I have been distinguished for maintaining respectful public treatment of all my adversaries and, despite what you have recalled about the rather undignified behavior shown by former President Caldera toward me, that does not give me any right to act in that way against him. But I do say that, fortunately for the country, his chances of returning to Miraflores again are very slight. Of course he is fully entitled to be a candidate; he is highly controversial in his own party and among national public opinion. It is already obvious that the polls do not favor him as a new candidate for the presidency of the republic. Although the recollection that we have of his administration is not unpleasant, it is not pleasant either; and what have have heard him say constantly also convinces us that Venezuela would not have much to expect from another presidency of his. But, of course, if he is a candidate, welcome! because that is our democracy; but I hope that the people of Venezuela, with the intuition which they have shown thus far, will not vote him in as president of the republic. It would be the sixth defeat that former President Caldera has received. But it also seems to me unlawful, from a political standpoint, for one person to attempt to monopolize the possibilities for being president for so many years, preventing other prominent members of his own political camp from having those same aspirations. It is on this that we Venezuelans must reflect, especially those of us who have a chance of being candidates within the political parties.

EC: Certainly. Now to discuss the AD [Democratic Action] internal politics, what do you think of the electoral colleges? There is an idea which is emerging among the people and which I shall take the liberty of conveying to you. Correct me as to whether or not the statement is true. What is claimed is that the electoral colleges will keep the votes that are cast, to open the ballot boxes when the Electoral Law so permits. Is that true?

CAP: In the first place, I want to tell you that I have always been an advocate of the electoral colleges; and I might even have been the initiator of that idea. I could not claim it but, from the outset I have been a proponent, because it seems to me to be a formula to expand the universe of voters around the presidential candidate of a political party. Now then, the electoral colleges formula has that purpose, and the name is perhaps very appropriately given for that reason. The electoral colleges are appointed so that they may vote for a candidate on a subsequent occasion. This is the theory and practice in places where there are electoral colleges, as in the case of the United States, to elect the president of the republic. The universal votes are not to elect the candidate;the universal, direct and secret votes are to elect the electoral colleges. Obviously, from the time when the general elections are held, it is already known who won. (In the United States, they elect the delegates, remarked EC). Here, the formula of delegates has not been adopted, but we have that of the electoral colleges, scoring points for the candidate. Now then, since the candidate cannot be nominated until the law so rules, in the electoral colleges the votes will not be counted until the law allows, and the candidates of the parties are elected.

CC: Which candidate do you think will win the largest number of points?

CAP: Look, I have maintained an absolutely independent position against all odds. Many people doubt this, because they see friends of mine in one candidacy or another, and they try to say that those closest to former President Carlos Andres are the ones on the side of so-and-so, and not those on the side of someone else. And this is not true.

CC: They recall and say that, while in the presidency, you backed Lusinchi and not Pinerua.

CAP: Well, I had another very great problem there. Imagine, I remained absolutely impartial , but the same claim was also made, that I was supporting this or that one; and I did not support anyone. Now it is the same thing. I am a close friend, and I use the term closeness with all its significance; I am a close friend of Jaime Lusinchi, and I am a close friend of David Morales Bello. We are individuals who have maintained an identity in our way of thinking and within the party's lines as well as outside of them, while in the personal realm we have maintained a really very close proximity. So, what I have said and repeat is that I am happy, or would be happy to be engaged in the election campaign of either of the two precandidates. This also forces me to maintain impartiality, in addition to which the politics in which I engage inside the party is also an obligation. Hence, I would not try to have my name or my image be used on behalf of either candidate. I maintain that this is a sincere attitude. No one can get up and tell me: In a private conversation that you had with me, you told me the opposite; you told me that you were in favor of this one, and this candidate. That is my conduct, and I have no reason to conceal it. I am proud of having managed to maintain my impartiality under those circumstances.

EC: President, I have heard many people in the street claim, despite the lofty position that you hold as ex-president of the republic and life-long senator, that you should feel a more serious responsibility, namely, that resulting from the death of Romulo Betancourt. You were his disciple, you received his instruction for a long time. Don't you feel that you have a responsibility now, as the people of Venezuela do?

CAP: I sincerely believe that, for all the AD leaders, and not just me, the death of Romulo Betancourt has increased our responsibility; it has increased it toward him, who was without doubt and without any possible discussion, the supreme leader of AD, the like of which our party will not have in the future; and it also has increased it toward Venezuela, because Romulo Betancourt, by his mere presence, created expectations of equanimity and security for the Venezuelan democratic institution.

EC: President I note it with great peace of mind; I note that you feel the great responsibility.

CAP: Of course I feel it! Furthermore, not only do I feel it, but I have reflected so much on this situation that now, more than ever before, I consider myself capable of being one of the factors for unity within AD.

CC: However, there are certain considerations which have been observed from a journalistic standpoint since Betancourt's death. I was not here, but I was informed of what occurred, even the most intimate aspects of Betancourt's last days. The report reached me that President Perez was not allowed to be near at the time of Betancourt's serious state, that there were problems here later involving his participation in the tribute to Betancourt, and that this was explained as a kind of aloofness, not so much of Romulo himself, but of Romulo's widow with regard to President Perez. Subsequently, at the press conference held by Mrs Hartman de Betancourt, when they asked her why President Perez was not there, she said: "Because I wanted those who liked him to be with Romulo." So there is a contradiction between what he thinks and what Mrs Hartman, who has been closer to Romulo says; and I was certainly with Romulo once when he made that statement about 'Carlos Andres is the son that I never had.' Now, I don't know what there is in that story.

CAP: We are living in a system with the most extensive freedom of the press, wherein political matters have acquired a leading status in the news media of Venezuela. And that inevitably gives rise to a series of speculations, and one has to understand, and only demand what all of us deserve. In fact, there was a great deal of speculation of this kind afoot. Now then, I shall never embark upon quarrels, but rather discuss what the actual situation is, and what respect for oneself is. Unfortunately, I was in Europe when Romulo Betancourt's fatal accident occurred, and it was difficult for me to communicate with Gonzalo Barrios in New York, on Saturday. I had been making arrangements to go to Venezuela or New York, and I encountered a situation which is difficult for us to understand, whereby influence allows them to remove a passenger from an airplane so as to put someone on, which is not a good thing. There, people confirm and reconfirm reservations, and at VIASA they told me, in order to be able to give you a seat, you must ask the president of VIASA in Venezuela to allow us to remove a passenger who has already reconfirmed his flight, because that could bring about a court suit in any of these countries, and on Saturday and Sunday I was not going to find the president of VIASA to ask him to give me a seat for the emergency. Finally, I obtained a flight that brought me to New York on Monday. Unfortunately, I arrived 4 hours after our unforgettable Romulo Betancourt had died. This was all that happened. So, even though there might have been something of some kind, it never occurred, nor would I have allowed anyone to deny me the right to see a man who has been part of my entire life, and who has always had not only my respect, but also my admiration and, I might add, my devotion. I was never far away from Romulo Betancourt.

CC: In statements made to EL UNIVERSAL, Gonzalo Barrios has made some very important comments upon remarking: "AD was not the property of Romulo Betancourt, and it will not be that of Carlos Andres Perez." Might not Gonzalo, with that astuteness which must be read or interpreted in him, be thinking that Carlos Andres Perez intends to take over AD?

CAP: No, I think that what Gonzalo has said is the truth. If AD was not the property of its founder, why must it be my property? I believe that this was what he meant, and since so much speculation has arisen, things must be put in black and white, and the country must be told that this is not a party in which we are fighting for an inheritance. Among other things, one inherits material goods, but one never inherits spiritual assets; and Romulo Betancourt is an irreplaceable man, and no one can call himself Romulo Betancourt's heir. We must all strive to be the perpetuators of his endeavor, indeed, and the people will see which ones of us carry it ahead.

EC: But there are heirs, President; there are indeed persons who feel that they are heirs.

CAP: No, no, that is speculation also.

CC: And there are roles, too, are there not?

CAP: Well, Romulo Betancourt's records concern me, because for most of his life I was the one who managed those records. They are very replete records, and will be a fundamental factor in writing the contemporary history of Venezuela. There is nothing to be concealed in those records; that is, to be concealed in the sense that they could blemish the memory of Romulo Betancourt; that he might have concealed something which the country should know, or which the justice system should know, or which the party should know. Nothing of the sort! But, of course, there are confidences, letters exchanged with party leaders, with personages from abroad, which could not have been published at the time, but which may be in the future, and which will enhance the greatness of Romulo Betancourt still more.

CC: Since you have seen those records, where could the papers be which, Dr Hartman claims, contain something about you?

CAP: Well, I really don't know how to interpret what Romulo's widow meant; but I don't believe that she could ever have meant to say that Romula was concealing things which should have been known to the justice system or AD.

EC: President, during your term I remember that you made several agreements with the Spanish Government, with the king and the last prime minister that Spain had, on shipyards, railroads and the automotive industry. About 2 days ago, I read in the press that DIARIO 16, one of the most important newspapers in Madrid at present, has been questioning the economic policy of President Luis Herrera. What do you think could be the basis for this? Why have all these shipyards, the automotive industry, etc., been abolished?

CAP: You ask me the question, and the answer would entail an explanation of the entire tragedy that our country is experiencing. Here, not only have the programs with Spain, which had a Latin American political significance and an economic significance essential to Venezuela been suspended; it so happens that all the others have been suspended as well. Observe the disaster that we have in Guayana with the basic industries; observe the permanent damage to Zulia caused to it every year by the continuation of the iron and steel industry, and the iron and steel-coal industry of Zulia, while the infrastructure that we began building has totally deteriorated and hundreds of millions of bolivares have been lost. Therefore, this matter of Spain is not a specific instance. We were actually going to convert Cumana into the center of Venezuela's heavy automotive industry, with assurance of success in the Andean Pact and in all of Latin America. The plant was constructed for the assembly and building of trucks and buses, and there was already the infrastructure for the engine plant, based on the distribution made in the Andean Pact. (It was the Pegaso, remarked EC). Yes, it was Pegaso. And all this was suddenly blocked, to do service to an American multinational company, Mack.

CC: President, since we are embarking on the analysis of your administration, I have always had a notion of what you represented in the last term, and it is this: When you come to power, you arrive with a reputation for energy; to be sure, we saw it in your election campaign. (Not just a reputation, said CAP). Well, you came with the reputation of energy; you are the man who is going to solve the problem of crime, the man who is going to solve the problem of transportation, the man who is going to solve the problem of corruption, the man who is going to solve everything, a kind of Messiah.

CAP: That is impossible!

CC: Well, you lose the elections because of the same problems involving public services; the country was deteriorating from the standpoint of services and, furthermore, Caldera has said that you muffled Pinerua with regard to bringing up these problems instead of undertaking a discussion of them. And the corruption was also thriving to a certain extent, to the point where, the assertion ends by saying, we have reached a tragedy that I noted in the statements made by Dr Barrios, who said that the corruption in COPEI [Social Christian Party] is so great that the corruption of the AD members is slight and, finally, when Lusinchi now claims that the AD members are chicken-thieves in comparison with what the COPEI members are. So it is a tragedy to vote for people who have run the country and who have not combated corruption; or to have to choose the course of action described by the Brazilian politician: "I steal, but I do." This seems very disillusioning to me, as a Venezuelan.

CAP: You have brought up an issue which would take about 2 hours, and which fills me with emotion. But let us take one thing at a time. In the first place, I did offer the country a program of great national proportions; my policy was a policy based on great concepts; it was not a policy of fragments. What has happened? The new government comes, no plan is specified to replace mine, but rather everything comes to a standstill, and there remains the doubt as to what will continue and what will not continue. And, meanwhile, the Venezuelan economy and, in particular, all the confidence of the country has been destroyed, because they cannot tell me here that in opposition to that concept of theirs, mine, the government has offered any other. Furthermore, a general phrase was coined to discredit my endeavor: a Pharaonic policy. I don't think that there is anything more Pharaonic than to have offered the country the construction of the bridge to Margarita; that is an entire symbol of what the present government is. But, let us put this aside; in the area of public services, I received the country in a frightful crisis involving public services, electricity, water and health services as a whole, and I dedicated myself....Hence it is a big lie when it is claimed that I did not provide for public services; one need do no more than review my accomplishment. For example (it would suffice to observe the state of the telephones, commented CC). Pardon me, but that is now; let us see what happened. In the hospital field, during my government hospitals and beds were built and put into service which were equivalent to 25 percent of the entire construction in Venezuela throughout our history. Upon the death of Parra Leon, Dr Risquez Iribarren, who cannot be regarded as a proponent of AD, speaking on behalf of the Academy of Medicine at Parra Leon's funeral, said: "This was the minister who constructed and put into service the largest number of beds in the entire constitutional history of Venezuela." Well, this can be proven. And there were hospitals completed which this government has not yet put into service, amounting to 35 or 40 percent of everything that existed in Venezuela previously in this area of health and hospital services. Now, the hospital problems went on, and appeared on the front page of the newspapers from 1977 onward. Caracas was a disaster; at the Concepcion Palacios maternity facility there were two women in childbirth per bed, and the final act of my government before turning over the presidency of the republic in Congress was to visit the Vargas Hospital to inspect the renovations that we were making there. On every 12 March, except for the final year, when it was 7 March, I went to the J.M. de Los Rios Children's Hospital to personally supervise its conversion into the major hospital center for Venezuelan children. What is happening now? The hospitals are experiencing a disaster: the budgets do not suffice, the very modern apparatus that was brought in is not in operation, that public service has once again become just as I received it in 1974, and that is how it is now, but with the aggravating circumstance that now there is, indeed, a hospital infrastructure suitable for providing service to the entire country. The water problem in the country was tragic....

I have left for last what is perhaps the most important aspect of Carlos Croes' remark. First of all, I don't think that we should be making comparisons as to whether the corruption was worse during this period or during that one because, whether it be slight or great, corruption is a damaging thing not only for the moral health of the country, but also for the very effectiveness of the democratic institutions. I have never denied that there was corruption in my government, because I would have been a charlatan, a hypocrite. This is a problem that has been plaguing the country since the birth of the republic, and that has been increasing as the state's resources have increased as a result of our oil industry. In saying this, I am not attempting to justify the corruption, but rather to give an objective explanation for a situation. Moreover, it is essential that the democracy confront this problem with a complete desire to solve it, and that is what I did. If you study the democratic governments from 1958 to date, the first government to engage in causing a commotion over corruption was mine. It was reported to the press, arrests were made, there were charges brought and records were sent to the General Comptrollership of the Republic; because up until that time an erroneous view had predominated to the effect that interfering with corruption meant discrediting the government, whereas quite the opposite is true. The possibility that, in any human institution, there may be people lacking in ethics or with intentions of taking what does not belong to them has been present throughout the history of mankind. There is no institution, not even a religious one, that can avoid this reality. Now the important thing, the ethical aspect is that there always be among those who head the institution a desire and determination to investigate and to punish those who commit such crimes. (And now there is, commented CC). Pardon me, that was what I did, and I have said that I am the policeman who is policed, that what I did then was turned against me like a kind of Australian weapon called a "boomerang". Then it was claimed that my governmen was the most corrupt one in history. This is very serious and regrettable, but I l[illegible] withstood it taking a strong stance. I still have a great deal of life ahead [illegible] me, my life style, the resources that I have and my devotion to Venezuela. I shall die as I am today. They will never see me enjoying money which I do not have, nor will they ever see me outside of Venezuela, abandoning my commitments to the people of Venezuela. I am at ease, and therefore I can withstand that sinister conspiracy made against me at the time of the notorious "Sierra Nevada" affair. Now when people view it with perspective, they realize how ridiculous and infamous that period was in Venezuela, and how infamous those cynics were, who prepared, contrived and carried out that conspiracy against me.

My government distinguished itself in the battle against poverty, in that it was the government of full employment. For example, today, the comparison made between the Venezuela of 1974-79 and the current Venezuela is really frightening and negative for the country, to the point where pessimism seems about to ensnare the spirit of the Venezuelan people. Similarly, I was against crime; and my action was also permanent. The only democratic government which built jails was mine; the other governments were afraid to build jails, and why? if it is a tragic reality that we have, that there are some who must go to jail because, unfortunately, because of social injustice, they have become criminals.

CC: You closed El Dorado....

CAP" All right, I closed El Dorado because...you will see now what is going to happen to El Dorado, because El Dorado is of no use for that. But I ordered the creation of three penitentiary settlements where the criminals could work. Now, unfortunately, one is suffering a great deal of disappointment. You can ask my ministers how I persistently made demands of my ministers of justice, and how I offered all the resources and, in the end, the modern prison institutions which had been proposed from the outset and for which there were always funds were not created. That is inexplicable, now. My determination was never lacking, but that is what happens to presidents, and if it happens to stubborn, persistent presidents like me, what will happen to those who do not devote themselves to administration in that manner?

EC: President, you have been a very bitter foe of what are called subsidies. I remember that you tried to justify those prices. Now, for example, there are loans which have been subsidized; however, we have already seen in the press that the government is announcing the disappearance of many of those subsidies in early January, and that means that the stomach policy is going to be very expensive. What position will you, who were a foe of this, have toward this new one?

CAP: I have always been very sincere with regard to making what I say the same as what I do. I was not the foe of subsidies, pure and simple. To be sure, I said that the subsidies should be carried out so that they would serve the purpose for which they were created, because in a country such as ours, subsidies are unquestionable essential during a phase of our development; in a country such as ours subsidies for agriculture must be a constant for many years, as they have been in the entire world. For example, I have not seen any greater crime against Venezuelan agriculture than the suspension of the subsidy for fertilizers. All countries have some subsidy for fertilizers in one way or another, and the suspension thereof is extremely serious for a country wherein the sense of productivity needs to be fostered. Now this government's policy on subsidies is a rigamarole. It takes and gives, with the result that now more subsidies are owed than in the past.

CC: They claim that you did not allow yourself to be led by the party, and that you have always been outside of the party. This is one of the things that they criticized you for.

CAP: That is not true. Now, of course, the relations between a party and a government are difficult because, on the one hand, the government assumes, and the president assumes responsibility to the entire nation. There cannot be an AD government; it is a government of all Venezuelans. But, in addition, the president must maintain his ties with the party, and the first adviser of the president of the republic must be his party. And in certain matters, the party must intervene in the formulation of policies, and often in certain decisions; but it cannot be accepted, and AD would never accept the idea that it, and not the president of the republic, is the one in command; and this is important. Now, I held meetings with the party leadership during my 5 years of government. I was the AD's president of the republic who met most often with the party leadership, and every Thursday, when I was in Caracas, I met with the party's basic leadership group, with the secretary general, the secretary of organization and the congressional faction, and, of course, with the president of the party. So, I did maintain that constant relationship.

Now, of course, we do not always agree on certain aspects of policy, but we maintain cordial relations; we have never ended a meeting with bitterness. That is to say, we tried to resolve our differences in a harmonious fashion.

CC: Your party has been very critical of President Herrera's travels, but you used to travel often; you departed and held talks, and there was the problem of Nicaragua, and it was claimed that you had a pact with the guerrillas. I wonder now, after considering this, right now COPEI is involved in El Salvador too, and you are criticizing it. After all, whose side are you on?

CAP: First of all, one of the first things that I said upon assuming the presidency was that my government's international policy would be the instrument and the basis of all the national policies, because I interpreted the signs of the times. We had already emerged from a protected status, the United States was no longer speaking for us, we were speaking for ourselves, and despite the ideological differences, we have become integrated into Latin America itself, assuming our own responsibilities. And that required that the president travel, but that he travel in a useful, frugal manner, that he not consider the trips a way of enjoying himself or becoming familiar with the world. I made seven trips during my entire government (with a shower? asked CC) (General laughter). Moreover, I always tried to make maximum use of my time. For example, I went to Mexico and upon my return I was able to visit Santo Domingo and Jamaica. I made those visits at the time for Venezuela. Thus, within a very few days I visited many countries. When I went to Europe it was only once, and then I returned. I did not visit London, France or Switzerland alone, but rather visited all the countries on the same trip. That has been may way of operating. And then my international policy was not to make it immediately concur with the interests of Social Democracy, but was rather a policy for Venezuela and the Venezuelan people. And in the area of international cooperation, it was a responsible cooperation. I never offered soft loans, because Venezuela needs all its resources. (You gave weapons to the Sandinists, said CC). I didn't give weapons to anyone; no weapons were given to anyone. The weapons belong to Venezuela.

CC: There are some who distribute weapons and who distribute souls.

CAP: Well, I don't want to get into those theological issues. What I mean is that my international policy was consistent; I had the support of the country, and my international cooperation was not the squandering of this government. I was accused by the current president and by COPEI regarding international cooperation, and I gave oil facilities to Central America and long-term loans at 8 percent interest, which was the usual interest at that time. Today, with interest at 17-20 percent, Venezuela is lending its money at 2 percent, and that is irresponsible.

EC: President, do you approve of the present trip by President Herrera? (And you have not said anything about El Salvador, noted CC).

CAP: What is unfortunate is that in El Salvador there is not a Venezuelan policy, but rather a COPEI policy, and an absurd COPEI policy; because the Christian Democrats have fallen into a frightful trap, and have become responsible for the genocide being committed there; indirectly responsible, of course, as was commented by no less than Msgr Rivera y Damas, the archbishop of San Salvador. So this is what we regret. We are not advocates of the guerrillas, and we think that a guerrilla focus in El Salvador would be very serious. We advocate an agreement between the two political forces and, in the center, the moderate leftist forces, so that such an agreement may achieve a democratic regime for El Salvador and ward off both the danger of a radical communist regime and the danger of the continuity of the military dictatorship in El Salvador. That is our position, and in this respect we differ from COPEI which, unintentionally, is playing along with the Salvadoran military dictatorship. Now, regarding Luis Herrera's trip, unfortunately, it is untimely and, furthermore, it has put us as we say in Venezuelan parlance, in a jam. This is the comment that is being made in the press.

ALCOHOL PROGRAM TO GET $1 BILLION FOR INVESTMENT IN 1982

Rio de Janeiro JORNAL DO BRASIL in Portuguese 3 Nov 81 p 14

[Text] Brasilia--In 1982 the government will devote from $1 billion to $1.3 billion to investment in PROALCOOL (National Alcohol Program), according to an announcement by Marcos Jose Marques, executive secretary of CENAL (National Alcohol Commission). That total corresponds to the average amount invested in the program annually from its establishment at the end of 1975 until now.

It was the decision that industrialists in the sector had been calling for. One of them--Luis Lacerda Biagi, executive vice president of Ermini Heavy Equipment (of the Pedro Biagi Group)--said in Sao Paulo that the lack of a definite budget for 1982 was "discouraging new investors." At the same time, he complained that no distillery projects had been approved since last June, saying that he also regarded that as discouraging to businessmen interested in putting funds into the program.

Budget

But in announcing the 1982 budget, CENAL's executive secretary gave assurances that the government is still interested in pursuing the goal of producing 10.7 billion liters of alcohol from the 1985-1986 harvest. He announced that the investments decided on for 1982 (from $1 billion to $1.3 billion) will represent an injection of funds equivalent to between 160 billion and 200 billion cruzeiros. That is based on an average exchange rate of 160 cruzeiros to the dollar next year, as forecast by SEST (Special Secretariat for Control of State-Owned Enterprises).

A little-known feature of PROALCOOL is that its budget has been denominated in dollars since the program was established in October 1975, with annual appropriations totaling $1 billion. The situation for 1982 will be established by the Planning Secretariat of the Presidency and the Ministry of Industry and Commerce sometime in the next few weeks, when the monetary budget for 1982 is drawn up.

The secretary of CENAL has denied it, but there is already a preliminary ministerial proposal suggesting that PROALCOOL invest over 200 billion cruzeiros in 1982, having in mind the goal of producing 10.7 billion liters of alcohol in 1985.

Marcos Jose Marques feels that the production of alcohol-powered cars in 1982 will total 200,000 vehicles, thus keeping the figure at 35 percent of the total vehicles produced in the assembly plants. That total is considered adequate, now that the craze for alcohol-powered cars--which occurred chiefly in the last quarter of 1980--has passed.

The current PROALCOOL budget will end the year at 115 billion cruzeiros, including funds intended for the establishment of new distilleries and financing for the planting of cane. The 1981 budget was not closed out until last week, when the National Monetary Council released an additional allocation of 60 billion cruzeiros for the program.

Of that total, 12 billion cruzeiros will be transferred to the BNDE (National Economic Development Bank), and 1 billion cruzeiros will go to the private banks that are financing PROALCOOL projects. Additional demand will be handled by the Bank of Brazil--by reshuffling funds--up to a limit of 48 billion cruzeiros. Because of PROALCOOL, the Bank of Brazil is going to exceed the 50-percent limit on the expansion of its loans as estimated for 1981 by the monetary budget.

Greater Incentive

The additional funds approved for the program have not yet had a favorable effect on the sector, however. Luis Lacerda Biagi explained that "the failure to approve new projects has been discouraging the businessmen," who have therefore asked Delfim Netto, minister-chief of the Planning Secretariat, to take action. The Pedro Biagi Group produces 1 million liters of alcohol daily at four alcohol factories in the interior of Sao Paulo. And it is engaged in talks with the Philippines to sell distilleries for a program similar to PROALCOOL that is being planned for that country.

Luis Biagi feels that the funds invested in Brazil to date have been inadequate, and he recalls that "the production of alcohol will reach 4 billion liters in 1981, thus saving the country more than $1.5 billion in foreign exchange."

PETROLEUM: POOR RESULTS IN RISK CONTRACT AREA

Sao Paulo O ESTADO DE SAO PAULO in Portuguese 11 Nov 81 p 24

[Text] PETROBRAS [Brazilian Petroleum Corporation] has announced the results obtained by PAULIPETRO and foreign companies in exploring and prospecting for petroleum under risk contracts. From April 1977 until now, 67 onshore and offshore wells have been drilled at a total cost of approximately $813.45 million. Despite those efforts, only one well--still in the testing stage--appears to have favorable prospects as far as petroleum production is concerned.

Unfortunately, the above information may reflect a lack of good judgment in relation to the policy adopted for risk contracts, which have not brought a significant increase in national petroleum production or even better knowledge concerning the potential of our reserves.

To begin with, the areas delimited by PETROBRAS can be singled out as one cause of this. They do not always appear to have been the most propitious areas for the discovery of petroleum. A few months ago, PETROBRAS itself was the target of criticism by the foreign companies which signed the contracts in question but which have since handed back 10 of the 20 blocks they were authorized to explore. The basic reason was that the risk of not finding petroleum was too high, thus threatening to make the investments unproductive.

PETROBRAS later adopted a position more in keeping with the requirements implicit in the bidding itself by offering areas with better prospects, although it made them subject to less attractive remuneration. That new orientation was apparently the right one, since despite the poor results achieved so far, the exploration companies have not been discouraged from continuing their work. In fact, the latest round of bidding sponsored by PETROBRAS resulted in 34 foreign companies being prequalified to explore all the blocks in the Parana, Amazonas, and Maranhao basins.

It should be noted that there do not appear to be any restrictions on the contract companies as far as their continuing to participate in future bidding is concerned. It is in the country's interest to maintain a certain degree of attractiveness so that the investments will produce more significant results. Although PETROBRAS has increased its allocation of funds for exploration and prospecting, it is known that they are still inadequate, considering the lack of knowledge that exists concerning Brazilian reserves. Furthermore, the supplying of suitable information for exploration presents no danger that the state will lose its monopoly on petroleum, as was argued when the contract system was being set up under the Geisel administration.

For PETROBRAS to maintain the credibility of that exploration system, it is necessary not only to make more interesting areas available to the firms, but also to provide the required information so that there will be no more failures.

The fact that only one well has so far turned out to be potentially exploitable may lead the foreign companies and even PAULIPETRO to reduce their participation in this process even further, and that would certainly result in a burden for PETROBRAS. The fact is that the firms operating in Brazil under risk contracts drilled 52,000 meters in 1980, compared to 68,000 in 1979. During the same period, the Brazilian state-owned enterprise drilled 813,000 meters, and that indicator is to be increased throughout this year. In the past 5 years, PETROBRAS has completed 1,542 exploratory wells at an investment of $7.7 billion, an amount distinctly higher than the amounts invested by the foreign firms, and plans call for investing an additional $5 billion over the next 5 years.

ELETROBRAS TO INVEST 710 BILLION CRUZEIROS IN 1982

Rio de Janeiro O GLOBO in Portuguese 5 Nov 81 p 20

[Text] Brasilia--ELETROBRAS [Brazilian Electric Power Companies, Inc] will invest 480 billion cruzeiros during the coming year, excluding the planned investments in Itaipu, which will total 230 billion cruzeiros. This was announced yesterday by General Costa Cavalcanti, chairman of ELETROBRAS, following the signing of the contract for construction of the Samuel hydroelectric plant, which will supply the state of Rondonia and Rio Branco, Acre's capital, beginning in 1987.

The 480 billion cruzeiros that ELETROBRAS will invest next year represent a nominal increase of 140 percent over the firm's budget for this year, which will total 200 billion cruzeiros. In the case of Itaipu, next year's investment will be 53 percent higher than the 150 billion cruzeiros planned by the end of 1981.

General Costa Cavalcanti is leaving today for the United States, where he will sign a contract with the Bank of America for $150 million intended for ELETRONORTE [Northtern Electric Power Plants]. He will sign another contract with the same bank for $30 million intended for Itaipu.

During the ceremony for signing the contract for construction of the Samuel power plant, Minister of Mines and Energy Cesar Cals said that beginning next year, the government will shift its construction of major hydroelectric plants to the North and Northeast, not only to foster the development of those two regions, but "also to eliminate the generation of electricity based on diesel oil."

In addition to Tucurui and Itaparica, which are already under construction, he said that work on the following will also begin during the Figueiredo administration: Xingo (Pernambuco), Balbina (Amazonas), Cotingo (Roraima), Cachoeira Porteira (Para), and Santa Izabel and Carolina, both in northern Goias.

The Samuel hydroelectric plant is budgeted at 21 billion cruzeiros (at June 1980 prices) and is to go into operation in February 1987, thus eliminating the need to generate electricity using diesel oil in two-thirds of the Territory of Rondonia and in Rio Branco, the capital of Acre.

AGUACAPA HYDROELECTRIC PLANT INAUGURATED

Guatemala PRENSA LIBRE in Spanish 31 Oct 81 p 2

[Text] The Aguacapa hydroelectric plant was inaugurated yesterday morning by President Lucas Garcia. The project, costing a total of 171 million quetzales, will save the country a total of 2 million quetzales a month in fuel costs.

The inauguration ceremony took place at the plant, located in the southern part of the country in a region of Santa Rosa.

In addition to the president, Vice-President Oscar Humberto Azurdia, Interior Minister Donaldo Alvarez Ruiz, National Electrification Institute (INDE) President Otto Arnoldo Block, INDE Manager Luis Francisco Saenz, and diplomats and distinguished guests were also present.

According to the program, the first speaker was Pablo Garcia Barbachano, vice-president of the ICA Group. He made a technical report on the Aguacapa project.

He pointed out that the project is located in a mountainous zone, at altitudes ranging from 145 to 700 meters above sea level. The Aguacapa River's tributary is the Agua Tibia River, with an average flow of 1.7 cubic meters per second.

"The project," he stated, "consists of a dam 20 meters high with a concrete volume of 42,000 cubic meters. There is a daily control reservoir with a capacity of 300,000 cubic meters, and a pressure tunnel 12 kilometers long and 2.65 meters in interior diameter. The tunnel is lined with concrete and steel, and has been excavated simultaneously on nine different work fronts."

"Aguacapa," he went on, "will increase the production of electricity by 400 million kilowatt hours a year, with an investment of about 171 million quetzales, and will be of great socio-economic benefit for Guatemala."

The financing of the work was as follows: Q55 million from the World Bank; Q30 million from the Venezuelan Investment Fund; Q3.25 million in local currency; Q75.25 million loaned from the Central American Bank of Economic Integration (BCIE); and Q7.50 million from INDE.

The project was begun in November 1977 and was finished after 46 months, in August 1981.

Next on the agenda, representatives of the AEG-Telefunken firm of the FRG presented President Lucas Garcia with a parchment commemorating this important project inaugurated during his administration.

Project Delivered to Government

Later, INDE Manager Francisco Saenz addressed the audience, pointing out that Aguacapa will produce much more energy than other hydroelectric plants put together, such as Palin, San Luis, El Salto, Rio Hondo, El Porvenir, Santa Maria, Los Esclavos and Jurun Marinala.

"Those plants," he stated, "produce only about 300 million kilowatt hours of energy, while Aguacapa will produce more than 380 million kilowatt hours a year."

He indicated that the reliability of the electricity supply will improve considerably once there is enough available. Requests for new service that have not been met so far will be fulfilled, and there will be significant savings in the purchase of oil-based fuels.

"For this reason," he emphasized, "it is a great honor for me to turn the Aguacapa hydroelectric plant over to President Lucas Garcia."

Working for Tomorrow

Finally, President Lucas Garcia gave an informative speech. He stressed the importance of the project, "which is one of the first steps the government has taken," he said, "to attain independence from petroleum products."

He added that in the case of a profitable enterprise, projects must be undertaken. If there is no money, it pays to borrow it, he said, because all these projects will cost much more tomorrow than today.

"This hydroelectric plant," he continued, "will provide considerable savings in oil purchases. I am very satisfied to have supported the construction of this project, because I know it will benefit all Guatemalans."

Finally, the president, accompanied by ministers and diplomats, toured the installations. He cut the symbolic ribbon and put the dam's machinery into motion, declaring the Aguacapa hydroelectric plant inaugurated.

The program ended with a luncheon for guests, to the accompaniment of marimbas, electronic instruments and mariachis.

MEXICAN OIL IMPORTS TO INCREASE IN PRICE

Guatemala EL IMPARCIAL in Spanish 5 Nov 81 pp 1, 2

[Text] One of the kinds of petroleum that Guatemala imports from neighboring Mexico will go up in price by one quetzal this month, prompting the Secretariat of Mining and Hydrocarbons to study the impact the increase will have on the consumer, according to the head of that secretariat, Jorge Luis Monzon.

The study, he said, is being done to define the consequences of this increase in the price of a barrel of Mexican crude, taking into account that approximately 25 percent of the fuel used in Guatemala is imported from the neighboring country.

He also reported that two kinds of petroleum are purchased from Mexico, but only one of them will go up in price by one quetzal per barrel. Thus, stated Monzon, it must be determined what the impact will be on the final products coming from the Escuintla refinery, which processes that oil.

He anticipated that the price change for a certain type of Mexican oil does not necessarily mean that refined products will also have their prices raised, since the secretariat controls the different prices charged at the plates where this basic fuel is obtained.

The official explained that most of the fuel consumed in Guatemala is in the form of refined products sold by the Shell and Chevron companies, which operate refineries in the Caribbean.

Instead of announcing an increase in fuel prices, Monzon said that there will probably be an adjustment of the compensatory system currently in effect.

Since 2 June

Refined petroleum products experienced their last price hike on 2 June of this year, when the Secretariat of Mining pointed out that "due to fluctuations in the consumption of oil-based fuels, which have been reflected in higher consumption of diesel and kerosene and a considerable drop in the price of bunker oil on the international market, the prices of those products must be revised in order to bring them in line with prevailing circumstances."

As a consequence, the current prices were set. Prices from dealers to the final consumer are as follows: superior gasoline, 95 octane, 2.09 quetzales per gallon; regular gasoline, 87 octane, Q2.04; diesel, Q1.24; kerosene, Q1.12; and bunker in Guatemala City, Q0.96 per gallon.

OIL WELL POTENTIAL—One of the six wells that the Elf Aquitaine company will have to drill in the next 6 years, pursuant to the contract it signed in August 1980 with the government to take over the oil operation of Rubelsanto, yielded positive results. On 20 October that company, operating in Area One, did a formation test at an interval located 6,900 feet down, in the Caribe I well. According to the Secretariat of Mining and Hydrocarbons, the result of the test was positive, in that it was determined that petroleum of 20 API degrees could be produced. The secretariat's report adds that with this positive result, it appears that there are two productive intervals in the structure bearing that name, so another interval at a depth of 6,800 feet is now being tested. This well, Caribe I, is located 6 kilometers north of Chinaja and 10 kilometers west of Yapelmech. The secretariat authorities stated that "the importance of this result will justify drilling new wells that will not only increase production capacity by incorporating a new oil field, but will also enable us to confirm the potential of the area currently being developed and those to be offered in the new bidding." In early 1981 production was estimated at about 5,050 barrels a day, of which Rubelsanto provided about 3,450 barrels and Chinaja 1,600 barrels. That oil has been sold to the United States. Nearly 50 percent of the oil has been earmarked for domestic consumption, both by the Empresa Electrica de Guatemala, S.A., and Cementos Progreso. OIL PRODUCTION DECREASE—Caracas, 17 Nov (LATIN-REUTER)—The Venezuelan Ministry of Energy and Mines announced that the country's crude oil production has been reduced by 77,000 barrels per day during the week ending on 11 November, bringing the average daily production down from the 2,273,000 of the previous week to the 2,196,000 recorded this past week. In comparison with the 1,836,000 barrels per day exported during the period up to 4 November 1980, this year's crude and refined oil exports during the same period average only 1,660,000 barrels per day. CHILEAN, ARGENTINE CARDINALS DISCUSS BEAGLE CONFLICT WITH POPE

Santiago LA TERCERA DE LA HORA in Spanish 27 Oct 81 p 20

[Text] Rome, 26 Oct (ANSA)—It was revealed today that during the most important summit meeting on the ecclesiastical level since the beginning of the so-called Beagle conflict, Pope John Paul II discussed the present state and the future of the mediation with Cardinals Raul Silva Henriquez of Chile, Primatesta of Argentina and Antonio Samore, his personal representative in the negotiations.

The meeting took place on Saturday and the talks were held during a luncheon with the pope, on the thir floor of the apostolic palace.

In addition to the three cardinals, the personal secretaries of the pontiff were also present.

Up to this moment it was impossible to obtain an official confirmation from any of the parties involved.

It is obvious that John Paul II decided to take advantage of the presence in Rome of Cardinals Primatesta and Silva Henriquez, who are attending the deliberations of the Canon Law Revision Commission, to evaluate the situation and determine the present prospects.

"This is a very important and serious occasion," a high-level source told ANSA. "This is the opinion of the pope himself, and it is shared by those present at the luncheon," he said.

As the head of the mediation team, Antonio Cardinal Samore probably made an extensive review of the main aspects of the negotiations.

Last Tuesday the Apostolic Nuncio in Buenos Aires, Msgr Ubaldo Calabresi, delivered to the Argentine Government the pope's reply to the "ideas" presented to the Holy See at the beginning of September by Argentine Foreign Minister Oscar Camilion, who made a surprise visit to Italy.

Camilion met with the secretary of state, Agostino Cardinal Casaroli, Cardinal Samore, Msgr Achille Silvestrini (the secretary of the Public Affairs Council of the Church) and with the pope himself, whom he met in Castelgandolfo after the general audience of Wednesday, the 9th.

It was learned that the "ideas" of Camilion consisted in proposing to include the upcoming agreement on the southern border conflict within the entire framework of Argentine-Chilean bilateral relations.

John Paul II, in his reply, allegedly indicated that the first two points of his proposal envisaged a treaty establishing the mechanism for a peaceful solution of all the differences along the border between the two countries.

What is expected now is that the Argentine Government will take initiatives that would allow to speeding up of the negotiations. The Buenos Aires authorities for several months already have had in their possession the reply of the Holy See to the request for "clarifications, appeals, and details" which the Argentine Government requested on 25 March of this year regarding the proposal for the solution that the Pontiff formulated on 12 December 1980.

Chile accepted the pope's suggestions on 8 January. Argentina is still studying the proposal and its implications.

BORDER TALKS WITH COLOMBIA--Caracas, 11 Nov (AFP)--The negotiations between Venezuela and Colombia on border problems have "definitely" been postponed until 1984, it was officially confirmed today. The report said that President Luis Herrera Campins believes that the climate is not adequate in either country now to continue the dialogue on the demarcation of the marine and submarine areas in the Gulf of Venezuela, in the northeastern part of the country. Venezuelan elections will be held in November 1983 and the new constitutional president will take office the following March, it was recalled here. The problem in question has been the object of study by both governments in the last few years but no satisfactory and definite solution has been found by the two countries, concluded the report from Caracas. POLITICAL ALLIANCES WITH PERONIST MOVEMENT DISCUSSED

Buenos Aires A FONDO in Spanish Oct 81 pp 12-13

[Text] The Peronist-Radical party system of 1946-1981, whose last caretaker was Ricardo Balbin, is being succeeded by timid probings in search of a different future. It is a party "chaos."

The Greeks, who could not conceive of nothingness (so taken with the world and nature were they) or, therefore, of the idea of creation from nothingness, which is part of the Judeo-Christian tradition, assumed that in the beginning there was..."chaos," meaning an shapeless mass of matter and energy whose subsequent development into beings, species and flesh-and-blood individuals would later constitute the world that we know.

The idea of "chaos," therefore, had nothing to do originally with its current connotation of a disintegration of a preexisting order into anarchy. Quite the opposite. Chaos is pure possibility, an as yet nebulous dawn, an under-age future.

Today, a few days after Ricardo Balbin's death and a few years after Juan Domingo Peron's death, we can speak in such terms about the "party chaos" in Argentina. For 35 years, 1946-1981, the Peron-Balbin tandem disciplined party forces around a central option. Its vicissitudes notwithstanding, the country was Peronist-Radical during this period. When Peron passed away in 1974, Balbin kept the 1946 two-party system alive by subjecting Peronism to a sort of external discipline or attraction that forced it to curb its own centrifugal tendencies and to sit down at the table of the Hour of the People or, more recently, the Interparty Commission. The day after Balbin's death, however, the centrifugal tendencies began taking strong hold both inside and outside Peronism. It is chaos, not only as the disintegration of something that used to exist (the Peronist-Radical dualism around two caudillos), but also as the search for or the dawn of the new party arrangement that Argentina will adopt in the future.

Several developments now suggest the intensity of this transition. The first is a statement by former President Frondizi in which the natural leader of the MID [Integration and Development Movement] made three main points: that the recent reconciliation between Radicalism and the MID would not be pursued to the point of turning it into a "pan-Radical" movement; that, on the contrary, the MID's idea is to again ally itself with Peronism in a "national" front or movement (which, from the MID standpoint, symbolizes the alliance of classes); and that the Interparty Commission ought to move towards the formation of a "national movement" rather than towards a call for elections, as the government would like. To a certain degree, this excludes the Radicals. Frondizi has quickly drawn his own conclusions about Balbin's death and feels that because of it Radicalism has lost its ability to act. In his view, the initiative has passed to the MID, in a political and electoral alliance with a Peronism that, by virtue of Peron's absence, has also lost its strategic focus.

In a way, it is a battle to see who becomes the guardian of an orphan Peronism. Balbin, the first guardian, led it towards an institutional pact from which would emerge, in time, the extended "oligopolistic" competition of Peronists and Radicals, with no third force in sight. Frondizi, the second guardian, wants to lead it now towards a repeat of the 1973 electoral alliance (Justicialista National Liberation Front), although he probably feels that the MID will now command a more prominent place in the alliance, more like the leading role that Frondizi himself played in 1958 (the Peron-Frondizi pact, "national integration").

What do the Peronists say about all this? Here is the second "post-Balbin" development: the opposing statements by Bittel the notary and Dr Robledo. Bittel has said two things. First, that alliances with other members of the Interparty Commission are possible, but not, he felt, with Radicalism. The allusion to the MID is obvious. Second, that Isabel Peron is still the head of the Justicialista Movement. Robledo has said, however, that Peronism can no longer afford "heads" that can demand inflexible discipline and that Isabel Peron would have to battle, in any case, like any other leader in internal elections for a place in the party's hierarchy. While Bittel upholds a traditional view of Peronism (one-person rule, a front with the MID), Robledo is proposing an approach in keeping with Balbin's political legacy: internal democratization, an end to hand-picking for party posts and "camouflaging" Peronism with Radicalism as an orderly and internally pluralist democratic party.

Former Interior Minister Gen Albano Harguindeguy (1976-1981), who is now an adviser to President Viola, burst on to the political scene recently himself with statements that had nationwide repercussions. Aside from saying that in 1984 there would be another (a last?) military term until 1987, he pointed out the need for a third force, a moderate, neoconservative force to balance out the political system so that the military would not always have to be the one to rectify populist excesses. Harguindeguy's drive is also being helped by the vacuum that Balbin left. The old leader's moderation caught a wide spectrum of middle-of-the-road voters in Radicalism's electoral net. Today, these voters could feel the attraction of a third force's moderation if they come to see that the other radical wing, the one more to the Left, is broadening its influence thanks to the party without a head.

POLITICAL MEETING AT CGT HEADQUARTERS RAISES QUESTIONS

Buenos Aires A FONDO in Spanish Oct 81 pp 9-10

[Text] The parties' pilgrimage to the headquarters of the CGT [General Labor Confederation] raises not at all comfortable questions about Argentina's dubious devotion to a republican form of government.

We are in "verbal" agreement: We have to build a democratic republic. The overwhelming majority of Argentines rally around this cry. Building a democratic republic requires certain conditions, however, that we are not meeting. At times it would seem that the deep-seated agreement among Argentines is "to talk about" a democratic republic while "doing" something else. A parallel can readily be made here with inflation. "We say" monetary stability. "We do" inflation.

One example, among others, of what we were talking about in the previous paragraph was furnished by this recent episode: the visit by the top leaders of the Multiparty Commission to the headquarters of the CGT. As we know, there were serious differences in the Multiparty Commission between Peronism's labor union wing there, which backs a union hard line, and party representatives, even the Peronist Bittel. While the Peronist labor wing insisted that the Multiparty Commission communicate officially only with the CGT as the sole legitimate union group representing Argentina's workers (and Peronist organized labor), the parties did not wish to be sectarian and correctly argued, in our judgment, that they ought to talk with the CGT "and" with the Intersector Commission, without prejudging which one of them was more or less representative. In the end, a compromise was reached, whereby the Multiparty Commission would meet officially with both movements, but at the urging of the Peronist labor wing that is part of it, would begin with the CGT and at CGT headquarters.

And that is the way it happened. Thus, on Friday 9 October the papers reported in their lead articles on a development that is hard to explain from the standpoint of a democratic republic, as leaders of the stature of Deolindo Bittel, Torcuato Fino, Antonio Troccoli, Raul Alfonsin, Oscar Alende, Americo Garcia, Marcos Merchensky and Carlos Auyero, among others, ultimately made the pilgrimage to the CGT to be received there by its associate secretary, Fernando Donaires, in the absence of Secretary Saul Ubaldini, who was on a trip through Italy.

The Cry and the Nest

The episode seems to us to be at odds with the logic of a democratic republic because such a republic is based on the supremacy of party structures over other organized structures. Since 1930, however, Argentina has seen the growth and expansion of major institutions such as the Armed Forces, the state-run public sector and the unions (often in opposition to each other), while the role of political parties has been severely weakened. In 1930, in fact, President Uriburu wanted to found a formally institutional state in Argentina. President Onganía had the same thought 36 years later. Both met defeat in the realm of public definitions: officially, Argentina is still a country in search of a traditional democratic republic, with parties and elections. Nevertheless, what has grown since 1930 and intensified since 1966 has been a de facto institutionalism, while the structures that carried on the republican principle, the parties, were relegated to secondary status.

Until 1930, public life was dominated by two structures: the Radical Party and the conservative alliance. Two "parties." The military came on the scene in 1930, at the request of the conservatives. In 1946, what Perón formed was not a third "party," but an essentially institutional "movement," only one of whose branches was the Justicialista Party, while the CGT constituted its main branch. We should recall that the CGE [General Economic Confederation], another institution, was also in operation and that Perón tried to incorporate the military into the system.

While the military's influence grew as the system naturally expanded, what we saw in 1966-1970 was an attempt by the Onganía government to reach an understanding with organized labor and later, from 1973 to 1976, we saw no less than a "metallurgical homeland." Certainly today what we are seeing is the further development of the "military republic" (See this issue's editorial). Nevertheless, all of us, civilians and military alike, continue to dream about a democratic republic, which by definition is run by parties, not institutions. Under such a republic groups such as the military, the bureaucracy, unions, businesses, have specific, predetermined places, while the parties are the exclusive channels of power, whose roots are the will of our citizens taken as free individuals who are valuable as such, not as members of this or that organization.

The funny thing is that whenever someone says out loud that he wants an institutional state, as Uriburu and Onganía did, the proposal is rejected practically unanimously. What do we want then? Apparently, like the tero bird, to cry in one place and have a nest somewhere else. To be ruled by institutions and to continue talking about a liberal republic.

Sinners, Never Heretics

It is noteworthy, therefore, that not even party representatives still have a clear, resolute idea about the hierarchy of values and structures that a democratic or liberal republic requires. If we are ever to have one, the parties will have to receive the unions, not vice versa. It will be the unions that will have to go and call on the parties, not vice versa. The pilgrimage to the CGT shows us, on the one hand, the weak desire to eventually have something other than the one-person rule that exists in Peronism. It also discloses, furthermore, to what degree Radicalism, the only real party the country has, has ultimately been pushed by its members into taking stands that, instead of placing it in the vanguard of republican grievances, tend to make it look like just another satellite of the major organized labor group.

Now we know: we Catholics are sinners, but never heretics. This means that regardless of our daily religious practice, we belong to a cultural tradition that respects dogma above all else and that would rather violate that dogma a thousand times with specific lapses that can later be repented for, than to redefine doctrine in one way or another. The Protestants are heretics, not sinners. Since they do not want to or cannot sin, they do not suffer from confusion. They change dogma if they have to, in order to develop standards that will be complied with from then on. A Protestant culture would not stand for the duality of this country, which is ruled by institutions in deed but continues to be a democratic republic in principle. It would do one of two things: declare that the new dogma is rule by institutions and thence-forth establish a military-union-business-church-bureaucracy republic without parties, or bring things in line with democratic republican dogma and without further ado actually build a "party" republic by gradually moving towards municipal, provincial and national elections in a sensible transition process. We are doing neither. We continue proclaiming the dogma of a democratic republic while the people in power postpone time and again the steps aimed at founding one and while the parties burn incense at the institutional altar of the CGT. We praise democracy and pursue an institutional structure. And what happens then? "Then" doesn't matter. There's a reason why we have something that the Protestants no longer do: confession. Then we go to confession.

'LA PRENSA' COMMENTS ON SOVIET DIPLOMATIC RECOGNITION OF PLO

Buenos Aires LA PRENSA in Spanish 5 Nov 81 sec 2 p 1

[Article: "PLO Embassy in Moscow"]

[Text] The head of the Soviet Government, Leonid Brezhnev, announced last week that the Soviet Union had decided to accord diplomatic status to the delegation of the Organization for the Liberation of Palestine (PLO) in Moscow. The connections of the PLO with Moscow date back to 1956, when the former opened an office in the Soviet capital to "handle matters of common interest" between the terrorist organization and the communist state.

A short time ago, we had the opportunity to report in this column on the latest development in relations between the PLO and the Soviet Union, according to statements made by the PLO representative in Moscow during his visit to Beirut: "Relations between the PLO and Moscow could not be better as both parties maintain close political ties. The PLO has an agreement for cooperation with the Soviet Union, signed last year (1980) during Arafat's visit to Moscow, according to which a high-level Palestinian delegation will go to Moscow to coordinate on joint positions with the Soviets whenever problems arise. Hundreds of Palestinian officials with the rank of brigade commander have finished their studies in Soviet military academies, and PLO members use Soviet and Eastern European weapons in their guerrilla war against Israel. Today, some 2,000 palestinians are studying in Soviet institutions, and 300 scholarships are awarded annually to the PLO." He explained that "the PLO has special diplomatic status in the Soviet Union," by virtue of which "the PLO representative can travel freely throughout the country, in contrast to the status of other diplomatic representatives."

The recent concession of diplomatic status to the PLO by the Soviet Union is thus the consecration of the links that have been forged in recent years. These are very special links, born of a very special circumstance. Actually, the PLO is not a state, it does not own its own territory (including the territory it occupies, by force, in Lebanon); it does not trade; it does not maintain consular relations; does not constitute a regular government with constitutional powers; does not have a nationality; and carries on no productive activity. What are, then, these links that have united the PLO more and more with the Soviet Union? What kind of links are they and what is the degree of reciprocity concerning these links which have culminated in the granting of diplomatic status to the terrorist group? It is not necessary to say it, but it is good to emphasize it once again: these links, of a unique kind—and there are no others—exist because of the terrorist acts the PLO carries out all over the world (not just in Israel or the Middle East) for the benefit and at the orders of the Soviet Union.

The role that the Soviet Union plays as the headquarters of world terrorism is no longer a secret. Everything concerning that supplementary army—making plans, establishing priorities, setting objectives—is coordinated in Moscow. It is like an advance outline of the "Third World War." Of all the guerrilla organizations operating around the world today, the PLO plays a prominent role in the development of those plans. It can be said that it is the "wholesaler" for terrorism.

In a study published in May 1980 in "MIDSTREAM MAGAZINE," Roy S. Cline revealed that the principal guerrilla training centers in the Soviet Union, located in Baqu, Odessa, and Tashkent, take "students" from the Arab states, the Middle East, Western Europe, Latin America, and Southeast Asia and, in fact, from the entire Third World. The Simperopol Military Academy offers specialized courses to the Palestinians, who make up 75 percent of those being trained there. Of course, this is not the only information of prime importance available concerning the connections of the Soviet Union with the PLO in the international terrorism scene. The book by Clara Sterling, on whose most important passages we commented on a few months ago in an editorial note, also is extremely revealing of the connections we have been referring to.

Unfortunately, Moscow is not alone. Far from denouncing and combatting its plans, other countries and organizations have vied lately in showing their "understanding" of the PLO. Brazil has just authorized the PLO to open an office in Rio de Janeiro, thus joining Cuba and Nicaragua. About 110 countries have granted recognition to the PLO to some degree or other. In Western Europe, the number of its "offices" has reached seven in as many nations. East Germany gave it diplomatic status even before Russia. In the non-Islamic African countries, the PLO maintains 10 offices, 19 in the Arab League nations, and 3 in Latin America (Cuba, Nicaragua, and Brazil). On the other hand, only 70 countries throughout the world maintain relations with Israel. In Spain, former Prime Minister Suarez received Arafat with all the honors of a chief of state, but Madrid has still not recognized Israel.

IGLESIAS ROUCO COMMENTS ON VIOLA'S UNSTABLE FUTURE

Buenos Aires LA PRENSA in Spanish 1 Nov 81 pp 1, 4

[Article by J. Iglesias Rouco: "Amid Instability"]

[Excerpts] The week has concluded with a spate of rumors about the instability of General Viola's government, in connection with the immediate future of not only the so-called economic cabinet, but also of the Casa Rosada's political sphere and even of the president himself.

Although these conjectures are in some cases self-interested, they reflect the general turmoil in the country and the erosion of the "process." According to my sources, the near-term prospects are not, however, as spectacular as we might think, though they are disturbing, nonetheless. The agreement between Generals Galtieri and Viola is still in effect, and the regime will do everything it can not to "harden up," responsible circles keep telling us. There is also a 50 percent chance that Sigaut and Liendo will continue heading up their respective ministries at least until next March, which means that Liendo's resignation is not as sure a thing as many believe. My informants also contend that the name of General Villareal, who has so far been politically linked to Viola, is being bandied about in the Libertador Building as a candidate for chief of staff. Brigadier Lami Dozo, who also has ties with the president, continues to move forward towards the command of his branch, amid uncertainty about Mariani and about a third "choice" for a successor other than Lami Dozo and Mariani, in the wake of a meeting in which Brigadiers Plessl and Hunicken (the latter could retire) allegedly told Graffigna about most of their peers' criticism of Governor Ghisani's performance in Mendoza. Except for Admiral Anaya, whose interests are thought to be more professional than "political," the "power structure," if Lami Dozo is appointed, will continue to be made up of military officers who have so far been characterized by their intensive contacts with the major parties or, if you prefer, with the "exterior" of the "process."

The Dollar and Peronism

However, because of the magnitude of the economic crisis and the "impasse" triggered in the "dialog" by Peronism's stand last Thursday, compounded by further complications in delicate international problems, such as Beagle, that have profound domestic repercussions, we cannot talk with much certainty about any kind of "structure." We cannot rule out an upswing by the dollar over the next few days or hours, although its "ceiling" will remain at between 8,700 and 10,000 pesos (10,500-11,000 on the parallel market) until December, according to the experts. Pressures from the Church and from Chile will also intensify in the weeks to come. On the other hand, Peronism will probably once again discuss its participation in the "dialog." If this happens, it would be leaders such as Carrasco, Herminio Iglesias, Sarboli and Obeid who accompany Bittel to the Interior Ministry. As far as we know, both Robledo and Luder, and perhaps Julio Romero too, are in favor of Peronism speaking with Liendo through "organizational" representatives. In any case, the political plan of Liendo and his aides has already been dealt a harsh blow, whose effects are being felt, and will be felt, more on the military than on the civilian "front." The power struggle within Peronism, especially the struggle being waged in its union, in the wake of Mr Lorenzo Miguel's noteworthy "pro-dialog" stand, is an additional worry not only for Liendo and the "multiparty" group, whose fadeout seems irreversible, or for the "process" and its mysterious political plans in general, but also for the entire nation. At the close of this article I reveal some heretofore unpublished details of Mr Alsogaray's political "proposal." They appear in a book that the former minister is still writing and that responds to some of the questions that he posed in a document made public 10 days ago. If we go by Alsogaray's recent statements, he will very likely converse once again with General Viola at Olivos in the next few days or weeks, an opportunity that he will probably take advantage of to again stress this thorny issue of Peronism.

Alsogaray's Proposal

Meanwhile, Mr Alsogaray is taking what we might describe as a conciliatory stand towards the regime, albeit perhaps more dissenting than Manrique's with regard to Peronism. The former minister addresses precisely this issue in Chapter VII of a book entitled "Democracia de masas" [Mass Democracy], which he intends to publish in May 1982. The book sets forth a political proposal, whose main points can be summarized as follows:

1) The president for the 1984-1987 period will be a leading figure chosen by the Junta of Commanders in Chief.

2) The political parties statute should be issued as soon as possible. The parties will organize freely from that point on.

3) The statute should include a special section on Peronism.

a) The Peronist system, as we have come to know it, is excluded from the National Reorganization Process.

b) The Peronist system is made up of:

—Any party or political, union or other group that calls itself Peronist or Justicialista or that uses equivalent acronyms, in particular, the Peronist Party that existed as of 24 March 1976 and the labor union groups that so identify themselves.

—The leaders most representative of and most involved in past Peronist activities, above all, former President María E.M. de Perón.

c) The individuals referred to by name in the previous paragraph will be excluded politically from the Process for 15 years.

d) Those citizens who joined, supported or advocated the Peronist regime will be free to organize politically as they like, with the sole requirement of respecting the National Constitution, the laws of the republic and the exclusions and ineligibilities specified in the previous points. Any political leader or group that violates said restrictions will automatically become subject to them, which will be confirmed by an express pronouncement of the appropriate authority. Specifically, no group, political party or candidate that represents or receives the support of disqualified individuals can take part in the National Reorganization Process.

4) Once the political parties have been organized, elections of deputies and senators will be called in the second half of 1984. The chambers will begin functioning on 1 May 1985.

5) From 1984 to 1987, a chief executive designated by the Armed Forces and who will, in turn, appoint the governors and municipal authorities, will coexist with a Legislature elected by the people. This will be the first stage in the process of reorganizing the country politically and institutionally. A decision on the system of government subsequent to March 1987 will be made later.

Exclusion of the Peronist "System"

It is worthwhile pausing here to examine the impact that excluding Peronism from the national political scene will have. He says in his book:

"While excluding the 'Peronist system' and disqualifying its main leaders in the aforementioned manner, the program stipulates at the same time that the 'citizens' who were part of it have every right to organize political parties to represent them. We would imagine then that Peronism will find a way to organize and take power again, whereupon the country would again be exposed to the aforementioned ills. This risk does, in fact, exist, because today, 25 years after Peronism's first fall and after the failure of many of its successors, the perversions of the 'system' have been largely forgotten, and very few people have the energy, courage, understanding and moral authority to call them to our attention. But we have to run this risk. There is an offsetting element, however: the inability of Peronist leaders to replace Perón. Stripped of its mythical unifying components, Peronism becomes a shapeless 'mass' that requires leaders to guide and organize it. And these leaders have not appeared, not yet at least. It does, of course, have several leading figures, but they are of secondary status and offset each other; none of them seems capable of replacing Perón. Even the union machine, which many see as the major danger, is not the polarizing factor that some assume it is.

"Except for a few traditional, well-organized labor unions, the rest of organized labor was always a myth. Its monolithic appearance and its alleged power emanated from Peron and from the 'mission' that he assigned them as the 'backbone of the system.' Forced to rely on their own strength, battling for leadership posts and deprived of official support and the privileges secured under it, these leaders will have to fend for themselves and will lack the rallying power ascribed to them.

"This purge within freedom, which lessens the danger of a dictatorial concentration of political power, will benefit organized labor itself and enable it in the future to play its proper role in contemporary society. It will not be an influential political factor in the immediate future. Unions run from above as part of a totalitarian political structure are one thing, and freely functioning unions are something quite different. There is one qualification, however: government leaders and politicians must be able to create and preserve this framework of freedom and not feel tempted to wrongly emulate Peron and try 'to win over the unions.'

"Peronism, as represented by one or more parties, none of which can act on behalf of the 'system' and take advantage of the myth, will become just another movement on the political scene and not too distant from the problems that it presents. The program that I am discussing offers a practical way of doing this. If there are other ways, they should be outlined now. We are familiar with the Foundations of the Armed Forces, and a Political Commission is working on implementing them. The time has come to act. There are other reasons having to do with the timing of the program. The Armed Forces and the governments that they have formed have already accomplished the main goals that they set for themselves when they were forced to intervene on 24 March 1976. Now that sweeping action to reverse the country's advanced move towards collectivization is out of the question, action that was possible immediately after 24 March 1976 but that is not feasible today, there remains little for the Armed Forces to do other than maintain emergency conditions and prolong the current interregnum. They have only one far-reaching task before them: to curb inflation.

"But this task can and must be completed in the near term, while the program of rehabilitating the country politically and institutionally moves forward. To continue governing the country under the current conditions can only erode the Armed Forces prestige, and this is the worst thing that could happen to them and to the country."

GRONDONA REFERS TO FORMATION OF 'MILITARY REPUBLIC'

Buenos Aires A FONDO in Spanish Oct 81 pp 6-7

[Article by Mariano Grondona]

[Text] The papers have been commenting more or less elliptically in recent days on two unquestionably momentous reports about the military. One is that promotions and transfers in the army will allegedly take place in accordance with criteria consistent with the consolidation of the current leadership. The second is that an understanding has allegedly been reached whereby the current commander in chief of the army, whose term ends in late 1982, might be appointed president of the nation in late 1983 for the 1984-1987 period. This would mean that President Viola's prospects for reelection could fade away.

I am not interested in commenting here on the "personal" consequences of these reports or, ultimately, on their greater or lesser degree of accuracy. They are, however, significant because they square with the culmination of a lengthy process whose results have become clear in recent years: the slow, gradual, inexorable formation of a military system of government. As has already been proposed, we will call it the "military republic," inasmuch as beginning in 1976, its key date, the system abandoned the rule of individuals and presidents and shifted to a fixed-term, rotating division of powers within the military that admits advanced comparison with a civilian republic.

The following are the stages that the lengthy formation of this system went through:

1. Initially, there was just "peripheral," limited and brief military intervention. This is how we might describe the military coup d'etat of 6 September 1930. General Uriburu then assumed the "provisional" presidency of a "de facto" government, exercised very limited powers (emergency powers only), did not interfere with the Judiciary, lasted a year and a half in office (the new constitutional government took over in February 1932) and, moreover, seized power from a peripheral position: as a general who rose up against the president and the official central command of the Armed Forces. We could also say that the 1930 coup was "arbitral" inasmuch as its political impact was to "arbitrate" against the ruling party in 1930 (the UCR [Radical Civic Union]) and in favor of the opposition coalition (the conservatives, radical antipersonalists and independent socialists).

2. The 4 June 1943 revolution made no major changes. In 1955, however, there was a qualitative leap. The Liberating Revolution did not assume "limited" emergency powers. On the contrary, it called itself a "revolution" and took such action as intervening in the Judiciary (Peron had encroached on its longstanding independence in 1949, citing the approval of Congress and the Constitutional Convention) and calling a Constitutional Convention in 1957. The president continued to be "provisional," however, which meant that "permanent" power was reserved for constitutional institutions. In addition, like the 1943 coup, the 1955 military movement was peripheral: a renowned commander (Lonardi instead of Rawson) imposed himself on the "central" political and military hierarchy. In both cases, the coup "advanced on" Buenos Aires, whether from Cordoba, Puerto Belgrano or Campo de Mayo.

3. A government as limited and brief as Uriburu's was formed in 1962 (Guido's) with the overthrow of Frondizi, but in this case the qualitative leap was in the form of the overthrow. This time it was not a commander rising up against the central hierarchy in Cordoba or Campo de Mayo. It was the junta of commanders that "decided" to topple the president. Technically, the 29 March 1962 military uprising was not a military revolution. It was a "decision" by the military's central hierarchy. It was a political judgment against the head of the constitutional republic by the head of the military republic that was in the works.

4. This method of deposing a president was not to be abandoned. In 1966 (Illia), 1970 (Onganía), 1971 (Levingston) and 1976 (Isabel Peron), the junta again assumed the power to depose and acted as a political tribunal.

One further step was taken in 1966, however. For the first time a revolutionary process without time limits was started. "Objectives, not deadlines": The phrase took hold under Onganía, marking another qualitative leap. The fact is that in contrast to the usual prior periods (from 1½ to 3 years), the 7 years of government of the Argentine Revolution were clearly telling us that the military republic was taking a major step forward. In point of fact, if we look at the 1966-1973 and 1976-1981 periods, the 1973-1976 period was a constitutional exception to military rule. The tables had been turned. Constitutional rule was the exception. A military republic was the rule. Onganía called himself just "president," not "provisional" president. From 1966 to 1981 we have had 3 years of a constitutional republic and 12 years of a military republic, that is to say, 12 years of military rule with a civilian interval of 3 years.

5. But under Onganía there were still inconsistencies with the budding military republic. One was that the Armed Forces, after the uprising, continued to delegate power to a president, entrusting the entire process to him. This was not a military government proper; it was the government "of a military officer." The other was that the president of the nation still served as commander in chief of the Armed Forces. Onganía, in fact, exercised that power fully until he was deposed.

These two characteristics as yet impeded the full-fledged development of the military republic. By giving unlimited power to a man (unlimited in the degree of power and with no time limits), what the military was founding in the bud was a regime like Franco's or Pinochet's, since the military structure as such as being concentrated in a man, not in a military "republican" regime. Moreover, keeping the figure of the president posed two obstacles to the "republic." First, by virtue of the presidency an army commander exercised ultimate control over the other two branches because the president was commander in chief of the "three" Armed Services, and this threw the system out of balance. Second, each service continued to allow political supervision of itself that was ultimately beyond its control, because the president was involved in ordering the annual retirements and promotions.

6. Thus, the system was almost perfected in 1976. For the time being, terms were set for four key posts: the president and the commanders. This made concentration of power in one man impossible. The president, however, was reduced to the level of a prime minister by giving up his military power. He is the head of government, but no longer the chief of state. Thus, each branch shares total power on the junta, which did not return to its specific functions once the previous president was deposed and the new one, who remains in power, was chosen. This also insures the impenetrability of its behind-the-scenes decisions on retirements, promotions and transfers, which remain up to the commander himself. It is almost a military republic. Like a civilian republic, it has fixed terms and a division of powers: Power is shared among four ranking officers who rotate in asymmetrical 3-year terms.

I have used the word "almost" several times, however. There was one detail missing, though it has perhaps been supplied now. Neither the "real" duration of the president's term nor the nation's actual political course have been defined. Thus, General Viola started out at a pace in keeping with the plan: to move gradually towards a party system with a view to his own reelection in 1984 and anticipating that 1984-1987 would be a transition period on the way to the reestablishment of a civilian and constitutional republic, which is one of the objectives of the National Reorganization Process. The pressure of events was too much. If what some people now contend is true (that General Galtieri will succeed General Viola), the system will be complete. There will be no more "almost." After serving as commander in chief of the army, you become president. In both cases for 3 years. There will not be any chink in the military republic from that point on. Except one: that its proposed objective is to found "another" republic, a civilian and constitutional one.

NATO KGB REPORT AROUSES SUSPICION OF INCREASED SOVIET PRESENCE

[Editorial: "The KGB, Instrument of Soviet Power"]

[Text] The report by the NATO services on the power of the Soviet KGB, measured by the number of their agents, sympathizers, and contacts throughout the world, is certainly not new. In recent years, there have been several similar studies that have received modest dissemination. What should be emphasized here is the coincidence of Moscow's intense arms buildup and the revelations of the report. The subject is something to think about because the KGB is not only a government agency, it is the basic instrument of Soviet power to the extent that nobody could ever imagine the Kremlin's continuing to exist without this formidable apparatus, whose functions tax the most vivid imagination. It is certain that today the Soviet secret police, whose origins are well known and traceable back to Czarist times, when it was called the Okhrana, has attained levels of efficiency that no Czar could ever have dreamed of.

NATO estimates that Moscow has 700,000 spies throughout the world, including agents, contacts, collaborators, and sympathizers. That figure corresponds with the best-known aspects of the Soviet state, especially the police system, which points up its nature. Strictly speaking, the KGB (Committee for State Security, Komitet Gosudarstvennoy Bezopasnosti) is a complex political-police mechanism designed to ensure the ideological homogeneity of the regime and Soviet power throughout the world at all times through the use of implacable methods.

The internal workings of the KGB, which are not entirely secret, could be described as an expression of the "scientific concept of a dictatorship" that Lenin spoke about around 1920, "which means nothing more nor less than limitless power that relies strictly upon force—force that is neither circumscribed nor restrained by any law or regulation whatever." One writer believes that "if the KGB disappeared, the basic means for controlling thought, the media, the conduct of Soviet citizens, art, science, religion, education" and even "the police and the armed forces would disappear along with it." Without the KGB, "the Soviet Union would lose its capability to conduct espionage abroad; subvert public officials; carry out sabotage and murder; foster strikes, demonstrations, and riots; support terrorism and guerrilla warfare; and contaminate public statements clandestinely with information and lies. To a great extent, it would be incapable of achieving surreptitiously what it has failed to achieve in the full light of day."

The NATO report takes the form of an expose of the methods and practices of Soviet espionage. At its highest and most dangerous level--industrial and military secrets that sometimes form part of the same objective--it has not always been an unqualified success for the Soviet Union. Occasionally, thinking they have made off with the latest high-level technical advances, they have found they had acquired only miscellaneous scraps.

However, their trickery has been more successful in the unsuspecting world of politics and trade unionism in the West, which has not yet acquired the most essential shield of all, distrust of the communists. Toward the "disinformation" campaigns of the KGB throughout the world, including Latin America, democratic society has often reacted tardily, dully, and with incredulity and confusion regarding methods and objectives.

Of course, this record is not new. Soviet espionage fills the diplomatic ranks with large complements of personnel, the great majority of whom are spies. At one time, Mexico and Uruguay had the largest Soviet and diplomatic representations in Latin America.

The publication of the NATO report raises the question of how we are doing here at home with trade with the Soviet Union rising to surprising levels and considering the frequent arrival among us of delegations of communist "technicians" concerned with a variety of matters, thus producing irritation in a country like Argentina which has suffered greatly from the ravages of the Marxist-Leninist guerrillas.

FNM NAMES FOUR ADDITIONAL GENERAL ELECTION CANDIDATES

Nassau THE TRIBUNE in English 15 Oct 81 pp 1, 10

[Text]

THE FREE National Movement has selected four more candidates to contest various constituencies in the upcoming general elections.

Bringing to eight the number of FNM candidates announced so far are Edmund Moxey for St Barnabas, Frank Watson for Carmichael, George Wilson for St Michael's, and Pierre Dupuch for Shirley.

Others previously announced are FNM leader Kendal Isaacs for Delaporte, FNM chairman Cecil Wallace Whitfield for Pinewidge (Grand Bahama), Parliamentary leader Henry Bostwick for Nicolls Town (Andros), and incumbent Maurice Moore for High Rock (Grand Bahama).

Elected to Parliament on January 10, 1967 on a Progressive Liberal Party ticket for Coconut Grove (now St Barnabas), Moxey soon became disappointed in the direction in which Prime Minister Lynden Pindling's Administration was going.

He started a struggle within the party to try to bring the administration back in line with is original philosophy.

Moxey was appointed Parliamentary Secretary in the PLP government in 1970, but resigned in December 1973 when Government refused to provide funds for a much-needed community development programme geared to the development of youth and culture. He resigned from the PLP on February 8, 1976, charging that the party had betrayed the people's cause.

Moxey is the founder of Jumbey Village and the Community Centre on Achilles Street. This centre now serves residents as far away as the Carmichael constituency.

He is now president of Home Improvement Company, servicing builders and related trades. A musician and composer, his album "Tribute To Granny" has been a success. Moxey is married to the former Sylvia Cunningham and lives in Stapledon Gardens.

The president of Bahama Divers Co Ltd, Frank Watson was the FNM's candidate for Carmichael in the 1977 general elections.

He is the past director of Kiwanis Over-The-Hill Club, a founding member and president of the Long Islanders Association and Commodore of the Bahamas Sailing Association.

An Anglican, Watson is married to the former June Wright. They have two daughters.

George Wilson, until recently, was a lecturer at the College of the Bahamas. He is a founding director of Sunshine Theatres Ltd, Golden Gates Theatre, Baswil Entertainment Ltd and Da Sun Shop Ltd.

He was a member of the youth pressure group Uniconom and was a former secretary-general of the PLP and former president of the Bahamian American Federation.

In 1979, Wilson formed the Citizens Party, which he led until it was disbanded the following year. He joined the FNM in 1980 and became party councillor.

He is also a member of the Bahamas Union of Teachers, COB Faculty Association and the National Association of Broadcasters (USA).

A Roman Catholic, Wilson has one daughter.

Pierre Dupuch, along with his brother Bernard, is the founder of Executive Printers, a leading commercial printing establishment.

He is the founder of the Eastern Equestrian Society and serves on the board. He is also founder and president of the Bahamas National Equestrian Federation and owner of Camperdown Ranch.

Dupuch was the UBP's candidate for Far East Constituency in 1962. He did not win the seat.

A Roman Catholic, he is married to the former Susan Thompson. They have one son and three daughters and live in Gleniston Gardens.

SUPPORT FOR ANGOLA TO BE SHOWN DURING MINISTER'S VISIT

Rio de Janeiro JORNAL DO BRASIL in Portuguese 1 Nov 81 p 14

[Article by Luiz Barbosa: "Angolan Coming to Brazil"]

[Text] Brasilia—Despite financial difficulties which prevents it from assuming any new commitment of major scope, the Brazilian Government is going to try to mark the upcoming visit of Angolan Minister of Foreign Affairs Paulo Jorge with more daring understandings than the majority already made with other African countries, understandings capable of proving to the enemies of the Luanda Government, particularly South Africa, that Angola is an area of great interest for Brazil.

Paulo Jorge, a politician of European features and bearing—easily confused with the figure of a prosperous Lisbon businessman—will land in Brasilia on the 25th to carry out a visit, which because of its nature differs little from a routine visit except for one detail: He will certainly be received in a special audience by President Joao Figueiredo, perhaps as the first foreign authority of his level to receive the attention of the president after his heart attack in Rio.

Partnership on Food

Substantially, however, the visit by the Minister of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of Angola, an old desire of the Brazilian Government since it assumed the responsibility of supporting the MPLA [Popular Movement for the Liberation of Angola] of Agostinho Neto, even when his control in large areas of Angola territory was contested, is going to be different than that of other foreign ministers of foreign affairs. For that Brazil has a good capability for helping in the agricultural sector and in the production of food in general, areas in which Angola is admittedly deficient and has not yet been able to fill the vacuum left by the flight of former Portuguese colonizers.

The secondary sectors to be explored in an ambitious aid program are transportation and equipment, production of power, light industry and the provision of technical services.

The Brazilian presence in Angolan territory, in addition to a few other sectors, has been primarily in the area of hotels and services. A hotel service center capable of providing the offical network of hotels of the country with laundry, cleaning and food services was completely planned and executed by a Brazilian company. It has a capability for taking care of 4,000 guests.

Already underway as a result of agreements made at the beginning of 1979, is a program for the training of middle-level technical personnel supervised by the Angolan Ministry of Industry and Energy and the National Industrial Apprenticeship Service (SENAI) of Brazil.

Gas, Oil and Risk

Compensating for the lack of a visit by the Angolan minister of foreign affairs to Brazilia, Minister of Foreign Affairs Saraiva Guerreiro completed his tour of Africa in June 1980 by visiting Angola and signing economic, technical and scientific cooperation and cultural and educational agreements with the same Minister Paulo Jorge, the procedures for which will be negotiated during this visit by the representative of the Angolan Government. PETROBRAS [Brazilian Petroleum Corporation] is in advanced negotiations for gas and oil exploration under a risk system on the coast of the country. Its counterpart is SONANGOL [Expansion unknown], an Angolan state company, also represented by Ambassador Olga Lima, responsible for the most important links with Brazil, not only in the area of technical cooperation, but above all in the political field, and by Antonio Mangueira, assistant director of the SONANGOL.

During the stay by Paulo Jorge in Brazilia—a little more than 24 hours—Itamaraty is not going to spare any demonstrations of support for the cause of complete independence of Namibia and condemnation—surely the most vigorous yet heard from its officials—of the poor behavior of South Africa in that which refers, not only to the black domestic population through its official apartheid policy, but particularly with respect to its bordering neighbors, always faced with military attacks of different scopes: simple raids of commando type or large-scale invasions of the type made on Angolan territory in September.

This visit by Minister of Foreign Affairs Paulo Jorge is also going to serve as a new and valuable exercise in Brazilian diplomacy, wherein it will make its interests coexist in a close partnership with Angola in all fields despite the difficulties created by the Marxist orientation of the MPLA and the stationing of a contingent of 25,000 Cubans in Angolan territory, the majority concentrated in the urban center of Luanda itself.

Brazilian engineers and technicians, who work in Angola, have already accustomed themselves to living in their day-to-day routine with the young Cuban men, girls and children in their olive green field uniforms: doctors, nurses, dentists or simple military technicians, who travel the streets of Luanda in speedy, noisy jeeps.

NATIONAL INTERESTS, ACTIVITIES IN ANTARCTIC SURVEYED

Sao Paulo VISAO in Portuguese 28 Oct 81 pp 33-35

[Article: "Brazil in the Antarctic; the Defense of a Right"]

[Text] What is Germany doing in the antarctic? And Poland, which despite the crisis it is traversing, invests about $3 million a year in maintaining its Antarctic base? The two countries are the newest members of the closed club of countries that participate in the Antarctic Treaty, which has been in effect since 1961. Poland entered together with the Soviet Union in 1977 and West Germany has been established in the southern icy region since March of this year, after a concentrated effort of 24 months during which it succeeded in fulfilling all the requirements of the Scientific Committee on Antarctic Research (SCAR).

What about Brazil? Thus far, Brazil has done nothing but subscribe to the treaty, in 1975. And that means that the Brazilian Government agrees with the terms of that document, which does not give the country any right over 14 million square meters of the Antarctic continent although it grants Brazilian scientists the right to conduct research there. However, the Antarctic is of interest to Brazil--greatly so. After all, the influence which the region exerts on the climate of our country, especially in that of the southern, central and western regions, with visible effects on agricultural-livestock production, is enormous. Frosts, hail, intense cold, heavy rains, gales and other unfavorable climatic conditions that befall our agricultural areas, for the most part, originate in the Antarctic. And it is in the waters around the South Pole that the marine plankton, the origin of the whole food chain of the oceans, is formed; that is why the southern coast of Brazil and of Uruguay, Argentina and Chile are so rich in fish. The fact is that part of the biologic resoursec of the Antarctic flow northward, brought by the ocean currents in a movement that is provided by the special location of the continent, which is at the confluence of three oceans, the Atlantic, Pacific and Indian Oceans, as geographer Jane Pereyron Mocellin, one of the few Brazilian researchers who have already gone to the Antarctic, points out.

Territorial Claims: However, each country has its reasons for establishing itself there. An atlas prepared by the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) not only indicates some of those reasons but describes the problem of sovereignty in the Antarctic. According to the publication of the American agency, the good will that marked the International Geophysical Year (IGY) in 1958 and the signing of the treaty in 1959 did not annul the old territorial claims of seven of the member-states over parts of the Antarctic. Although those claims--the majority of them veritable "slices" of the continent, cut in wedges converging at the South Pole—do not restrict research activity because they are frozen for the duration of the treaty, they attest to national interests and presage disputes, according to the CIA.

The agency also summarizes the arguments of each of the seven countries that want to take possession of part of the Antarctic: the United Kingdom was the first country to claim rights over the region, through its Falkland Islands Dependencies of 1908. Later, as a result of German submarine warfare, Australia, New Zealand, Argentina and Chile became convinced of the need to protect the southern flank. "The two Latin countries," the document explains, "are especially sensitive about their claims because they consider the Antarctic a complementary part of their territories."

According to the CIA, France aspires to the "slice" which its explorers investigated at the beginning of the century. Norway selected one of the various areas where their scientific explorers and whale fishermen have been. However, their claims do not extend to the region near the South Pole but are limited to the area more on the edge of the continent. On the other hand, the territories claimed by Britain, Argentina and Chile are practically superimposed, forming one more area of dispute in the already bitter differences between Chile and Argentina over the Beagle Channel and between Argentina and Britain over possession of the Falkland (called Malvinas by the Argentines) Islands.

The United States and the USSR have not yet made any territorial claim over Antarctic nor do they recognize the claims of those who have already made them. But the CIA notes that both powers have already stated that they have "reserved" their "rights" in the region. And at the same time that they encourage scientific research in the area, they support the position of internationalization, that is, the application there of the "no man's land" policy: whoever first occupies it, retains possession.

The seven countries that claim to have rights over the Antarctic (Argentina, Australia, Chile, France, Norway, New Zealand and the United Kingdom) carefully leave a "slice" between the meridians 90 and 150 degrees west free, at the disposal of the other countries, for internationalized use. The "slice" thesis, termed "frontage" [defrontacao], runs counter to that of "internationalization" of the Antarctic territory, supported by the powers.

Rio Grande do Sul Project—Brazil, which is so close to and so much affected by the Antarctic, has interest in the continent but it did little to implement its desire to operate in the South Pole. And the main obstacle is the geopolitical dispute with Argentine—it so happens, for example, that the Brazilian Institute of Antarctic Studies (IBEA) had to deactivate its plan for a scientific expedition to the Antarctic by official order in the first half of the last decade when Brazil was negotiating the levels of Itaipu with the neighboring country.

At that time, because it did not want to open up another area of differences with Argentina, the Geisel administration ordered the National Security Council to dissuade the IBEA from its intentions. Since then, interest in the Antarctic has remained dormant and only one or another isolated researcher has concerned himself with the subject. It was with surprise, therefore, that during the Antarctic Studies Seminar held in Porto Alegre at the end of September, the almost deactivated IBEA discovered a group of students from the University of Vale do Rio dos Sinos (in Sao Leopoldo, Rio Grande do Sul) with a plan ready to operate in the Antarctic.

It will not yet be the "Brazilian expedition" dreamed about by the IBEA; but with great chances of success, the experience of the young Rio Grande do Sul students should contribute greatly to that project. The students are part of the geologic mapping of the oceanic islands of South America. After working in the desert of Atacama in Chile (a project that replaced the original project of mapping Easter Island, abandoned for logistic reasons), they were tempted to work in the Antarctic. With that objective, on 24 June of this year, the Rio Grande do Sul students submitted a project that is now being examined by the governments of Norway, Chile and Argentina. The plan is to send the personnel of the geologic research group to serve apprenticeships in the bases which those countries maintain in the South Pole, where they will require training of extreme importance for the expedition that, it appears, the IBEA will conduct. The leaders of the institute, almost all of them members of the Engineering Club of Rio de Janeiro and former students of the War College (ESG), regarded as a "green light" the statements made by Vice Admiral Orlando Augusto Amaral Affonso, navy vice chief of staff, during the seminar. The admiral made it clear that Brazil is interested in joining the Antarctic Treaty as an active member. And that in order to do so, the navy is prepared to give the necessary support in accordance with what is decided by the government.

Implementaion of the IBEA expedition now depends exclusively on an official measure that seems to be very simple: its recognition through the Justice Ministry as a "public service organization." Once it acquires that status, the IBEA will be able to receive private donations to obtain an appropriate oceanographic ship. Perhaps it may be the Norwegian "Magadan," which is on sale for $400,000 after the company that used it to transport supplies to the polar bases gave up that business.

The "Magadan" which is currently operating in Angola, could be purchased by the IBEA, which spent $20,000 in preliminary negotiations. In any case, if the deal is not concluded, there are other ships available. The president of the institute, Rio engineer Joao Aristides Wiltgen, argues that the time available for a Brazilian expedition to go to the Antarctic is getting dangerously short. It must be implemented before 1991 when the Antarctic Treaty is going to be revised. According to Wiltgen, the ideal would be to carry out the expedition and carry out good research work in the Antarctic before 1983.

The philosophy of the IBEA is that "future generations will not be able to complain that Brazil lost the Antarctic because 'we' did not do anything" For that very reason, the watchword of all those who are excited over the Antarctic question is: "We have to go there." Not to vie for territory--the Brazilian position is already practically defined on that score. The "friends of the Antarctic," as the members of the IBEA may be called, want Brazil to have the right to conduct scientific research and to participate in the exploitation of the immense economic potential of the region where, according to some reports, there is everything from oil to atomic minerals.

The Arguments in Favor

If it should want to claim territorial rights over the Antarctic, Brazil has good ammunition for the diplomatic fight to which the position would give rise. A good argument, to begin with: Brazil is the natural heir of the provisions of the old treaties between Portugal and Spain, such as the Treaty of Tordesillas, which clearly defined the question of lands found in "seas never sailed before," which includes the Antarctic.

In addition to that, there is the "Manifest Destiny" theory of Theodore Roosevelt, and the Monroe Doctrine (that of "America for the Americans"). Brazil could, similarly, base itself on the example of the division of the North Pole among the members of the condominium comprised of the countries that are close to it: Canada, the United States and the Soviet Union. Under the principle of "frontage," Brazil can claim a slice between the meridians 34 degrees 45 minutes and 53 degrees 21 minutes west. The basis of that principle is the right to a sector delimited by the meridians that pass along the extreme points of its territory [frontage on the Antarctic].

That would produce great complications, first, with Argentina, because it coincides with the "slice" claimed by that country. Then with Chile, since the Brazilian "slice" would "encompass a small part of the territory claimed by the Chileans," explained the international law specialist, Luis Carlos Lopes Moreira. Finally, there would be a dispute with Britain, which reserves the right to the land claimed by those two countries. It is to avoid such problems that the majority of the advocates of a Brazilian presence in the Antarctic support the position of internationalization.

New Force in Rio Grande do Sul

In America, the only country that wants to participate in the Antarctic Treaty is Brazil. All the other would-be participants are European: the Netherlands, Denmark, East Germany, Romania and Czechoslovakia. The Brazilian dream gained a new impulse with the Seminar on Antarctic Studies sponsored by the Rio Grande do Sul section of the Brazilian Bar Association (OAB), which plans to include a provision on the subject in the constitutional charter draft, which the Rio Grande do Sul section of the OAB has been preparing for 2 years.

Based on one of the basic legal postulates, the lawyers believe that Brazil should not renounce any of its prerogatives. And among them, they include the Antarctic. On the other hand, the scientists only want the right of free access to the region for research and possible economic exploitation. Those who renounce territorial tenure believe that Brazil already has territory that is little known. The main concern is with the effects of the Antarctic on the national territory. For that reason, priority will be given to research in the areas of meterology, oceanology and biology.

To the surprise of the organizers of the seminar, the subject of Antarctica drew a fair-sized audience in the auditorium of the OAB: about 100 interested persons attended each of the three sessions of the meeting. Some, such as the advisers from the Brazilian Institute of Antarctic Studies, were older but here was also a large number of young people.

In fact, perhaps because proximity makes them more attentive to the subject, it is Rio Grande do Sul personnel who are giving new impetus to the idea of the Brazilian expedition to the Antarctic. Proof of that is the fact that in September the IBEA established a group in Rio Grande. With a university and an oceanographic base, that city could possible become the headquarters of the Brazilian Antarctic Base.

ANTARCTIC CLAIMS MAY CREATE CONFLICT WITH ARGENTINA

Rio de Janeiro JORNAL DO BRASIL in Portuguese 8 Nov 81 p 18

[Article by Luiz Barbosa: "Antarctic May Create Clash Between Brazil and Argentina"]

[Text] Brasilia—Unless it is willing to face a new dispute with Argentina similar to the one created by the construction of the Itaipu hydroelectric dam, Itamaraty will have to approach the project of a Brazilian presence in the Antarctic with great caution. It will have to overcome the main question: the superimposition of the section projected by the eastern part of its territory and continental sea on the zone already claimed by the Argentines: a cone which has the South Pole as its apex and its base between the South Orkney Islands and the Sandwich Island Archipelago.

Those warnings about a new element of crisis in the relations which were normalized after the beginning of the Joao Figueiredo Administration, are heard today unofficially in Itamaraty itself at a time when the Ministry of the Navy intends to actually put together the first Brazilian expedition to Antarctic territory, making an actuality of Brazilian participation in the 1959 Treaty which it joined only in May 1975.

Confidence

Questioned as to the possibility of a new polemic on future Brazilian claims on sections of the Antarctic, which are already under the jurisdiction of his country, the new Argentine ambassador in Brazilia, Hugo Caminos, refuses to speculate on the subject, speaking of his confidence that the two governments will know how to come to an understanding at the proper time.

According to Minister of Foreign Relations and Worship Oscar Camilon, the chance of the initiation of a new conflict between the interests of Buenos Aires and Brasilia is a danger for the policy of total pacification in bilateral relations, of which he himself was the principal architect at the time which ended the government of President Ernesto Geisel and Minister of Foreign Affairs Azeredo da Silveira was completing his period in office at Itamaraty.

The area Brazil wants could contain 50 billion barrels of petroleum. It is within an area claimed by Argentina which in turn is in conflict with what the British and Chileans claim.

Key:

1. Claimed by Brazil
2. Claimed by Argentina
3. Claimed by Chile

The difficulties for those first Brazilian activities in the Antarctic begin with the lack of experience and lack of national resources for making the expedition. The Brazilian naval industry does not have the know-how for building a ship suitable for the ice routes closest to the pole, dealing with the techniques which begin with the multiple layers of the hull, extend to the superstructure and the details of weather proofing, engine capabilities and interior heating. The Brazilian Armed Forces, including the Navy and Air Force, do not have any significant experience in those matters.

Therefore, the expedition project is going to have to seek support, even if only partial, abroad, with England, Argentina itself and Chile as the most probable "points of support" to which Brazil can turn. Throughout the recent history of bilateral agreements which surrounded the presidential visits to Santiago and Buenos Aires, however, there is no record of any understanding at a high level about Brazilian plans for the Antarctic. Indeed, that subject was never discussed in any great depth between the Ministries of Foreign Affairs.

Treaty Born of Cooperation

Brasilia—In its present form the Antarctic Treaty is the fruit of an effort of international cooperation during the so-called International Geophysical Year in 1958, in which Brazil did not participate. Twelve countries participated in it through scientific delegations, countries which already were carrying on activities, or claimed rights, in the Antarctic and had special interests in it.

The original participants in the Geophysical Year were the following: Argentina, Australia, Belgium, Chile, United States, France, Japan, New Zealand, Norway, Great Britain and North Ireland, the Soviet Union and South Africa, all of them, obviously, with territorial projections on the Antarctic.

Negotiations

The negotiations on the agreement, still in 1958, were opened by the U.S. Government, which suggested the signing of the agreement and inviting the 12 countries participating in the Geophysical Year to meet in Washington.

The Antarctic Treaty was signed 1 December 1959 and went into effect 23 June 1963, when the last instrument of ratification of its text was deposited in Washington.

Interest Is Obvious Since 1975

Brasilia—Brazilian intentions to lay future claims to a section of the Antarctic, even though the Ministry of Foreign Affairs has made no efforts to emphasize them, have been obvious in the items of the communique issued by Itamaraty 16 May 1975 announcing the decision of unconditionally adhering to the treaty signed in Washington 16 years ago. In that communique Itamaraty proclaimed the Brazilian position in defense of the "principles of equality among all the signing countries," which means the elimination of any idea of privilege for those countries which signed the agreement originally in 1959.

In another item of that statement, Itamaraty invokes the fact that Brazil, because it has "the longest South Atlantic coastline, overlooks that southern continent and had direct and substantial interests in the Antarctic." Such arguments may insure the Brazilian request that there be a revision of the division into sections of the areas of control over Antarctic territory based on the principle of "frontage," pursuant to which the member countries of the treaty "project" the salients of their territory over the Antarctic in cones which have their apexes at the South Pole.

In addition, in its 1975 communique, Itamaraty also invoked the fact that Brazil is directly committed to the defense of Antarctic territory through the Inter-American Reciprocal Assistance Treaty, whose new document, Article 4, extends the area of jurisdiction of that treaty to the Antarctic.

In opposition to the "territorialist" theories advocated by Great Britain (due to the projections of the Falkland Islands), Argentina and Chile, among others, the United States and the Soviet Union, followed by Poland, Austria and other European signers, maintain the need for the internationalization of the Antarctic without strict delimitations of control which have to be respected. The time is now drawing near, however, in which the countries are beginning to decide on practical plans for the exploitation of the mining and fishing resources of the Antarctic, discussion which will aggravate divisions and disputes among the "traditional" member countries, the supporters and the nonparticipants of the 1959 treaty, in which Brazil did not participate in the beginning.

Taken to the final consequences, the application of the principle of frontage as a rule for determining the limits of sovereignty in the Antarctic is also going to mean the involvement of Brazil in questions as delicate as the historical disputes between Argentina and Chile over the ownership of the Beagle Channel islands or between Argentina and Great Britian over the Malvina Islands (Falkland).

Expedition Will Be the First Step

The Brazilian Navy expedition to the Antarctic, which should take place during the summer period in the region, "is the first practical, actual and official step whereby the Brazilian Government demonstrates its interests in the Antarctic Continent," declared Theresinha de Castro yesterday. She is a retired geographer, a lecturer on geopolitics at the Naval War School and author of "Toward the Antarctic" published in 1976 by the Freitas Bastos Publishing House.

Although former Deputy Euripedes Cardoso de Menezes says there is already a Brazilian flag planted in Antarctic territory, Dona Thereziinha adds that only private Brazilian expeditions were in the Antarctic. Euripedes Cardoso de Meneses, former ARENA [National Renewal Alliance] deputy, was the one who brought the discussion on the principle of frontage, which would give Brazil the right to explore the Antarctic, to Congress in 1970.

Frontage

According to the principle of frontage, the nation having frontage is the owner of the islands and lands existing between the meridians which limit its territory. Thus, Brazil would receive the area delimited by the meridians of Martim Vaz and the Chui steam.

"The principle of frontage," says former Deputy Euripedes Cardoso de Menezes, "was considered valid, including by Russia, for the division of the Arctic. Why should it not be valid for the Antarctic? We do not advocate it only because it is the only way we would have our share of the Antarctic together with Uruguay, Argentina, Chile, Peru, Ecuador, South Africa, Australia, New Zealand and other nations which may have frontage. We have insisted on that principle because it is the only one capable of proportionately satisfying all those interested. If that criterion is rejected, everyone will disagree with everyone. And if we recognize the rights of certain nations of the Northern Hemisphere, the fact must be remembered that once the territorial division by the system of frontage is made, there will remain another 3.5 million square kilometers of nonfrontage Antarctic area which could very well be the object of diplomatic negotiations."

The former deputy also advocates that the conference that will make the territorial division of the Antarctic scheduled for 1991 be moved up "because if the extraction of the petroleum and uranium which are known to exist there in large quantities is begun, there will explode a conflict of apocolyptic consequences. Therefore let us defend the principle of frontage and unfurl the banner of peace in the Antarctic," he added.

"However," continues Euripedes Cardoso de Menezes, "more important than the continent are the islands that Brazil will obtain with the principle of frontage. They are of very great strategic, economic and political importance."

Navy Intends to Guarantee Rights

Brasilia--Naval Chief of Staff Fleet Adm Jose Gerardo Albano Teophilo de Aratanha said the objective of the navy in seeking to send a Brazilian expedition to the South Pole is to try to have Brazil make scientific investigations in the region by 1991, the date of the end of the Antarctic Treaty, so as to have the right to express opinions and make claims at the meeting which will take place on that date.

The admiral said that with the aderence by Brazil to the Antarctic Treaty in 1975, the country relinquished its territorial claims, at least until 1981, in the example of all the other nations adhering to the agreement. As to the Brazilian expedition the navy intends to take to the Antarctic, Adm Jose Gerardo Aratanha said that if everything goes well the mission could only depart during the next southern summer which means the end of 82 and the beginning of 83.

Research

The deputy chief of staff of the navy, Vice Adm Orlando Afonso, one of those responsible for existing staff studies on the subject, emphasized that although the Antarctic Treaty ends in 1991, and even considering that scientific research can only be done during actual work performed in the summer, Brazil can manage to present in-depth research to the international community around the middle of 86/87.

That research, whose organization will be left up to the Interministerial Commission on Ocean Resources, an agency which maintains ties with the scientific community and whose secretariat is in the Ministry of the Navy, will cover the fields of meteorology, marine biology and hydrography and would be carried out by all those interested in doing research on the region so that Brazil may have a voice and a vote in the final meetings of the Antarctic Treaty.

Adm Albano Aratanha said the government has already considered the Brazilian Institute for Antarctic Studies (IBEA) with headquarters in Rio as being of public utility, clearly demonstrating the importance given to the subject.

"Since the adherence of Brazil to the Antarctic Treaty in July 1975, the navy has been making efforts to prepare to command, coordinate and supervise the maritime part of the support to expeditions to the Antarctic and adjoining seas. Considering the very special nature of the region, the need is seen for the selection and training if the crew of a Brazilian ship which will undertake a scientific or support expedition to the Antarctic.

"In view of the short time available for Brazil to obtain the right to participate in the decision-making machinery contained in the Antarctic Treaty, the navy is determined that those preparatory actions must be initiated as soon as possible."

[Question] Has the purchase of the ship for taking the Brazilian expedition to the Antarctic been settled? What ship is it?

[Answer] No, the purchase of the ship for taking the Brazilian expedition to the Antarctic has not yet been settled. What can be said is that it is the intention of the minister of the navy to obtain a ship suitable for operations in southern ocean waters soon and that there are already several ships available from different sources which have been offered to Brazil. It can also be said that the various sectors of the navy involved are making their opinions known in their respective areas of responsibility for the selection of the ship and the final decision by the navy."

NETTO SEES 5-6 PERCENT DROP IN INDUSTRY, 10 PERCENT IN AGRICULTURE

[Text] Brasilia--Planning Minister Delfim Netto estimated yesterday that industrial production could fall 5 or 6 percent, but agriculture will grow "some 10 percent" and the service sector will also have a good performance, "so that Gross Domestic Product will increase this year."

The trade balance will show a surplus this year of almost $1 billion, according to Delfim, which means the current-account deficit (trade balance plus services) will be less than $11 billion. Delfim reported that Brazil has already raised the $15 billion of foreign-currency loans it needed to close the balance-of-payments gap and that about the same amount will be needed next year.

In the fight against inflation, said Delfim, the gains have been few but the annual rate is falling and may end 1981 at under 100 percent. It will continue to fall in 1982 "unless it is necessary to cover the holes with bogus money"; in other words, by expanding the money supply.

Delfim Netto promised a continued tight monetary policy next year, asserting that by December the money supply (currency in circulation plus demand deposits in banks) will have grown about 60 percent.

"If you look at all the indicators together, Brazil had a quite satisfactory performance in 1981 compared with the others. Had we not had the higher interest rates, reduction of the current-account deficit would have been absolutely spectacular," he added.

According to the planning minister, although "all the agricultural credit is now in circulation, nothing significant has happened" in terms of monetary pressure. "Everything worked well. The private sector went into agricultural credit, there was some whining at the beginning, but now everything is all right."

The planning minister predicted that the 1982 trade surplus will be between $2 billion and $3 billion and that the textile sector alone will export $1.4 billion. But he declined to estimate the value of 1982 exports, saying that there are several assumptions, one of which is for exports of $28 billion and imports of $25 billion.

Delfim believes exports this year will be somewhat less than $24.7 billion and imports should not surpass $24 billion, producing a surplus of about $700 million. Through October the surplus was $601 million but, as always happens, greater pressure from imports is expected in the last 2 months of the year.

JAPANESE RESISTANCE TO SCIENCE, TECHNOLOGY PACT AIRED

Sao Paulo O ESTADO DE SAO PAULO in Portuguese 8 Nov 81 p 29

[Text] Brasilia--The Brazilian Government does not yet have a plausible explanation for Japanese resistance to signing a bilateral agreement at the government level for scientific and technological cooperation, such as now exists with FRG, France, Canada, the United States and the Soviet Union as well as, among others, developing countries, particularly in Africa. With Japan there is only an agreement for technical cooperation signed in 1970, more in the nature of assistance, but the Brazilian Government insists upon the need for a broader agreement.

Brazil Wants to Increase Cooperation

Itamaraty [Brazilian Foreign Affairs Ministry], which has been trying to negotiate signature of this pact for over 7 years, has not yet given up its objective, although it always hears the same reply from the Japanese side: "We are studying it." On the Brazilian side there are only theories, one of the more prominent being that the Japanese Government prefers to let individual agreements be signed between research institutes and universities because in this way it will be in a position to choose and impose the kinds of cooperation most beneficial to it. This procedure would be forgone if an all-inclusive agreement were signed between the two nations.

Foreign Affairs Minister Saraiva Guerreiro has insisted upon the need to sign an agreement for scientific and technological cooperation. The subject is no longer discussed only in confidential meetings, but has become public kinwledge, even being advocated in speeches. In August, for example, when Japan's foreign affairs minister, Sunao Sonoda, visited Brazil, Saraiva Guerreiro asserted that "relations between Japan and Brazil include development, culture and also the technological field" and concluded:

"And we are not yet satisfied."

The press communique issued at the end of Minister Sunao Sonoda's visit revealed that the two ministers "acknowledged the importance of promoting greater scientific and technological cooperation and exchanged ideas about the measures to be adopted for that objective." The subject, however, remains dormant because Japanese authorities do not appear to be greatly interested in expediting negotiations.

The Japanese have argued that such an agreement is unnecessary because there is already an agreement for technical cooperation, but this agreement does not happen to meet Brazilian desires because it is essentially for assistance. The Brazilian Government wants to promote joint research in various areas, similar to what now occurs with other developed countries. Of the agreements for scientific and technological cooperation that have been signed by Brazil, those that have had the best results are the ones signed with FRG and France. The agreement with the United States has been at a virtual standstill since the Carter administration, while that signed with the Soviet Union has not yet gone into effect because it was signed only recently and must be approved by the National Congress.

Brazilian Government authorities explained that nothing prevents there being, besides the agreement for technical cooperation, another specifically for science and technology. The government did not accept the Japanese proposal of adding an amendment to the technical cooperation agreement because its assistance characteristics would remain. This is a word whose use is avoided, incidentally, in diplomatic circles, because it is not considered very congenial by those at whom it is directed.

Lack of an agreement at the government level for scientific and technological cooperation has not prevented Japanese research institutions from signing agreements with similar Brazilian organizations, which in practice has provided effective cooperation on an equal footing. There is an agreement of this type between the National Scientific and Technological Development Council (CNPq) and the Japan Society for Promotion of Science (JSPS). Two joint research projects are already being conducted jointly with the Industrial Technology Secretariat (STI) of the Ministry of Industry and Commerce, one regarding niobium and the other in the field of enzimes. The JSPS also has an agreement with the Brazilian Academy of Sciences. Among universities, there is an agreement for cooperation between Sao Paulo University and Taukuba University. There is an agreement between the Japanese Government and the state of Parana and one may be signed with the state of Sao Paulo.

According to Brazilian authorities, existence of such agreements is proof that Brazil is in a position to cooperate on an equal footing but also reveals, they explain, a maneuver by the Japanese Government to limit cooperation in one direction. Such Japanese behavior would be avoided if there were an agreement at the government level, as the Brazilian government would accept cooperation only when there was in fact a transfer of technology. It would also avoid a technology that is not really useful to Brazil or that is excessively sophisticated and incapable of absorption by Brazilian technicians.

In trying to account for the Japanese resistance to signing an agreement for scientific and technological cooperation, Brazilian authorities asserted that there may be internal problems in Japan. The agreement for technical cooperation is subordinated to the Japan International Cooperation Agency (JICA), which is an organ of the Foreign Affairs Ministry, the "Gaimusho." When speaking of science and technology, the subject is referred to the Ministry of Industry and Technology (ITI) and the Education Ministry. An agreement such as what Brazil wants would imply a certain loss of power by the Gaimusho.

The Brazilian Government, despite Japanese resistance, will continue to urge signing of the agreement, although it does not intend to impede or obstruct specific agreements between institutions of the two countries. Hopes for concrete results now rest in the next trip that Foreign Affairs Minister Saraiva Guerreiro makes to Japan, which should be some time next year.

WERNER SAYS COUNTRY FAR BEHIND BIG POWERS IN ARMS SALES

Sao Paulo O ESTADO DE SAO PAULO in Portuguese 6 Nov 81 p 6

[Text] Sao Jose dos Campos--Gen Alacyr Frederico Werner, armed forces chief of staff, said in Sao Jose dos Campos yesterday that "Brazil will have a hard struggle to catch up to the big powers in production and sale of armament." The statement was made shortly before Werner flew back to Brasilia after a 2-day visit to facilities of the CTA [Aerospace Technology Center] and EMBRAER [Brazilian Aeronautics Company], where he was accompanied by members of the EMFA [Armed Forces General Staff] and the Brazilian Space Activities Commission (COBAE), an agency affiliated with the General Staff and responsible for the nation's space policy.

In referring to Brazil's current position as one of the world's major exporters of armaments, Gen Alacyr Werner said he views the fact "with much satisfaction." According to him, every time Brazil exports any manufactured product, even if it is war materiel, "it generates foreign exchange for the nation, contributing to the well-being of the Brazilian people." In regard to the constant pressures of industrialized countries against the Brazilian presence in this sector, the general asserted that "every time we develop our own technology, manufacturing a reliable product with international acceptance, the more developed nations feel threatened and this is a natural reaction."

During their 2-day stay in Sao Jose dos Campos, the members of the EMFA and COBAE visited the EMBRAER industrial facilities day before yesterday in the morning, being briefed on the most recent projects developed by the company, such as the EMB-120 (Brasilia) and EMB-312 (Tucano). About the agreement with Italy for making the AM-X military jet fighter aircraft, General Werner pointed out that it will be another "giant step" for Brazil in pursuit of its own technology for the sector: "The AM-X project will make it unnecessary for Brazil to buy the F-5 or Mirage, although these are a better type of aircraft."

General Werner and his party took off in an FAB [Brazilian Air Force] jet at 1530 hours. Sources connected with the aircraft industry also revealed that one of the primary reasons for the EMFA delegation's visit to Sao Jose dos Campos was discussion of the proposal for standardizing an industrial program to meet the growing needs for producing war materiel in the nation, since, as the Brazilian Government itself acknowledges, it is a sector of great importance for the nation's economy.

Yesterday morning, closing out the schedule of visits, General Werner and his party were in the National Space Research Institute [INPE], an agency connected with the CNPq [National Scientific and Technological Development Council]. There they were briefed on the two major programs being developed by the INPE, the latest space technology applied to the sectors of remote sensoring and weather satellites. The armed forces chief of staff stressed the importance of these projects, commenting that "the work of the scientists and technicians at the INPE permits us to have more confidence in this country."

The delegation then visited several technological research and development departments connected with the CTA. In the Space Activities Institute (IAE) the members of the EMFA and the COBAE were told about the timetable and the current status of the Sonda project developed by the IAE and which is now in flight-control operational testing. They were also shown the first prototype of the VLS--Satellite Launching Vehicle--which is to carry the Brazilian satellite to be launched in 1988 in a geostationary orbit of 600 kilometers.

But Exports Increase

Brasilia--Armaments are now a major Brazilian export, military sources connected with ordnance policy admitted yesterday, although they thought it very difficult to make predictions about the value of exports this year and the next 4 years, which according to TIME and NEWSWEEK may reach $1.5 billion and $5 billion respectively. They explained that the arms market has many variables, the major one of these being the political factor: it is not enough simply for the buyer or prospect to have money and the supplier or exporter to have the goods available. It is, moreover, a market strongly influenced by go-betweens.

According to these sources, Brazil has entered the arms market seriously as a type of trade like any other, without abandoning its character as a peaceful nation. Its problem is to obtain funds to settle the trade balance and the balance of payments. Brazilian exports are made CIF (cost, insurance and freight), which serves as a guarantee for clients and to avoid diversion of armaments.

Ministerial Decrees

Army Minister Gen Walter Pires signed a ministerial decree approving regulations for the Military Engineering Institute [IME], agency of the Army Technological Center responsible for higher military scientific-technological education and scientific and technological research.

The IME is responsible for conducting basic and applied research of a scientific-technological nature and, ultimately, for promoting experimental development and training army personnel for scientific and technological activities through undergraduate courses and graduate programs in various fields of engineering within IME itself. The ministerial decree referring to new regulations for the PMD [translation unknown] was published in the federal DIARIO OFICIAL yesterday.

Army Minister Walter Pires, also in response to a proposal by the Army General Staff, signed a ministerial decree approving the regulations for the Land Force Accounting Directorate. In another ministerial decree, Army Minister Walter Pires approved the general instructions for using real property assigned to the Army Ministry (Army Real Estate Administration).

PROBLEMS FACING FIGUEIREDO ON RETURN; CHAVES STRENGTHENED

[Text] Brasilia--President Joao Figueiredo resumes his duties Thursday, 8 weeks after his 18 September heart attack. He will be faced immediately with serious administrative and political problems, the most serious of which--and which seems nearly impossible to solve--is the task of keeping the PDS [Social Democratic Party] united until the 1982 elections. Figueiredo was hoping to use multicandidate slates in gubernatorial elections to reconcile the ambitions of several candidates in each state, but with rejection of this proposal by the National Congress he will, in many cases, have to intervene personally to avoid proven votegetters being prevented from running for governor because some governors insist upon naming their own successors. Among administrative matters, he continues to struggle with the chronic deficit in the Social Security system, which he hoped to end by cutting expenses (especially for pensioners), another intention blocked by Congress.

Although, on the one hand, Figueiredo saw two of his proposals defeated within just 1 week by Congress, on the other hand he gained, through his temporary absence from the government, an important partner who will now begin to act more closely with him in administrative and, especially, political matters. Vice President Aureliano Chaves, due to his administrative and political ability and the loyalty and discretion with which he acted during the time he functioned as president, strengthened not only his friendship but also the personal confidence of President Joao Figueiredo and beginning Friday will become one of the most important spokesmen for Planalto Palace, expanding his range of activity beyond the National Energy Commission, the only sector in which he had been given a green light to work until now.

Aureliano Chaves will probably receive from President Figueiredo the assignment of arranging or guiding the nominations for governor, in agreement with the present governors, but trying to find names with proven popular support, a mission somewhat similar to that performed by the late Senator Petronio Portella in choosing the appointed governors in 1978. Weighing decisively in his being chosen for this assignment was his poised manner when the National Congress rejected the bill for multicandidate slates and the Social Security bill requested by the president, an unprecedented occurrence in recent years, as even members of the PDS contributed to defeating the president's measures, voting against their approval.

Aureliano's discreet behavior, together with his political acumen, prevented the event from being interpreted as a defeat for the executive branch, with its resulting weakening, causing trouble for the government itself. The solution he found for the French priests Francisco Gouriou and Aristides Camio, transferring to the courts the decision about their responsibility for inciting squatters, served to demonstrate his great skill in dealing with delicate matters, preventing possible outbreaks of tension with the progressive clergy.

As a result, President Figueiredo has expressed to visitors at his residence, Granja do Torto, complete satisfaction about the way the nation's problems are being handled and is in excellent mental as well as physical condition to resume national leadership. This is not to say that he has been completely idle since returning from the United States, where an operation on his heart was not necessary. He has since then been studying solutions for the nation's major problems and when he returns to Planalto Palace Thursday will begin applying these solutions.

The most urgent question to be faced is the effort to win next year's elections, a goal to which he gives priority because it would represent popular support for his administration. In pursuing this objective Figueiredo may change ideas or even names that no longer fit in with his strategy. "The president wants to adapt the administration and its personnel to the new rules of the game that we will have to follow since rejection of multicandidate slates. Although in some places the PDS situation became worse, in others it improved," revealed Bahia Governor Antonio Carlos Magalhaes upon leaving Granja do Torto last Monday.

This "adaptation," according to a source who frequently speaks for the president, does not include the possibility of resubmitting to Congress the bill extending multicandidate slates to gubernatorial elections, an episode the government considers closed. Nor does it include drastic changes in election rules, which should remain as they are, or withdrawal of either the bill dealing with the ineligibility law or the bill reducing the residency requirement from 2 years to 1. The order given by President Figueiredo to the three governors who have visited him so far--Paulo Maluf of São Paulo, Antonio Carlos Magalhaes of Bahia and Francelino Pereira of Minas Gerais--is that the time has come to work with what is available and face the elections trusting that the Brazilian electorate, through direct vote and secret ballot, is sufficiently discerning to recognize what its government has accomplished or, at least, the effort it has made to solve major national problems such as inflation and the balance of payments.

Figueiredo has acknowledged in conversation that, if the PDS is to have a majority in state elections, much remains to be done and inflation must fall further. It should not come as a surprise, then, that the president will announce at the beginning of next year two or three programs of great social impact: in the area of mass transportation, which has been creating increased tension in large urban centers; food supplies, to benefit especially the working class; directing public funds toward preference for lowest-income groups.

"The president was not simply resting during this time of his illness," revealed Governor Antonio Carlos after being at Granja do Torto. "These problems were constantly on his mind. He thought about them a great deal and intends to do many things in 1982 that should benefit the PDS."

Aureliano to Emerge Strengthened

Brasilia--After 2 months as acting head of the government, Vice President Aureliano Chaves should emerge stronger in his position as assistant to President Figueiredo, having strengthened the friendship and trust that bind them, and as a result will play a larger role in government plans. There was a relaxed atmosphere in Planalto Palace during this period and an undeniable effort to weaken Aureliano's interim government receded just as did the first indications of divided power when Figueiredo was convalescing in Gavea Pequena and the ministers were visiting him daily.

Advisers of Figueiredo and Aureliano agree that the 2 months of interim government were beneficial for the nation and from now on the vice president will be used more frequently to substitute for the actual president in traveling, political negotiations and especially in next year's election campaign because, despite his recovery, Figueiredo's advisers intend to spare him major efforts such as travel. One week without any cabinet meeting, appointments with two representatives of the Popular Party, cordiality with the press and a moderate solution for the problem of the French priests were some of the surprises Aureliano had in store.

In the administrative sector, he adopted substantial measures such as reducing the prescription period, signed the banking-profits tax bill and decided on reactivating the civil construction sector to create jobs and reduce the social effects of the economic crisis. He also promised businessmen to see if the government could pay off part of the state-enterprise debts to the private sector by December. Meanwhile, he met with several municipal mayors, stressing the shortage of government funds to satisfy their demands, due mainly to heavy investments in Itaipu, subway systems, Tucurui, PROALCOOL [National Alcohol Program] and the nuclear program. Few countries would undertake these initiatives simultaneously with Brazil's level of income, he admitted.

The rigid work schedule in Planalto Palace was broken by Aureliano. He went to his office on Friday and left there by noon or 1900 hours, and began to have flexible hours for appointments, something which seldom happened in the Geisel and Figueiredo periods, a reflection of military discipline. All that politicians had to do was telephone to make an appointment. Sao Paulo PMDB [Brazilian Democratic Mobilization Party] Deputy Roberto Cardoso Alves even asked to be included in the presidential party visiting Aparecida do Norte. The acting president had no objection, but the congressman eventually changed his mind about going. Without abdicating his authority but avoiding a show of power he did not really have, Aureliano spoke frankly with politicians who came to see him, reminding them that he opposed multicandidate slates but was bowing to the will of President Figueiredo, to the point of dissuading, through personal telephone calls, some PDS congressmen who would have voted against the bill. Defeat of the multicandidate slate and the compromise on Social Security reform were absorbed normally and the acting president stressed that the government was not defeated but rather the PDS, whose responsibility it was to support the proposals.

The principal support of Aureliano Chaves during this time, except for his own staff, was Civil Household Chief Leitao de Abreu, who filled in for Gen Danilo Venturini while he and SNI [National Intelligence Service] Chief Gen Otavio Medeiros were in Rio de Janeiro and the United States. The daily 9 o'clock meeting for the government's decision-making group was held without the customary ceremony since--aside from the fact that the ministers were not there--Aureliano indicated that he did not consider it all that important. Delfim Netto, who for the first time was detained in Brasilia for a weekend on presidential business, later spent 2 weeks in Europe, but the acting president only gradually took over his duties. Just as he did not immediately take over the presidency, but waited 5 days after Figueiredo's heart attack, staying home in Minas Gerais while awaiting results of the medical tests that would indicate how long the president would be away.

Aureliano will substitute for Figueiredo in various official ceremonies and travels, such as the graduation services at the military academies this month. Political negotiations with certain sectors whose relations with the government are not smooth, such as the church, may now be entrusted to Aureliano, a fact admitted by members of both staffs. Aureliano's participation will increase with the election campaign and the need for the PDS to carry out activities in various parts of the country at the same time. A subject the vice president tries to avoid, but which was acknowledged by governors such as Augusto Franco of Sergipe, is that Aureliano's performance makes him the leading candidate to succeed Figueiredo, "with political and military support," as Deputy Herbert Levy said.

Aureliano's staff regard the vice president's greatest success to be his ability to put loyalty to Figueiredo above his own personal convictions, as happened in the case of multicandidate slates, and determination to inform him about significant political decisions, as in the case of the French priests. But it is equally true that during the first days of the interim period some sectors of the palace guard ignored the vice president while stressing his position as acting president. Aureliano, for his part, was the first to call attention to this fact, stressing that he hoped his period in office would be as short as possible.

Less than 20 congressmen attended the ceremony in which Aureliano assumed the presidency. Few governors visited him during the period and at times the palace schedule consisted of appointments with less-important entities. The palace press secretary fell silent and Aureliano, through a member of his own staff, told reporters he wanted to visit with them in the Press Room, a desire that will be fulfilled after tomorrow. The vice president often mentions his high regard for the press and was annoyed when his aide Sapha removed pictures of President Figueiredo from the Press Room.

During recent days, after some appointments with politicians, Aureliano Chaves expressed an interest in talking with them further "after the 12th," when Figueiredo will return, showing a desire to maintain the level of contact.

TRADE BALANCE THROUGH OCTOBER SHOWS $601 MILLION SURPLUS

[Text] Brasilia--Brazil's trade balance showed a $601 million surplus for the first 10 months of this year and could surpass the goal of $1 billion for the entire year, it was announced yesterday by Finance Minister Ernane Galveas and the ministry's secretary general, Carlos Viacava, as they proudly reported results for the month of October. From January through October last year the trade balance showed a deficit of $2.962 billion.

October had a trade surplus of $392 million, with exports setting another all-time monthly record at $2.104 billion. Imports for the month were held to $1.712 billion, a reduction of 14 percent from the $1.994 billion imported in October last year, when the trade deficit was $86 million.

Since May the trade account has been showing consecutive monthly surpluses. For the latest 12 months, the surplus is $737 million, after having registered a deficit of $4.229 billion for the 12 months ending April 1980.

In the finance minister's view, these figures show that "there are glad tidings in store" and lead him to continue believing the trade surplus will reach $3 billion next year. "This result," said Galveas, "shows we are well along the road toward the goal we set. Furthermore, it looks like we have overcome a serious problem in the balance of payments, which was the trade deficit. The figures show we have regained our position and managed to reverse the trend in a little more than 1 year." And he added: "We are sailing on smooth seas and in sight of dry land."

From January through October Brazil sold merchandise abroad that yielded $19.107 billion, a 17.2 percent increase over the $16.308 billion sold during the first 10 months of 1980. If coffee sales--which were 36.5 percent less during the January-October period this year than last--were excluded from the total, the nation would have increased its exports 26.2 percent. Coffee sales totaled $1.486 billion, compared with $2.340 billion from January through October last year. In October, coffee revenues were $148 million, 21.3 percent less than the $188 million sold in the same month last year.

Foreign sales of other commodities and manufactured goods totaled $17.621 billion during this year's first 10 months, compared with only $13.968 billion from January through October last year. Viacava predicted that this year's coffee sales will be between $1.8 billion and $1.9 billion. This result will be possible because coffee prices are recovering and sales in November and December "are making a less negative contribution to the trade balance." The finance ministry secretary general expects that next year "coffee will be a big help to the trade balance."

Imports

The 4 percent reduction in the nation's total January-through-October imports from those of the same 10 months of 1980 is due essentially to four factors, according to Viacava: liquidation of inventories as a result of continued high interest rates in the international as well as the domestic market; cooling-off of the economy; a more realistic exchange rate; and no imports of agricultural products during the second half of this year. From January through October imports cost the country $18.506 billion, compared with $19.270 billion spent in the first 10 months of last year.

Although showing an increase of 22.8 percent last month over October 1980, oil imports continued this year's pattern of about $800 million per month. They were $856 million in October, compared with $697 million in the same month last year. So far this year, oil imports totaled $8.783 billion, compared with $7.954 billion in the same 1980 period, an increase of 10.4 percent. Expenditures for importing other goods continued to fall. The country spent, for example, 13.9 percent less for wheat than in October [as published; January through October? See table] 1980, while the total of other products was reduced 14.1 percent.

Despite the large reduction, the Finance Ministry secretary general said "no special measure is being adopted to control imports." He does not expect monthly amounts to change greatly in November and December and is projecting imports of $1.8 billion per month.

PENNA STATES FOREIGN DEBT MUST NOT GROW MORE THAN GDP

Rio de Janeiro O GLOBO in Portuguese 8 Nov 81 p 51

[Interview with Camilo Penna, minister of industry and commerce: "Foreign Debt Must Not Grow More Than PIB [Gross Domestic Product]"; date, place and name of interviewer not given]

[Text] "The Figueiredo government decided that Brazil's foreign debt must not increase more than the Gross Domestic Product (PIB)," asserted Industry and Commerce Minister Camilo Penna in a exclusive interview with O GLOBO.

From now on, Camilo Penna explained, all borrowing will be used for interest payment and debt retirement, estimated at $18 billion annually over the next few years.

The cabinet minister expects a drop in industrial production and Gross Domestic Product this year. But he argues that this does not constitute a recession, if one takes the 1980-81 period into account.

According to Camilo Penna, the planned transition, with social, sectoral and regional deconcentration, was disrupted by the unforeseen crises of higher petroleum prices and higher international interest rates. This transition, he explained, was done at a very rapid pace, which must now be slowed down.

Despite the enormous economic difficulties, the minister of industry and commerce asserts that political liberalization will move forward with the elections to be held next year.

O GLOBO: What are the prospects for Brazilian industry, which will have to cope with 2 more years of recession, according to what some cabinet ministers are predicting? There is much idle industrial capacity, unemployment is increasing and there seems to be no measure to control the social problem this causes. How does the government view this situation?

Camilo Penna: We must think of the short, medium and long run. We cannot look only at the current situation. At the beginning of the Figueiredo government, industry represented 38 percent of Gross Domestic Product (PIB) and agriculture 12 percent.

At the time there was an obvious imbalance in the nation: socially, regionally and sectorally. And the new administration was keenly aware of this situation. President Figueiredo's view was that this structural imbalance had led to excessive concentration in the large metropolitan centers and the country was headed for disruption.

Industrial workers, crowded into big cities, were having terrible problems with the cost of living or their standard of living, bearing in mind their distance from the sources of food production. In short, there was a shortage of food for the industrial worker.

President Figueiredo decided quite firmly that he would strive for social, sectoral and regional deconcentration in future incremental growth, without disturbing existing distribution. We did not intend to take anything away from anyone to give it to another. President Figueiredo also wanted political decentralization, which implied less intervention but more coordination by the government and the return of initiative to free enterprise.

The program was significant from the viewpoint of quality rather than quantity. Until then the Brazilian Government had been more concerned with quantity. During previous periods, very much concerned with assuring Brazil its rightful place in the world--we had one of the largest territories, one of the world's largest populations--the government decided to generate a PIB consistent with these dimensions.

And it succeeded in this. At the outset of the Figueiredo government Brazil had the world's eighth largest PIB and also its eighth or ninth highest industrial output. From that point on, however, this quantity would demand not only attention to quantitative aspects but also to the qualitative aspects of regional, sectoral and social deconcentration. It was to be a planned transition, in keeping with Brazilian reality.

But, 2-1/2 years later, this planned transition is being confused with recession.

O GLOBO: Every industrial sector except manufacture of equipment for the PROALCOOL [National Alcohol Program] is declining. Wasn't this too abrupt a transition?

Camilo Penna: It must be recalled that the policies of the Figueiredo government remain in force and are the bible of the cabinet ministers.

The new government, however, was not aware of some existing difficulties and did not foresee some new ones that arose along the way. At the beginning of the Figueiredo government, it was not known that the second petroleum crisis was already being planned.

Nor had the impact of high international interest rates been foreseen during the period previous to the Figueiredo government. The previous government had decided to reduce the impact from higher oil prices by borrowing, with interest estimated at 10 percent annually, in dollars.

Until then Brazilian society had followed an import model, not an export model as is frequently thought. But in 1981 we are turning to the export model. Now Brazil will really become an exporter, which will have enormous consequences on national life.

Neither did the Figueiredo government fully realize the enormity of ongoing investments in large-scale units with inflexible timetables. They were enormous programs which, in their entirety, plus the necessary infrastructure investments, would represent for the years from 1979 on investments greater than the national product.

Brazil had entered the Club of Ten (richest countries), had been viewed within the standards of that club, but it was forgotten that in the club it was last in income per capita and first in population growth.

Population growth had reached 3 million persons a year, the largest in the Club of Ten. The dilemma the Figueiredo government faced was: to consume today or to construct for tomorrow. Within the situation that has been described, it was not possible to finish the construction in progress and maintain the consumption standards of Brazilian society.

The president, who came from the SNI (National Intelligence Service), was greatly concerned about what he called growing tensions: social, regional and sectoral. It was necessary to restrain the growth of these tensions. He then decided to establish top priority for agriculture, for economic deconcentration. He decided to approve the new Wage Law.

We had the two most powerful instruments in Brazilian history for reducing regional and social tensions.

Meanwhile, however, we had a reversal on the international scene, with a loss of exchange power in world markets, an increased spread (bankers' risk margin on loans) for Brazil and greater trade protection in other countries. This change brought us a very powerful element in limiting domestic activity, which was the external accounts.

We have reached a point where we have to generate $15 billion to $16 billion this year and $18 billion next year in the trade balance just for payment of interest and retirement of debt.

That led to the government decision that from now on we will not depend upon foreign loans or savings through a trade deficit. Brazilian society may no longer use a trade deficit to finance its consumption or investment. Even so, we must generate $18 billion annually over the next few years for payment of debt service.

With such funds, $8 billion or $9 billion is repaid, the debt grows in the same proportion, without bringing in any foreign merchandise. A debt growing $8 billion over $50 billion is an increase of 15 percent annually, which is greater than the growth of the PIB.

President Figueiredo decided that the debt must not grow more rapidly than the PIB [as a source?] for investment or saving, as this would leave Brazil without credibility in international negotiations.

Working with balanced trade or with a trade surplus is a political decision to limit growth of the debt at least to percentages equal to the PIB. Besides being political, the decision is necessary, since due to high indebtedness and deterioration of economic indicators we are paying the highest spreads in the world, on top of very high interest rates.

That policy led to the current situation which is mistaken for recession. The pace of the transition was greatly speeded up, which, in my personal opinion, disrupted the productive process more than was planned.

O GLOBO: To all indications, the Brazilian people have not been informed about these intentions and these plans. Where is the nation's industrial sector headed?

Camilo Penna: President Figueiredo's guidelines were published and widely discussed and are being followed to the letter, being revised only in the light of new facts and emerging realities. The planned transition was disrupted by unforeseen events, some of them unforeseeable.

Due to these events, perhaps to some shortcomings of perspective or of information, the pace of the transition is greater than planned. It would thus be desirable to slow down the pace of this transition so as not to create huge imbalances of supply and demand in existing systems that should be used to the maximum of their potential.

It is necessary to stress that Brazil has now begun paying off its debt. For that reason, restrictions will continue in 1982, without any doubt.

But let no one think that industry can stop growing, especially in view of the large contribution it will have to make toward exports.

The Wage Law was designed and studied with the expectation of a 45 percent annual inflation rate. Its objective was redistribution of income in 5 years. But with inflation continuing higher than 100 percent this process is taking place in only 2 years. The Wage Law, to a great extent, created inflationary pressures.

This change has consequences for the profile of the consumer market. Industries that produce goods for the upper and middle classes became idle and those producing for [consumers] at the base of the [income] pyramid are overloaded due to excess demand.

Brazil has used imported technology intensively and extensively, much of it foreign and hence unrelated to our conditions. It is technology intended for raw materials we do not have and for consumption patterns or income-distribution profiles that are not ours.

Due to using technology from everywhere, we have an extremely varied collection of industrial norms and standards, making it difficult for business firms to interchange components, thus raising the cost of production.

From now on, Brazilian industry will have to work for two markets that require appropriate products and prices: the base of the domestic income pyramid and exports.

Under existing circumstances, both markets will require changes. Exporting is highly competitive and will have to grow without subsidies. The base of the pyramid will have more money to spend--due to the Wage Law--but it will mean nothing if industry is unable to increase the supply of suitable goods.

O GLOBO: Wouldn't the situation you have been describing be considered a picture of recession?

Camilo Penna: Growth of Brazilian industry this year will be less than zero and Gross Domestic Product (PIB) may be about zero to 2 percent.

But no nation can be measured by the result of 1 year alone. Any economic analysis works with 3-year moving averages. If we take the Brazilian case, on a 2-year average, with 8 percent in 1980 and zero this year we have 4 percent, which is a good performance anywhere in the world.

This phenomenon is also occurring because industry in the second half of last year worked very hard to build up inventories for itself and for the market. A large part of last year's growth was thus due to accumulation of inventories that were consumed in 1981.

But here we must make a significant reservation: few people are aware that the PIB is not the sum of benefits, but rather the sum of costs. We must dethrone the PIB [as a measure] of national welfare.

It should be said further that a large part of the reduction in PIB this year was due to the increase of productivity in production and the decrease of waste in consumption, which is really a victory for Brazilian society.

O GLOBO: With all these economic problems, will there be elections in 1982?

Camilo Penna: When President Figueiredo decided to make the transition, he introduced political decentralization, carrying out political liberalization, which is an absolute reality in Brazilian life, and which many persons do not believe.

It was surprising to see the reaction to the transfer of the presidency of the republic to the vice president as a result of the president's illness. And it was hailed as something astonishing, as if no one really believed in political liberalization and in this government's respect for the laws of the land.

The very fact that the present government is carrying out political liberalization and giving the right to vote should be a reason for supporting this government and a reason for voting for the government [party]. There is no doubt that we will have elections in 1982. Let no one doubt that.

RIGHTS TO SHARE OF ANTARCTIC EXPLAINED BY MINISTER

Rio de Janeiro JORNAL DO BRASIL in Portuguese 5 Nov 81 p 14

[Text] Brasilia—Brazil's share of the Antarctic is the Weddell region narrowing to an apex at the South Pole. The Weddell Region has a potential of petroleum estimated at 50 billion barrels. This right would be conferred on Brazil if there were to be acceptance of the Canadian doctrine of the projection of the maritime coastline toward the polar region.

The statement was made by Minister Clovis Ramalhete of the Federal Supreme Court in his status as an expert in international law with studies on the Antarctic problem, including talks in the Armed Forces Staff schools on the subject of a future Brazilian Navy expedition to that continent.

There Is Still Time

For Minister Clovis Ramalhete Brazil did not arrive late in the Antarctic.

"First," he said, "because while it is true that it was unfairly excluded from the Washington meeting from which emerged the Antarctic Treaty, Itamaraty made a protest with respect to its complete rights in time. Next, because Brazil, having already accepted the treaty, is going to make a scientific expedition to the Antarctic within the period which legitimatizes its participation in future meetings of member states.

"Finally," he added, "because I do not find anything to support the legitimacy of the jurisdiction of any of the states which preceded Brazil in making a physical landing of their nationals in any area they discovered. Norway lost Greenland to Denmark as a result of a decision by the Arbitration Court. The argument of possession, however, without the peaceful and general recognition by the other member states does not produce a sovereign title of jurisdiction pursuant to decisions by international courts and the statements of world legal authorities.

"Brazil is arriving in time. It has legitimate interests there. And while it is going to carry out scientific exploration, it will be also because it is from this region of Weddell that violent weather changes come to us, which even affect international prices such as those of coffee and soybeans."

Shares

In the opinion of Minister Clovis Ramalhete, the Antarctic should either be divided up among states by sectors or it should be internationalized.

"It has wealth in coal, petroleum and protein-rich algae. Such wealth must be considered a common inheritance of humanity for the benefit of backward or underdeveloped countries by means of suitable agencies of a supranational type with special rights for bordering states. Either that or it should be entrusted to the sovereignty of bordering states such as Brazil.

In this last hypothesis, Minister Clovis Ramalhete believes that the Canadian doctrine of dividing by sectors will deliver the Antarctic to the countries which project their maritime coasts toward it, benefitting Brazil.

"It can be seen," he concluded, "that the decision by our navy to go to the Antarctic is in response to important Brazilian interests. It shows that its chiefs have their eyes on tomorrow."

CUBANS DENIED VISAS; DEPUTY ADVOCATES DIPLOMATIC RELATIONS

Cubans Protest Visa Refusal

Sao Paulo O ESTADO DE SAO PAULO in Portuguese 5 Nov 81 p 7

[Text] Through the Latin American Energy Development Organization [OLADE], of which it is also a member, the Cuban Government made "its most vigorous protest" to the Government of Brazil because of the decision of Itamaraty to disapprove the entry of two delegates of that country, who were to participate together with members of other nations of the continent in a meeting promoted by the organization in Curitiba and held from 19 to 23 October. Minister of Mines and Energy Cesar Cals, who did not like the measure, according to sources linked to the energy sector and the diplomatic area, was present at the gathering.

The same sources also asserted that the Cuban delegation, which will also be present at the meeting of ministers of mines and energy of Latin America to be held in the Dominican Republic from 11 to 13 November, will make another protest, this time to Minister Cesar Cals, arguing that the ban "was an unjustified and discriminatory action in violation of the principles of international practice." In the document sent to Brazil, Cuban Minister Eugenio Latour requests that the OLADE "take the necessary actions to learn the reasons for the violation," adding that it has circulated its protest throughout all the member countries of the organization.

The Protest

With the support of COPEL [Parana Electric Company] and the Ministry of Mines and Energy, the 2nd Latin American Bioenergy Seminar was held in the capital of Parana from 19 to 23 October. It was attended by delegations from the continent designated by OLADE. The management of COPEL had already prepared badges for all the participants, including those of Cuba. Shortly before the meeting began, no one could explain the reasons for the absence of the delegation from that country. It caused surprise among the Latin American delegates, including those belonging to anticommunist governments of Latin America.

Meanwhile, to the great surprise of Itamaraty itself, the executive secretary of OLADE, Gustavo Rodriguez Elizarras, sent a telex a few days ago from the headquarters of the organization in Ecuador, reproducing the protest by the Cubans.

In it there are statements that delegates Enrique Sanchez Hernandez and Gilberto Hidalgo Gato Esquerre were authorized to enter Brazil after receiving a telex message from COPEL President Pedro Ludovido dated 13 October. According to that message, the two could receive their visas at the Brazilian embassy in Mexico.

Still according to the same sources, both went there but were surprised by the news provided by Brazilian diplomats that there were no instructions for allowing them to enter the country. Indignant, they returned to Havana. Subsequently it was learned through the document sent to the government through OLADE a few days ago, that "actually, at first, the visas had been authorized, it being subsequently decided to revoke them." The telex message says verbatim that "the action concerns us and surprises us, precisely because it comes from Brazil, who is so pragmatic in its actions in the sphere of international relations."

The Cubans say that their government had already communicated to the OLADE General Secretariat "31 days prior to the beginning of the Curitiba Conference" its intentions of sending representatives "based on the right every member state has of participating in events sponsored by OLADE." The document also says that "it is the duty of every nation hosting such meetings not to prevent or refuse attendance to the representatives of member states."

The same sources believe that the ban on the entry of the Cuban delegates could prejudice the negotiations Minister of Mines and Energy Cesar Cals is effecting with Latin American nations aimed at creating a trilateral company for petroleum prospecting in any part of the continent.

Deputy Advocates Cuban Relations

Brasilia CORREIO BRAZILIENSE in Portuguese 23 Oct 81 p 10

[Text] The reestablishment of diplomatic relations between Brazil and Cuba was advocated by Deputy Marcelo Cerqueira (PMDB-RJ) [Brazilian Democratic Movement Party-Rio de Janeiro], who was a member of the Brazilian mission to the interparliamentary conference held last month in Havana. The proposal by the deputy was made during a joint session of the Senate Education and Health Committees for analyzing the work of the Brazilian delegation in Cuba.

For Deputy Marcelo Cerqueira the break of relations with Cuba is within the framework of an already bygone diplomatic picture left behind when Itamaraty put automatic alinement with the United States to one side. In view of that, the legislator believes that as a result of his participation in the conference, the delegation should recommend the reopening of relations with Havana to the Executive Branch.

Also participating in that joint session were Senators Jaison Barreto, president of the (PMDB-SC) [Brazilian Democratic Party-Santa Catarina], Joao Calmon (PDS-ES) [Social Democratic Party-Espirito Santo], Murilo Badara (PDS-MG) [PDS-Minas Gerais], Almir Pinto (PDS-CE) [PDS-Ceara] Adalberto Sena (PMDB-AC) [PMDB-Acre]; and Deputies Rosa Flores (PMDB-SP) [PMDB-Sao Paulo], Marcelo Cerqueira (PMDB-RJ) [PMDB-Rio de Janeiro], MacDowell Leite de Castro (PP-RJ) [Popular Party-RJ] and Carlos Santana (PP-BA) [Popular Party-Bahia].

Deputy Carlos Santana indicated the lack of individual freedoms and freedom of the press in Cuba and recalled the existence of what he considered an exaggerated personality cult around Fidel Castro. However, he also noted that he considered the positive results of the Cuban Government, particularly in the social field.

Santana pointed out the low infant mortality rate of 22.3 per 1,000 saying that it means that "only congenital problems remain to be controlled." The most developed countries, said Santana, have a rate of 17 per 1,000. Deputy Rosa Flores showed that Cuba is training more doctors than it will need. Flores quoted Fidel Castro, who explained that the surplus is sent to other Socialist countries. A Cuban doctor costs Angola only $300 per month, for example, while a doctor from another country, who would go to Angola on his own, would cost seven times more. On the subject, Santana said that the doctors trained in Cuba, like other students who complete advanced studies, are sent to places selected by the government.

ANNUAL GOLD PRODUCTION EXCEEDED 12 TONS BY 30 SEPTEMBER

Rio de Janeiro JORNAL DO BRASIL in Portuguese 2 Nov 81 p 13

[Text] Brasilia—The Central Bank reported that through September it had acquired nearly 12 tons and 375 kilos of gold on the domestic market, of which 7 tons and 668 kilos were purchased from the prospectors of Serra Pelada. Prospectors of the Itaituba region in Medio Tapajos, contributed one ton and 915 kilos. Exports of gold are forbidden by the National Monetary Council.

The so-called "gold for the good of Brazil," donated by the Brazilian population after the 1964 Revolution, according to the Central Bank, was added to the national reserves. The volume of gold collected reached 620 kilos, 130 grams and 896 milligrams. Already melted, it will be refined by the government mint and transferred to the guardianship of the Central Bank.

Gold Policy

For experts of the Central Bank, the government policy adopted for the national gold sector in the last two years, in addition to providing the addition of new amounts to the national reserve, has generated an improvement in the living conditions and remuneration of the prospectors, revitalizing several producing areas.

Annual average Brazilian gold production recorded in the period from 1968 to 1979 was five tons 950 kilos, rising to 13 tons 800 kilos last year. This increase has led mining companies to invest more in gold prospecting and processing in the country.

The following are participating in Project Gold: the Central Bank, as the buyer and depository of the national reserves; the Federal Savings Bank and Vale Doce Geologia (DOCEGEO). They intervene in the sale of gold at the source and the Government Mint is responsible for refining all gold acquired. The Federal Revenue Service maintains a strict surveillance to prevent the smuggling of gold, particularly near the producing regions.

The Federal Savings Bank [CFE], pursuant to an interministerial regulation—Ministries of Finance, Planning and Mines and Energy—dated 1980, has the exclusive right to purchase all the gold produced in the prospector areas, particularly in the Amazon Region and the Center-West, and then passes the gold on to the Central Bank.

Purchasing Process

Experts of the Central Bank explained that the gold purchasing process adopted at first resulted in high costs, since the resources of the agencies involved were used. The DOCEGEO purchased the gold directly from the prospector, paying the equivalent of 72 percent of the daily London gold price fix per troy ounce (31.33 grams).

That gold, after analysis, was resold to the CFE at the rate of 80 to 90 percent of the daily price fix. The CFE received a sum equal to .4 percent of the total as administrative expenses when it transferred that gold to the Central Bank. In that way the final cost of unrefined gold varied for the Central Bank between 80.4 and 90.04 percent of the price of gold on the London international market.

The purchasing structure today, wherein the government does not act as a buyer, is the following: The Central Bank opens a rotating line of credit to the CEF in terms of the volume of gold the latter purchases. That credit covers three or four days outlays to prevent interruption in purchase activities.

Once it has this credit, the CEF transfers money to its agencies in the prospecting regions and maintains a line of information on their daily activities. In case DOCEGEO is a buyer, the CEF maintains a current account in its name in the local agency where withdrawals made for buying gold are immediately covered.

The CEF, as well as DOCEGEO, pay the prospector the equivalent of 90 percent of the prices set by the London market, allowing a variation of 5 percent.

Gold Purchases

The National Monetary Council authorized the Central Bank in August to increase to a maximum its participation in buying the gold produced in Brazil, with a view toward adding it to the national reserves. The CEF was authorized to act as the exclusive buyer for the Central Bank.

In the same meeting, the National Monetary Council decided that no gold exports should be authorized by the Central Bank and that in such case it should present itself as the alternate buyer with the recommendation that the gold purchased should not be at a price higher than the gold price quoted in London.

According to the Central Bank, up to 30 September the amount of 12 tons, 374 kilos, 977 grams and 9 milligrams of gold had been acquired on the domestic market and distributed as to its source as follows:

Serra Pelada — 7 tons, 668 kilos, 151 grams, 17 milligrams

Itaituba — 1 ton, 914 kilos, 703 grams, 69 milligrams

Cumaru — 1 ton, 287 kilos, 284 grams, 64 milligrams

Morro Velho — 1 ton, 499 kilos, 847 grams, 59 milligrams

Federal Revenue Service — 5 kilos

The Central Bank did not report on the present size of the gold reserves in Brazil under its guardianship. In 1964, when it was appointed depository of official reserves of the country by law, the Central Bank received the amount of 38 tons, 711 kilos, 169 grams, 94 milligrams, subsequently increased by 511 kilos, 443 grams, 185 milligrams from the Government Mint and the Bahia refineries.

In addition to the gold acquired on the domestic market, the Central Bank also buys small quantities at auctions of the International Monetary Fund to add to national reserves. Up to December 1979, Brazil bought 12 tons, 775 kilos, 208 grams, 85 milligrams on the international market.

COUNTRY TO INITIATE TITANIUM PRODUCTION ON LARGE SCALE

Rio de Janeiro JORNAL DO BRASIL in Portuguese 30 Oct 81 p 25

[Text] Belo Horizonte—Through METAMIG [Minas Gerais Metals], the Minas Gerais State Government signed an agreement with the CTA [Aerospace Technology Center] yesterday for the transfer of technology for the production of metallic titanium from the titanium tetrachloride originating from the processing of the anatase of the Araxa reserves.

Minas Gerais Secretary of Industry and Commerce Jose Romualdo Cancado Bahia said that this agreement will allow Brazil, with the employment of national technology and national companies, to enter the "closed group of metallic titanium producers at this time restricted to the Soviet Union, the United States and Japan." Governor Francelino Pereira expects Minas Gerais to make the country the fourth world producer of metallic titanium.

Project

CTA Director Maj Brig Lauro Ney Menezes reported that 20 million cruzeiros will be invested in a period of seven months for the adaption of the pilot plant of the CTA Materiel Division Reduction Plant located in Sao Jose dos Campos. This adaptation will begin next year, since the pilot plant has been deactivated since 1977. After being adapted the plant will produce one ton for the domestic market as a quality test.

He considered the project for the use of anatase "fully practical" saying that the CTA began development of the technology in 1966 and concluded it in 1975. It was patented in 1977.

The Minas Gerais secretary of industry and commerce announced that the technology to be transferred by the CTA to METAMIG will become the property of the Minas Gerais Government, which may use it for negotiations with national groups who may be interested in processing the anatase of Araxa. He explained that among interested groups are Construtora Andrade Gutierrez, Eletrometal and Acotecnica.

Until the pilot plant of the Vale do Rio Doce Company located in Tapira begins operations producing titanium tetrachloride, the CTA will obtain that product for the manufacture of titanium sponge in the markets of Europe and the United States.

For the production of titanium pigment, a group headed by Construtora Andrade Gutierrez has already sent to the BNDE [National Economic Development Bank] a plan aimed at installing a plant which will use the process of chlorinization of the anatase of Araxa in the chemical complex of the Minas Gerais Triangle in Uberaba. This project is estimated to cost $250 million.

The Matarazzo Group has also expressed an interest in installing a chloride plant in that chemical complex for the production of titanium tetrachloride.

MINING HEAD DISCUSSES SECRET ACCORD, WORLD COPPER SITUATION

Santiago EL MERCURIO in Spanish 26 Oct 81 p C 2

[Interview with National Mining Association President Manuel Feliu; date and place not indicated]

[Text] The president of the National Mining Association (SONAMI), Manuel Feliu, revealed that a secret agreement was adopted at the last CIPEC [Intergovernmental Council of Copper Exporting Countries] meeting that "could be vitally important for mining and that will be made public very shortly."

In an interview granted to EL MERCURIO, the business leader indicated that the last meeting of the Intergovernmental Council of Copper Exporting Countries held in Paris generated a "new dynamics" for the international agency that led the Zambian representative to say "CIPEC has finally stopped barking and is trying to bite."

During the conversation Feliu referred to the general situation on the world metal market and to Chile's specific position in this area.

[Question] What is the impression in Europe on the current status and the prospects of the world economy?

[Answer] Europe like Chile is experiencing the impact of the new U.S. economic policy. The strict monetary measures applied by the Federal Reserve Board to curb inflation have, as you know, generated record high interest rates in the United States. As a result, the dollar has gained in value by about 24 or 26 percent vis-a-vis the principal European currencies such as the mark, the French franc and the pound sterling.

The revaluation of the U.S. currency has affected their international competitiveness, and thus their trade balance, particularly with regard to the European powers, whose demand has fallen significantly as a result of this phenomenon. Today, in both Europe and the United States, there is nothing more profitable in the short and medium term than interest rates, and so capital is flowing in that direction. The metal market, which is of special interest to Chile, is of course also suffering—and will for some time—the impact of this situation.

In Europe they are not discarding the possibility that the United States will adopt some adjustment measures to attenuate the domestic effects of this recessive wave.

[Question] How does this situation influence the Chilean mining industry?

[Answer] Chile is a mining country, in that it relies essentially on its exportable mineral products to improve its balance of payments, cope with its external debt and meet the development challenge.

For rapid development, the country needs foreign capital, since its domestic savings are too small to meet the economy's immediate or general needs. Foreign savings come in the form of loans or capital contributions.

Credits must be paid in hard currency and, in the second case, profits must also be returned in hard currency.

Consequently, without mineral exports we would not have any way to pursue our development, since our payment capacity as a country would be very small and uncertain. The export mining industry is what provides security to foreign banks that lend Chile money, which we are to use to generate foreign exchange to pay off those credits.

This year we are estimating a decline in mineral export proceeds of about U.S. $500 million as a result of both a reduction in mineral exports and low prices for metals, and especially copper, on the world market.

The world situation naturally affects the copper market, which is used primarily in the automobile industry, in construction, and in the electrical conductor and cable industry. The economic recession affects consumption, automobile sales are reduced, construction declines and manufacturers lose their market. If the supply remains constant in a situation of this sort, a surplus occurs and prices logically fall. According to current estimates, the surplus copper on the world market could amount to 50,000 tons by the end of the year. For 1982, it is forecast that supply and demand will be in balance and that the price will rise slightly. But estimates for 1983 and 1984 show a deficit ranging from 150,000 to 450,000 tons, depending on the estimated growth rates for the world economy during that period.

[Question] What is the attitude of copper buyers?

[Answer] Consumers are seriously concerned about the present low prices for copper. They know that the producers of that metal have costs higher than those prices and they are afraid that this will discourage investment and shut down operations—which is already happening in the private sector—or that there will be no further prospecting. This could have a critical impact on the supply and price of the product in the medium term.

They are in a state of crisis. Small producers shut down their copper operations some time ago and the only ones working are those that can mine copper combined with gold and silver. From the 50,000 tons of refined copper small mining companies produced in one year, today they are not even producing 20,000.

Medium-sized mining companies are continuing to work thanks to their external debt capacity, which has enabled them to absorb losses, or by not amortizing their plant and equipment, which is one way to lose. These companies export about $350 million a year and play an important role in obtaining foreign exchange for our economy. For this reason and because of the importance of this sector in the northern part of the country where it is irreplaceable as an economic agent, in terms of production and work, the country should be interested in the survival of these businesses.

[Question] Did the CIPEC meeting make an effective contribution?

[Answer] CIPEC has not achieved any concrete results in the area of prices for 14 years, or in other words since it was established. It is impossible to expect everything to be done in one meeting.

In this last meeting, however, CIPEC took on a new dynamics with the proposals of the Chilean and Peruvian mining ministers, so much so that the Zambian representative was prompted to respond to the Chilean minister's proposals by saying that CIPEC finally "had stopped barking as was trying to bite." This was in reference to a secret agreement that could be of vital importance to mining and that will be made public very soon.

Minister Pinera's proposal to seek tariff reforms in GATT was also welcomed warmly. These reforms would improve payment possibilities for copper and copper manufacturers within the producer countries, which would entail substantial benefits for Chile should they be passed.

ADVANCED TECHNOLOGY, LASERS USED IN LUMBER INDUSTRY

Santiago EL MERCURIO in Spanish 26 Oct 81 p C 5

[Text] Nacimiento (Biobio Province)--With an investment of $268 million for industrial expansion to be completed between April of next year and the second half of 1983, the INFORSA S.A. holding company in the municipality of Biobio will form the largest lumber industry in Latin America. The President of the Republic acknowledged this program to expand the production of sawn wood, newsprint and cardboard in his recent visit to the Eighth Region.

Twenty-four dollars is the value of one idle minute in the sawmill complex established here after CORFO [Production Development Corporation] sold what was Industrias Forestales S.A. (INFORSA) in 1975. The applied technology includes the laster beam to dimension wood that is run through multiple saw boards 16 hours a day. The complex has the highest annual sawn wood production in the country, at 170,000 cubic meters, most of which goes to the international market.

CONAF [National Lumber Corporation]

According to the acting Regional Director of the National Lumber Corporation, Carlos Sepulveda, "this means that private enterprise has finally assumed its role here as a planter and producer of timber and pulp and it is shaping a lumber industry with a vitally important social and economic impact."

He went on to explain that "this impact not only mobilizes capital commercially, but also offers employment stability in rural areas which was heretofore unknown. This in turn has served as an incentive to people to settle in a series of towns, villages and hamlets whose inhabitants used to be forced constantly to leave in search of subsistence."

Later on the CONAD officer stressed the important effects of Decree Law 701 on reforestation development. It was also a factor in keeping the Eigth Region in first place in the country in new plantations and in foreign exchange proceeds from exports.

Statistics

Out of total sawn wood in the country, amounting to 2,183,033 cubic meters in 1980, the Eigth Region produced 55.1 percent (1,203,825 cubid meters), and Biobio Province 23.3 percent (280,803 cubic meters).

In the case of pulp, production in the same year was 763,095 metric tons, out of which the Eighth Region produced 74 percent as 565,317 metric tons.

Biobio Province, where the INFORSA holding company is located, leads the region in timber production, new plantings and, finally, in improved land.

During 1980, 31,305 hectares were planted in the Eighth Region, out of which 30.62 percent were in Biobio. This same province increased its plantings by 34 percent this year.

As for export statistics, the CORAF officer acknowledged the effects of the world recession that were seriously felt by the lumber industry. From $468 million sold in 1980, only $248 million were recorded in sales for the January-September period of this year.

In Nacimiento

Manuel Francisco Diaz, general manager of INFORSA, explained that "In fact the world recession has a significant effect on our product, both in the production and export stages. I told the President of the Republic this when he visited us last Wednesday. It is a situation we are confronting. But rather than dwell on problems, we explained to the head of state the work we are doing in this area.

ALLEGED SOCIALISTS ACCUSED OF FORMING PARAMILITARY GROUPS

Santiago EL MERCURIO in Spanish 24 Oct 81 p C 9

[Text] Six persons--allegedly members of a cell of the banned Socialist Party--were accused of violations of Law of Arms and Explosives Control by the deputy military prosecutor of Concepcion, Ivan Kuzminic. They are accused of allegedly participating in the fomation of a paramilitary group.

The case was heard yesterday by the military court, which will rule on a writ of habeas corpus presented on behalf of the accused persons. The military court delayed ruling on the matter and agreed--as a measure for achieving a better solution--to request the file on the case from the military prosecutor.

The men being tried by the military court are: Raul Milton Espinoza Pena, Victor Nolberto Vogt Olivares, Jorge Enrique Pena Sepulveda, Miguel Edgardo Salgado Espinoza, Walter Abraham Jara Kessi and Luis Hernan Rodriguez Alvarez.

According to information, these persons were declared guilty of infraction of Article 8 of the Arms Control Law. This law covers those who organize, belong to, finance, endow, help, instruct, incite or induce the creation and operation of private militia, combat groups or militarily organized teams, armed with some of the elements indicated in Article 3 of that law (machine guns, submachineguns, and any weapon of greater destructive power).

ELECTORAL COURT SUSPENDS NATIONAL MOVEMENT ADS

PA170447 San Jose Radio Reloj in Spanish 0100 GMT 17 Nov 81

[Text] The Supreme Electoral Court [Tribunal Supremo de Elecciones] this afternoon ordered the managers of the radio and television stations to immediately suspend an advertisement of the national movement which supports the presidential candidacy of former President Mario Echandi Jimenez.

One of the campaign ads of the national movement which was prohibited this afternoon states: Armed communism is already on our borders. Any mistake can open the country's doors to it. Liberation [referring to the National Liberation Party, PLN] belongs to the socialist international; the socialist international supports the Salvadoran guerrillas and communist Sandinism. It would be a mistake to vote for Monge. Echandi is the only guarantee for freedom and democracy. Echandi is the victory of all the Costa Ricans.

Another campaign ad of the national movement which was banned by the electoral court states: Carazo permitted the entrance of weapons from Cuba for communist Sandinism; Carazo comes from liberation [the PLN]; liberation belongs to the socialist international; the socialist international supports communist Sandinism; Monge also comes from liberation; what can you expect from Monge? Echandi is the only guarantee for freedom and democracy. Echandi is the victory of all the Costa Ricans.

The Supreme Electoral Court ordered the suspension of the national movement's propaganda as a result of a request filed by PLN official (Alfredo Tosi Bonilla). The PLN charged that the ads contained slanderous accusations against the PLN and its presidential candidate, Luis Alberto Monge.

The electoral court also asked for the text of the national movement propaganda which mentions the unity coalition. The unity coalition asked the electoral court to suspend an ad of Mario Echandi's party, charging that it is slanderous. The ad states: Say no to communism which Carazo helped with the aid of Calderon Fournier. Another brief ad states: Calderon Fournier deceived the international organizations.

In a note sent to the national movement, the electoral court stated that the electoral code does not establish that it must grant an audience to a party affected by a ban on its propaganda at the request of another political party.

It indicates that the party officials accredited before the court have the obligation to keep their leaders informed about the actions of other political groups which feel affected by propaganda or other acts.

National movement candidate Mario Echandi had requested an audience from the electoral court as a result of the PLN and the unity coalition's request for the suspension of his propaganda.

POSSIBLE COMMUNIST TAKEOVER OF WORKERS FRONT SCORED

PA092109 San Jose Radio Reloj in Spanish 1130 GMT 9 Nov 81

[Text] The workers common front is a great conquest, but it also involves great risk. There are many labor leaders who are deputies or who are running for that post in the coming elections. The labor movement is being politicized and especially by the communists who have long used the labor movement as a political weapon.

The strikes in the banana sector, for instance, have been a political activity conducted and staged by the party's political committee.

To us, it is very dangerous for the communist unions to have joined forces even though reportedly for a good purpose. It is very dangerous because the communists usually end up taking over the leadership and command of all these movements.

The struggle against speculation, against unfair prices, against money-changers must be conducted with true patriotism because in defense of social justice and the family welfare, no one must destroy the peace of the Costa Ricans. The communists seek to confuse the masses and, thus, cause the collapse of the political system. They are always trying to create chaos. We must, therefore, provide evidence that democracy is possible, that one can struggle with freedom and dignity in terms of respect and tolerance. This, obviously, cannot be understood by the communists.

We call attention to the dangers of the so-called fusion of the democratic groups and the communists. We believe in the democratic labor movement, in popular organizations based on democratic principles and justice in freedom.

The workers common front could fall into the hands of the communists and promote the collapse of the system which traditionally has been accepted by the Costa Ricans. We are now being threatened but despite this threat, we must show that we can hold elections and that the government, regardless of its poor and deficient showing, may conclude its term within a climate of absolute respect and tolerance.

PRESIDENTIAL CANDIDATES--Civil registry director Francisco Peralta has announced that the registration requests for candidates for president, vice president, deputies and most of the municipality officials for the February elections have been received by his office. The parties registered to participate in the elections are the national movement, whose candidate is Mario Echandi Jimenez; the National Liberation Party, with Luis Alberto Monge Alvarez as its candidate; the Unity Coalition, with Rafael Angel Calderon Fournier as its candidate; and the United People's Coalition, with Dr Rodrigo Gutierrez as its candidate. Other parties are the Democratic Party, whose candidate is Edwin Retana Chavez; and the Independent Party, with Edwin Chacon Madrigal as its candidate. This last candidate will run alone on the presidential ticket, as the persons who accompanied him for the vice presidency resigned. Peralta said that should Dr Chacon Madrigal be elected president of the republic, his vice presidents would be those of the party occupying the runner-up position in the 7 February elections. 'GRANMA' DESCRIBES NEW COMPOSITION OF PARTY

Havana GRANMA in Spanish 10, 14 Oct 81

[10 Oct 81 p 2]

[Text] The purpose of this article, which will be published in two parts, is to provide additional information for party members and prospective members. It will also be used as background for the study circle dealing with the resolution approved by the Second Congress concerning internal party life, which will be held in all cells in October.

It is aimed at political studies activists who may use the material in municipal and provincial seminars, leaders of study circles who may draw on it in the course of their debates and party members, as part of the individual preparation for the study circle.

The First and Second congresses of the Communist Party of Cuba have revealed the degree of development and organization that has gradually been achieved in the historic process of our revolution in order to create the technical and material base for the building of socialism and improve the political and ideological awareness of our people.

The aggressiveness of American imperialism and the difficult international circumstances, worsened by the deepening of the general crisis of capitalism, mean that our party will have to use all its forces and those of the people so that despite these conditions, we may move toward the objective set forth.

Within the series of topics analyzed at these party events, those relating to the strengthening of the worker composition of the party and the growth in its rank and file were of special importance because of the far-reaching nature of both aspects with respect to the uninterrupted ascent of the leadership and vanguard role of the party.

Compliance with the historic mission of the party: building socialism and communism in our country is directly related to the growth in the number of members. This growth is aimed at bringing in the most outstanding men and women, who are ideologically firm and convinced, so that they will help strengthen the authority and prestige of the party among the working class and other workers in the country.

It is of the greatest importance that every party member and prospect be an exemplary revolutionary, worker and citizen, that they be willing to guide, influence and convince their comrades at work or in school and all those with whom they have relations, of the correctness and efficacy of Marxist-Leninist ideas. That is why the acceptance and preparation of party members in the principles of Marxism-Leninism require careful attention. Likewise, the integration into the party of the best and most self-sacrificing sons of the working class, farmers, revolutionary intellectuals and other workers takes on decisive importance, given the role which the vanguard detachment must play as the leading force of all society.

Since 1962, when the building of our party began, it has given ever increasing attention to these activities. The First Congress was a decisive link in the expansion of criteria for the drafting of a proper strategy aimed at successively improving its composition and the admission of new members.

In 1975, the situation that existed, comparing the makeup of the country's working force with the composition of party members and prospects, was as follows:

	Percent of Total Working Force	Percent of Party Rank and File
Workers in industrial, agricultural production, construction and services	65	35.9
Professional workers and technicians	11.7	9.2
Administrative management and political workers	7.7	42.1
Administrative workers	4.7	4.1
Small farmers	9.7	1.8
Others	1.2	6.9

The proportion of members and prospects in the most important and decisive sectors with respect to the total number occupied in such sectors was very low.

Obviously, this composition did not help the materialization of party policy and weakened its influence and relations in those places where the progress and improvement of the socioeconomic process is decided.

Logically enough, the fact that a substantial part of our administrative and political leaders are members of our party is a positive fact contributing to the strengthening of our government. It is also indicative of the fact that in the historic process of the revolution, many workers and farmers liberated from capitalist and imperialist oppression assumed leadership responsibilities. On the other hand, the presence and influence of the party in the different branches of the economy and in important work centers were limited, meaning that it was not possible to efficiently do the political work that must be done by the party within the working class and in overseeing and supporting, economic, social, cultural and other activities.

An example illustrating this situation is the limited number of members and the insufficient worker representation in most rank-and-file organizations existing in the country's sugar mills.

The resolution on internal life approved at the First Congress states, in one of its parts, that:

"Having an organically strong party in those mills is a decisive factor for mobilizing the working class with greater intensity and effectiveness in the battle for production and productivity, culture and technology, and for achieving an ever greater revolutionary awareness."

It continues:

"That is why, in the party's composition, it is necessary to complement the necessary and positive presence of thousands of communist holding leadership responsibilities in the government and social institutions, communists who have been tested in the struggle before and after the triumph of the revolution, with the entry into our ranks of thousands of workers, who will thereby guarantee the active presence of the party in the working class, in factories, on the farms and at basic service and teaching centers."

This has been the line followed and we can see the results achieved.

[14 Oct 81 p 2]

[Text] The Central Report presented to the Second Congress by Comrade Fidel Castro, first secretary of the Central Committee, and the resolution on the position on internal life contain a profound appreciation of the progress made in facing the task of improving the social composition of the party and guaranteeing its active presence in the working class.

We can therefore see how, in 1980, 68.2 percent of the members are workers directly related to production, services or teaching, including professionals and technicians in these activities. Among them, the basic nucleus is made up of production and service workers, with 48.1 percent of the total.

The membership doubled during the same period. This was achieved by jealously preserving the principle of quality, the indispensable premise in this process.

Growth basically took place in priority sectors. Significant increases came about in the sugar industry, the rest of the industrial sector, construction, transport and education, and important progress was also made in the agricultural sector and in public health.

Of decisive influence in the achievement of these objectives was the regulatory action exercised by the party at all levels with respect to the work of recruitment and entry into its ranks.

Experienced gained over the years allows us to say that we have gradually gained in awareness with respect to the need to maintain constant vigilance so that the composition achieved, through tireless, efficient political work by our rank-and-file organizations and the rest of the leadership organs, will constitute a point of departure for perfecting the work, going the furthest with mechanisms that help our party, by virtue of its ideology and makeup, increasingly becomes the party of the working class and all the people.

The work of expanding the party requires that every rank-and-file organization and every municipal leadership organ, under the new conditions created, improves on the quality of procedures in order to achieve still higher levels in our makeup, but above all, in order to improve the quality of work done with those recruited, which is a prime factor for continuing to increase and improve this aspect of work, inasmuch as it has not yet achieved the necessary level in all places.

Likewise, it is indispensable to do far-reaching and systematic work with all those who have joined in recent years in order to teach them and educate them in the discipline and habits of party work, developing their communist training and thereby gaining their conscious and effective contribution to the completion of the different tasks of the party. Equal attention must be paid to new members.

Considering these points and looking to the future, our Second Congress worked out and formulated with great precision the list of objectives toward which we must channel our efforts. In sum, the directions are the following:

1) maintaining the fight for the quality requirement regarding new entries into party ranks, by means of the consistent application of established principles;

2) continuing the work of recruitment and expansion, maintaining or increasing worker representation in the ranks. It is necessary to continue to exercise regulatory action regarding new members so as to achieve this objective.

3) Growth of the party during this 5-year period should come about while achieving the objectives proposed with respect to the worker composition of new admissions. We must also work to achieve a reasonable rate, guaranteeing quality.

4) Growth must be aimed at guaranteeing the strengthening or presence of the party, mainly in those places of special importance for the economic development of our party. Priority attention will be required by the building of the party and its growth in new production and service centers that are set up during the 5-year period as a result of programmed investments.

5) Party growth in the coming years must also be an important element for increasing its influence in the UJC [Union of Young Communists] and among youth groups, especially for workers. For this purpose, after a casuistic analysis, the process should be initiated to bring into the party those young communists, basically workers, who, as leaders of the UJC, possess the necessary requirements and can remain remain in that organization for a fairly long time, with double membership.

We are sure that these objectives constitute a powerful weapon in the hands of rank-and-file organizations and leadership organizations of the party for channeling all the initiative, responsibility and dedication of members and cadres and for continuing to move forward in the task of improving the social composition of our party on the basis of improved quality with growth. We shall therefore make it possible for all efforts mobilized in this direction to be aimed at continuously expanding the party's role and influence in our country's economic, political and social tasks.

AFGHANISTAN SITUATION--At the United Nations Cuba has stated that the study on the so-called situation in Afghanistan interfers in the internal affairs of that country and that it is an attack against the express desires of the government and people of that country. On addressing the general assembly, which is debating this matter, Cuba's representative, Raul Roa Kouri, stated that the draft resolution currently being debated contains demands that violate and do not acknowledge Afghanistan's sovereignty. Roa stated that he supports Kabul's position, which favors a dialogue that will eliminate tension in the region. He indicated that the resolution in question does not compare with the report that has been submitted by UN secretary genreral, Kurt Waldheim. He recalled Afghanistan's initiative calling for bilateral or trilateral negotiations with its neighbors, Iran and Pakistan, with the inclusion of the UN secretary general or his representative. The Cuban representative to the United Nations supported the measures taken by the Kabul government that will help it defend the April revolution and resolve the economic, social and political problems that are being experienced by that country. Finally, he expressed his hope that a political definition will be achieved in the region in accordance with the UN charter and the principles and objectives of the nonaligned countries' movement. IDB LOAN POSTPONEMENT--San Salvador, 13 Nov (AFP)--Jose Antonio Morales Ehrlich, member of the Revolutionary Junta of the Government of El Salvador, today deplored the "IDB's decision to postpone consideration of a $30 million loan to El Salvador at the request of Thierry Walrafen, the IDB director for France." "It is regrettable that the efforts of an entire people are being hindered by the assessment of certain individuals who are unfamiliar with our situation, or have only learned about it from distorted news reports," Morales Ehrlich said. The person who requested the postponement "has no idea of the damage that he is causing to our people," Morales added, when he criticized what he called "decisions made from behind a desk, based on romantic assessments." Morales also reiterated his government's position on the elections scheduled for early 1982. He said that the elections are "a political solution to the Salvadoran situation." "A solution imposed by forces other than the Salvadoran people would no longer be a political solution," he said. Morales continued by saying that "the ideal thing would be for the left to participate in the elections. In this way they could prove their true voting strength. If the left does not participate and the people do, the process will be equally valid," he said. Morales Ehrlich, who is also president of the Salvadoran Institute of Agrarian Transformation, also announced a new land distribution law today. According to his explanation, some 81,000 hectares acquired by the state will become cooperative or individual plots. [Text] [PA150002 Paris AFP in Spanish 0354 GMT 14 Nov 81]

POLITICAL FORUM--The forum of political parties has positive and negative aspects, Msgr Arturo Rivera y Damas said yesterday commenting on current domestic events in his sermon during mass at the Metropolitan Cathedral. He did not say what the negative aspects were. Regarding the positive, he said that it is good that through the forum we are learning about many government actions which were previously unknown to the public. He also said that it is good for the political parties to demand absolute neutrality from the government. In reference to violence, Monsignor Rivera y Damas, the apostolic administrator of San Salvador, said that destruction and crimes are routine in our society and that the builder, not the destroyer, should be victorious. However, he added, at this moment, the left as well as the right persist in their effort to destroy. He explained that the Catholic Church intervenes in anything that has to do with human rights, because the church is a specialist in humanity and therefore is worried about the danger of war that exists as well as the border conflicts between countries. Finally,

Monsignor Rivera y Damas said that he does not know which of the two groups is causing more destruction in the country: the left or the right. He also said that paramilitary groups, such as the death squad, are acting with absolute impunity in the crimes they commit throughout El Salvador. In that case the importer had to find it on his own. Now, not even the authorizations to place the orders are granted." For that reason, already there is a shortage of many (?products) and very soon the consumers will not be able to buy them," the merchants point out. They add: "It is believed that if this situation is not remedied, by next January we will be running out of many articles that are indispensable to the health of our people and to their economic activities." FIVE MORE DEPUTIES TO BE ELECTED NEXT YEAR

[Text] The Directorate of the Electoral Registry has issued a decree stating that in the upcoming 1982 elections, five more deputies than the present total of representatives in the legislature will be elected due to the fact that some districts have increased in numbers of inhabitants. The Congress of the Republic, therefore, will have 66 deputies vice 61.

The decree states that "in accordance with the law, the numbers of deputies in the Congress must be determined according to the most recent population census, taking as a basis that each electoral district shall elect two deputies. But, those electoral districts whose populations exceed 200,000 inhabitants shall elect an additional deputy per 100,000 additional inhabitants, or fraction thereof exceeding 50,000, plus one alternate deputy per district.

WHEREAS: According to the report submitted by the Directorate General of Statistics regarding the results of the ninth population and the fourth housing censuses, taken in April of this year, changes should be made according to the law.

THEREFORE: Using the powers granted in Article 36, first clause of Decree 387 (Electoral and Political Parties Law).

IT IS AGREED: Article I, Principal deputies to the Congress of the Republic to be elected in the upcoming March 1982 general elections are stipulated as follows: seven for the Central District municipalities in Guatemala; six for the First District of the remaining municipalities in the Capital, or two added deputies shall be elected inasmuch as there were already four.

Quezaltenango has three representatives. Next March one more shall be elected, giving it four deputies. Totonicapan has four and in the next legislative period it shall have an additional deputy, bringing its total to five.

There are two deputies for the department of Jalapa. Beginning 15 June 1982, it shall have one additional deputy. The remaining departments shall stay as they now are.

Article II. The numbers presently established for deputies shall be communicated to the constitutional president of the republic and to the Congress.

Article III. This order takes effect at once and shall be disseminated by the appropriate news media and published in the Official Bulletin.

PRELIMINARY STATISTICS OF LAST CENSUS REPORTED

Guatemala PRENSA LIBRE in Spanish 16 Oct 81 p 12

[Text] According to statistics gathered in the latest housing and population census taken last April, Guatemala has a total of 6,043,559 inhabitants of which there are 3,024,255 men and 3,029,304 women.

Dr Martin Carranza, director general of Statistics, told PRENSA LIBRE that it is unusual to observe, related to the 1973 census, that there now are 15,000 more women than men and that the increase in inhabitants during the past 8 years has been about 100,000 persons per annum.

He pointed out that the increase in inhabitants since 1973 to date has totaled 883,338. Guatemala, he emphasized, increased 200,000 in 8 years; San Marcos, 80,000; Peten, 64,000 and Esquintla, 67,000. These are regions wherein the highest percentage of growth occurred.

Regarding Peten, Doctor Carranza said that in 1973 the number of people reached 67,000, but now that number has grown to 131,000, possibly because of numerous settlements of tenant farmers who have entered the department—a number greater than the inhabitants of Belize.

Implications of Population Growth

Doctor Carranza went on to say that undoubtedly Guatemala's population growth will demand greater services, increased sources of employment and other basic needs for a developing country.

It should be pointed out that according to the technical data, 30 percent of Guatemalans remain economically active and employed. With an annual increase of 100,000 Guatemalans per year in population, a problem arises for some 250,000 citizens who have been waiting to find work since 1973.

Census Cost Government over Two Million

In another part of his statement, Doctor Carranza averred that for the census this year from 23 March to 6 April, the Directorate General of Statistics employed 15,000 persons and spent some 2.6 million quetzales.

He explained that regarding other phenomena which the statistics will reflect are data to be made public shortly inasmuch as many totals are preliminary.

EGP LEADER ROLANDO MORAN EXPLAINS GROUP'S OBJECTIVES

Havana BOHEMIA in Spanish 16, 23 Oct 81

[Interview with the commander in chief of the EGP (Guerrilla Army of the Poor), Rolando Moran, by Mario Menendez Rodriguez, at the El Turo Camp in the mountains of Guatemala; date not specified; originally published in the Mexican weekly POR ESTO, of which Menendez Rodriguez is editor]

[16 Oct 81 pp 74-79]

[Text] For the first time in 9 years, Rolando Moran, the commander in chief of the politicomilitary organization EGP, speaks to the world.

BOHEMIA is pleased to reproduce this valuable piece of reporting by its fraternal Mexican colleague, whose well-known journalistic experience and daring took him to the wilds of Guatemala to offer his readers one of the most interesting pages in the people's armed struggle to win their national liberation. Sharing the guerrilla vanguard with the EGP are the FAR [Rebel Armed Forces], the ORPA [Organization of the People in Arms] and the PGT [Guatemalan Labor Party].

El Turo Camp, Los Cuchumatanes Mountain Range, Guatemala, 1981--The pages of this book are being opened for the first time in 9 years, and they are being opened precisely at one of the nerve centers of the revolutionary people's war that the EGP, the FAR, the ORPA and the PGT are promoting and waging. They open at a camp that looks exactly like the spot in the Bolivian mountains where a man who belonged to the 21st century, Ernesto "Che" Guevara, physically fought his last battle for the social liberation of oppressed peoples. That's right, the historic interview with the commander in chief of the EGP, Rolando Moran, was conducted somewhere in the untamed mountains of El Quiche.

The truth is that a better place could not have been chosen for renewing my acquaintance with the extraordinary leader who has devoted his every effort in life to achieving a just society for the Guatemalan people. Rolando Moran is the epitome of the new man being developed in the jungles, in the mountains, in the cities, in the towns and in the villages of this heroic nation that is on the way to achieving its genuine, definitive independence.

Humble and simple, in spite of his impressive theoretical, political, military and cultural background, self-sacrificing and brave, an enthusiastic promoter of unity among revolutionary and democratic forces, Rolando Moran is a remarkable strategist and commands an in-depth knowledge of the history and customs of the Guatemalan people.

I met him 15 years ago, beside the unforgettable Augusto Turcios Lima, the founder of the historic Rebel Armed Forces, which operated in the Minas Mountains. He could have been described as the adviser to the youthful number one leader of the FAR.

I know that the words I am using today to describe Rolando Moran would offend his well-known modesty. Nevertheless, I have not exaggerated one bit. Each one of those words is an apt description of his tremendous personality, and it is only fair to end a quarter century of silence about him.

The Guerrilla Army of the Poor

[Question] What is the EGP? On what political, economic and social bases has it been established and has it developed?

[Answer] The Guerrilla Army of the Poor is a politicomilitary organization whose aim is to interpret and fulfill the revolutionary desires and aspirations of our people in the form of irreversible political gains that represent true revolutionary accomplishments vis-a-vis the ruling classes and imperialism.

The EGP is politicomilitary because since the outset of its formation we realized that in order to make a revolution, we had to take power and to do this an organization has to be designed not only as a political organization that develops personnel and a revolutionary ideology, but also and decisively, as the tool for waging this struggle: a military force. We feel, and this has been a guiding idea in developing the EGP, that a revolutionary organization that wants to be consistent with the conditions in its country must understand, develop and bring about three decisive factors: first, its theoretical strategic approach; second, its organizational instrument, and third, its tactics and methods.

The EGP is the result of the efforts of many Guatemalan revolutionaries who, after the initial defeat in 1954, when the government of Jacobo Arbenz and the democratic systemwere toppled, and later with the defeat of the guerrilla movement in the 1960's, decided to seek a new form of organization. The EGP is a synthesis of the experience, efforts, aspirations and sacrifices of many combatants; it is unquestionably one facet of them and, we could say, a current in this entire revolutionary groundswell that is within our people.

We are trying to interpret and, moreover, to be consistent with and heirs to very pure and very strong traditions such as the ones that were embodied in Edgar Ibarra, Otto Rene Castillo, Luis Turcios, Luis Trajo and other comrades who fell in battle in the 1960's and from whom we learned a great deal. We are completely certain that they were the groundwork for the impact that we are now having. So then, the EGP has tried to synthesize the teachings of the present, to systematize experiences and to develop the teachings of the present as well, to gradually try them out, guiding ourselves at all times by the Marxist-Leninist method of grasping reality, of gradually experiencing it, so that we can plan future moves and draw conclusions that will enable us to transform not only our methods but ourselves as well. That is why I once said somewhere: The EGP is not just a guerrilla column or a political party. We feel that we are, and we have tried to be to the best of our ability, a Marxist-Leninist politicomilitary organization for the struggle and the resistance against oppression and exploitation, for the taking of power and for the defeat of the enemy, of whom we know that imperialism is the main bulwark.

I said that we conceive of the EGP as a politicomilitary organization. Politicomilitary in all its aspects, and that is why we stipulated for its very structure that every branch of the EGP must have three basic facets, what we call the three legs of the bench. When we began forming the EGP, we said that every EGP branch must have a threefold character: as a military unit, a political organization and a task force. We were thus trying to interpret the three basic aspects that make up the force of power, the establishment of the society we need to oppose imperialism and to cope with the necessary class struggle in this era, and this is incorporated in the principles of the EGP. Every EGP branch must have this threefold character. Every grassroots group, every intermediate group and every leadership group must be able to carry on every sort of productive work, whether at home, in the field, in every necessary aspect of work that crops up. At the same time, it must be a political organization that can study, discuss and develop at the pertinent level, ideas that will make possible the advancement, spread and abstraction of policy and theory. It must also be a military unit that is capable not just of defending itself but at a given moment of joining the ranks of the attackers to wage a major offensive against and defeat the enemy in the sphere that we feel and have always felt is the most decisive in the class struggle: armed confrontation. That is how I would characterize the EGP.

Now then, with regard to the second point: When was it created? I would say that like any organization, the EGP was created in a process. It would be very hard to say exactly when the EGP was conceived. The fact is that the EGP began to be formed in many places at once. It is a convergence of opinion currents; if not that, an opinion that has wound up being a political and combat perception of our people. The first EGP combatants who began to operate as an organization were comrades who left our country or were already overseas in various countries. Some of them were engaged in military training and others were getting theoretical training in various places, Cuba, Europe, Mexico. They all got together at a given moment, without even having a name or a platform, but they were guided by ideas set forth in documents that were public knowledge and by the efforts of other comrades who also followed these approaches, even though they were not even familiar with them.

I could say that the EGP's development was due to centripetal force, that is to say, the force that attracts and at given times brings together kindred elements as a result of the very dynamics of events and needs. This was how the EGP started, around some documents, one of which has to be acknowledged as a fundamental step forward, the March 1967 document. It contains the strategic factors that enabled us to set forth some of the premises for establishing the kind of organization that the EGP would later become through our many individual and group efforts.

Strategy and "Che" Guevara

The EGP's strategy gradually took shape in Mexico, where all of us comrades had gathered. We initially set three basic goals for ourselves, goals that we succeeded in accomplishing during the first stage.

First: Return to Guatemala together, because we were all outside;

Second: Return all together with weapons in hand;

Third: Activate the revolutionary guerrilla struggle.

When we held the EGP's first guerrilla conference and took stock, we confirmed that we had fully accomplished the three goals. In so doing, we laid the groundwork for establishing an organization worthy of being called a revolutionary organization and, therefore, capable of taking part in our grassroots guerrilla war, in our people's war of liberation with a well-defined personality. It was then that we took the name of the Guerrilla Army of the Poor, which combined both our previous experiences and our plans for the future.

It is of the utmost importance to point out that the personality, struggle, theory and strategy of the heroic guerrilla commander Ernesto "Che" Guevara were always present in all of these developments and that it was not by chance that we took our inspiration from him and that we adopted, at the same time as the name Guerrilla Army of the Poor, the rallying cry with which he said good-by to Fidel in his letter before setting off on his exploits of liberation in other countries, and that his image is also on our flag.

I have mentioned on occasion that as one of the revolutionary forces in the ideological struggle, we have often been attacked for being "foquistas" [policy of establishing cells for guerrilla war] and Guevaristas. I have commented that we have, in fact, been "foquistas," in the sense that we began around a necessary cell, but that we in no way thought of "foquismo" as a strategy for or an approach to war. The "cell" was the manifestation of the initial engine that ignites the great engine of the masses, because we never forgot about the participation of the masses, not only as backing for the war but as the decisive factor, as participants and leading figures in the people's revolutionary war.

With regard to being Guevaristas, we confess to being Guevaristas and we will continue to be, because we have interpreted Guevarism not only as the scattered ideas of a charismatic and heroic leader but also as the synthesis of a great many condensed experiences, which are the premises for a theory of revolution in Latin America and of the theory of Marxism-Leninism as applied to our continent. Therefore, in putting "Che's" image on our flag, we were saying that we have never rejected "Che's" proposals and that we feel obliged to pursue them in theory and in practice. We have been asked at times whether "Che's" image might not seem strange in our native villages. After lengthy experience, we can reply that exactly the opposite is the case. "Che's" image and statements must sink into and set the direction for many of our guidelines, and our new flag is accepted and welcomed.

It is almost a historic axiom: The forerunners stamp their actions, statements and ideas on the images, methods and actions of the masses when they have been able to grasp realities. That is why we have never thought that our emblem is an obstacle to contact with the masses, even though they might be the indigenous masses of our people, as long as, of course, images are accompanied by action and practical activity.

The Weak Link and the 1960's

Now then, on what bases does the EGP operate? Well, this is a bit more complicated. Although it might at times seem haphazard, the fact is that this is perhaps what we have thought about and worked on the most. The EGP's first detachments penetrated Guatemala at what we call the weakest point on the rope, perhaps after what Lenin called the weakest link of imperialism. We call it the weakest point on the rope, which means the geographic, political and social region of Guatemala in which the state machine and the imperialist penetration are the weakest, where their interests have not taken direct hold and where they do not have direct, effective control, which they have to have where their interests are more immediate. We deliberately chose the most populated regions, the most poverty-stricken regions, the regions hardest hit by unemployment, poverty and privation; above all, we deliberately chose the regions where the ethnic groups that make up the Indian minorities, which ultimately represent the majority of the Guatemalan people, have settled. In other words, as I said in a document, the regions with the majority of native Guatemalans, to put it plainly, the Indians.

This is a basic element of our strategy. Moreover, it resulted from our experience with the first guerrilla attempts in the 1960's. All of our guerrilla experiences in the 1960's took place in a zone where we were strangers, where we failed to mobilize the population because we did not understand their reality and because we tried to teach them an approach that was more in keeping with the mestizos and to inculcate in them only those laws that we were familiar with in the class struggle that was going in the capital city area. This time, however, it was we who delved into the local problems of the peoples who have been disenfranchised for centuries; it was we who understood them and offered them some ideas. However, we were also shown a great deal of rebelliousness and capacity for struggle, and when we rounded this out, we came up with that explosive mixture of rebellion that constitutes the most powerful force of the revolution in our country.

Class Struggle and National Oppression

We can say that without deviating from the general laws of revolution, the revolution in Guatemala can be conceived only in connection with two fundamental problems: the problem of the class struggle and the problem of national oppression.

No revolutionary can be successful in Guatemala if he grasps only one of these two facts. He has to combine the two, because in our country (I will reserve opinion on other countries) the phenomenon of exploitation is closely linked with the phenomenon of national oppression, and you cannot try to resolve one without touching on or involving the other. We feel that the liberation of man by his fellow man cannot be the rallying cry in Guatemala without resolving the contradiction of the nationwide ethnic and cultural oppression that exists, given the various national minorities of mestizos and indigenous groups. This might seem somewhat contradictory and shocking to some, but we must realize that unlike other Central American or Latin American countries, Guatemala does not have national unity. The struggle for independence in some countries succeeded in forging that unity. It was never forged in Guatemala. Guatemala is not a nationally constituted country, as the Vietnamese would say. Guatemala is a multinational country. This is something that the Communist Party of Vietnam has said about its country. Just 17 percent of their country is made up of national minorities, and they are wise enough to regard their country as multinational. How could we possibly think that Guatemala, whose national minorities make up 53 percent of our country, is a one-nation country. In this regard, we have to acknowledge the need of these national ethnic groups to have their own identity, because they are the ones who are going to give final shape to Guatemala's nationhood.

The EGP brought up this contradiction from the outset. What this means in other words is that when the EGP began undertaking the revolution, its goal was to resolve not just the class problem; we also wanted to resolve the problem of acknowledging and integrating these nationalities, to shape the Guatemalan of the future, to recognize each Guatemalan in accordance with his culture, his ethnic group, his cultural and ethnic, not just his class identity.

We have deliberately not taken up the issue of national minorities because we feel that theory is not yet complete in this regard, and we are primarily guerrillas. We are not going to try and come up with a scientific solution for this problem; we merely want to make it known that we are aware of these things, thus laying the groundwork so that they can be acknowledged as basic elements of our revolution.

The Foundations of the EGP

Thus, the foundations of the EGP could be summarized in these four points:

First: The Guerrilla Army of the Poor must reconcile the contradictions in the revolutionary movement itself.

Second: It must cope with circumstances that arose out of the contradictions and crises of the 1960's and 1970's.

Third: It must be responsive to the class struggle, which has become heightened in our country.

Fourth: It must respond to the national contradiction of ethnic and cultural oppression in Guatemala. This is how we see ourselves. There are a lot of things involved in all this, and we might get an argument on many of the facets of what I mentioned. But we feel that these are the basic aspects that spurred the formation of and have given life to the EGP. I would go so far as to say that it would be hard to argue with us on any of these points, because we have thought a lot about them and because we are sufficiently systematized about all these points, and our theory and practice are quite extensive and intensive as well.

That, then, would be my answer to your first question. I realize that I am leaving gaps and that there are many unanswered questions, but there is no way I could try to answer them, because only the unfolding of events can give a satisfactory reply.

Historic Responsibility

[Question] After 9 years in existence, this is the first time that the EGP has publicly unveiled itself as such, disclosed its commander in chief and other politicomilitary leaders and awarded military ranks. Why not before?

[Answer] This must be understood as part of a somewhat premeditated process. We could say that at its outset the EGP had to develop unnoticed, given the conditions at the time, so as not to trigger an enemy reaction that would have been too much for the forces that could offer resistance and also provide a margin of safety for the grassroots that supported it. It would have been unreasonable at the time our first guerrilla columns were being formed, to issue a false and demagogical proclamation about a war that we did not have sufficient mastery of. Therefore, we planned for a quite lengthy period of secret activities, which was necessary so that the enemy would not place us geographically, socially or politically. Afterwards, we gradually began locating and measuring out our actions.

After the guerrilla conference of 1974, we decided on the actions to unleash a new stage in the guerrilla war in Guatemala, because the war had been fading out and the populace had practically forgotten about it under Arana and Laugerud. We began to rise up then, but we did so gradually and premeditatedly so that the enemy would not unleash a crackdown that could crush the guerrilla uprising when it was not in a position to resist an overwhelming repression. This has become almost a standard or law in our ranks. We have gradually undertaken the actions that we are capable of, trusting in the potential of our people, but with an awareness that this potential could be organized. On many occasions, for example, friends warned us against undertaking unorganized, irrational mass action, while other friends suggested actions that might have been too hasty at the time.

We feel that we have gotten the situation under control because we are familiar with our surroundings. We are confident about our surroundings and we know what efforts we can demand in light of them and what effects we can derive from them. Therefore, with our approach of accomplishing what is possible, we have tried to gage what we are capable of doing at a given moment and what we are capable of enduring at a given moment.

We are all too familiar with the sacrifices that have resulted from hasty, thoughtless action and a lack of systematization and organization. We have learned this both from our own experience and from the experience of others, especially the revolutionary movement in Latin America.

If there is anything that we fear, it is not living up to our national and historic responsibility. We are very careful about and would like to strongly emphasize this point. We have had very bitter experiences, because Guatemala has been a critical point. We do not want to again fail our people, the region's revolutionary movements or the worldwide revolution. We do not want to be responsible for another failure. Thus, we are gaging each one of our moves and would like this to be understood. We have the potential to widen the struggle, but our minds are burdened with the memory that in the past we widened it and were thoughtless. We realize that we must assume a historic responsibility and that we must have a revolutionary awareness and systematize our experiences, not just be impulsive. This is where we do not want to fail. In other words, we do not want to be either impetuous or too conservative. We are taking into account time, space, history and the historic responsibility that we have in our hands.

Against "Tall Stories"

Our failure to reveal ourselves publicly until now is perhaps due to an overly conservative approach. We realize we have a gap to make up, because in order to secure the solidarity and support of others at this point, we need a lot of publicity, and we will have to make up this publicity gap. We feel, however, that we will be able to make it up with a reasonable amount of publicity because what we have managed to consolidate internally will enable us to publicize major things at a given point. Perhaps it will be just a disclosure, but this is better than publicizing "tall stories" that are not backed internally.

I am not saying that we do not acknowledge our serious shortcomings in publicizing what we have accomplished; we are just afraid of "tall stories." In the 1960's, we publicized things that did not have an iota of truth to them. I think that in that case we should have been more conservative, not so bold, because the upshot was that we suffered a trauma.

In any case, we know that internal elements must be the groundwork for subsequently developing much stronger and more widespread recognition on the outside. From the outset we aimed at consolidating our structures and internal development before revealing ourselves. In the opposite case, there are all too many international examples in which the dynamics have worked in reverse, and this has been negative, at variance with the law. We would not want that kind of international recognition if there is no basis for it on specific accomplishments, and perhaps as you have been able to see for yourself, our organization is much broader, more profound and more extensive than people are aware of. We have no reason to feel inadequate about calling for the brotherly international solidarity of all peoples, because we will be able to respond with something that really exists and that we will know how to defend and to develop to the best of our ability.

Military Ranks and Regular Troops

With respect to the awarding of military ranks, this stems from the development of the very essence of the grassroots war. It's no big shift or change. The EGP intended from the beginning to be a politicomilitary organization, and therefore, it envisages both a military and a political structure. Thus, it is neither odd nor contradictory for it to have regular troops at a given point in its development. The EGP developed so many irregular troops as part of its strategy that regular troops became necessary. In other words, we needed a regular people's army. But when I talk about a regular army, I am not just talking about numbers; I am also talking about quality, that is to say, a regular army with all of the military structures needed to wage not just a local or regional guerrilla war, but the war that has to be waged against the basic structures of the enemy army, and not just against the government's enemy army, but even against any foreign enemy's regular army that might be brought in.

This is why the regular units have now emerged, strategic mobile units that can strike a major blow against the structures of any army, not just the Guatemalan Army, any army. They are, therefore, the basic armed forces of our people and the backbone of our defense against the exploiting classes and any outside enemy. This has been our approach in establishing our regular forces. As far as strategy is concerned, we are already beginning to develop a people's army that would support any government that replaces the tyrannical government imposed by imperialism and a few classes and that, above all, would be capable of defending revolutionary Guatemala from any other enemy, capable of resisting a military intervention, capable of halting any enemy, of resisting that enemy and of proving that ours is not a submissive people, because they are a bastion, that they can no longer be dominated merely by threats or simple maneuvers of the enemy and that they have their own national personality that can defend itself. This is the reason why we formed our revolutionary army.

> Furthermore, the extraordinary leader made the point that the maturity of the insurgency movement can be seen in its unity, which is guaranteeing the success of the revolution through collective leadership. Thus, the era of bossism, which hurt the insurgency movement so badly in the 1960's, has come to an end once and for all.

[Question] How was the phenomenon of bossism [caudillismo] overcome in the Guerrilla Army of the Poor?

[Answer] I think that it is perhaps important to make several distinctions between bossism, centralized leadership and collective leadership, although I realize why you are asking the question. It is no secret that bossism has harmed many revolutionary organizations in Latin America, starting with ours.

Now then, we also have to single out another phenomenon, centralization, which under certain specific conditions can occur in the form of a person who exercises a leadership that combines the various functions that have to be performed by the politicomilitary command of an organization and, at times, of an entire revolution.

There is another phenomenon that history has shown us, collective leadership. This involves combining the talents of several individuals in a single group that wields executive power through the mechanisms set up in each case; it is characterized, however, by a very in-depth and very constant collective approach.

We feel that a clear-cut distinction has to be made between these three categories. Bossism means the one-man leadership of a process, of a movement or a group, but a leadership that is incomplete. It arises, in general, from spontaneous movements, and although it might eventually become very powerful, it often does not round out political leadership in a more finished, overall approach. In other words, it does not perform the functions that we consider indispensable for it to be true revolutionary leadership, which we would list as political leadership, military leadership, ideological thrust and organizational action. So then, bossism is always a systematized leadership, but it often emerges and is organized spontaneously.

One-man centralized leadership is another phenomenon. It can result from very specific conditions in countries in which the talents of a certain leader really do meet the leadership requirements of a movement or organization.

Commander Marco Antonio Yon Sosa

In my assessment, because I have learned from my own experience and have myself suffered the effects of these phenomena, I would say that I have reached the conclusion that we have to view these three examples in a dialectic framework and realize that they could be necessary in certain very specific conditions or situations and that, nevertheless, they could be dialectically related. I will cite some examples:

Commander Marco Antonio Yon Sosa, whom we honor as a hero of the Guatemalan Revolution (in fact, we have given his name to one of the fronts that we have opened up), was not a complete leader, but he was a true peasant farmer caudillo who won over masses of people, often led them into battle and with them created the beginnings of a rebel awareness. Nevertheless, Marco Antonio Yon Sosa did not have the talents of a complete leader to create, organize and heighten this awareness among his own followers, to the extent of making them complete revolutionary activists. His contributions as a forerunner are unquestionable, and this is why we honor him.

There were other examples of bossism in other Latin American countries in the 1960's, examples that did a lot of harm because they did not meet the needs of the revolution in our time and in the situations that presented themselves.

Fidel Castro: Latin America

Aside from bossism, history has shown us several exceptional instances in which the talents of revolutionary leadership and understanding are centralized or combined in a single person. These are exceptions, however, and can hardly be taken as the general rule. In this connection, we can point to major historical figures such as Napoleon, Simon Bolivar and, in contemporary times, Fidel Castro, who does more than just meet the needs of the Cuban people. We could say that his combination of talents meets the needs of all Latin America. These exceptions cannot be regarded as a general rule. In other words, not all of our peoples can produce a Fidel Castro. Fidel is in a special category.

He is exceptional because he is the historical product of an era that is under way on our continent and that began specifically in Cuba with its heroic struggle. It would be a mistake, however, to assume that what happened in this case can be repeated on a smaller scale in the rest of our countries so that their political and military leadership is rounded out.

Collective Leadership in Guatemala

We feel that in our country we have to combine the capabilities of several comrades who have demonstrated throughout their struggle qualities that enable them to contribute to a collective leadership that can guide, promote and carry out the revolutionary process. We feel that this is a profoundly dialectic process, that the shifts from one category to another cannot be made mechanically and that they stem from a dialectic movement that is consistent with specific facts. We feel, therefore, that it is up to each movement and to the organization waging its struggle to select its kind of leadership and its own cadres.

Taking into account the harsh experiences that we suffered in the past, when certain bosses tried and even succeeded in taking hold of our movement, we have come to the conclusion that under present conditions in our country, given the development of the awareness and capabilities of our cadres, the best form of leadership is collective leadership. By looking into history, I have become aware that this is not the exception and that, in fact, it is almost the general rule. In other words, outstanding revolutionaries who do not have all-around abilities complement each other's talents and make truly extraordinary contributions in various spheres, contributions that are coordinated through simple mechanisms.

What I am thinking of is the historic and far-reaching example of the Bolshevik Party itself. We will recall that it had a Central Committee none of whose members had a specific post. Lenin's authority was real; it stemmed from his great political foresight, his great strategic genius, his handling of Marxism and his contribution to it, which has come to be called Leninism, in his honor. We will recall, nevertheless, that he held no formal post in its structure, but he did not have to. During the entire prerevolutionary struggle, the highest post he held was editor of ISKRA and later, when they took power, commissar of the people. But he was never, for example, secretary general of the Bolshevik Party, a position that was not instituted until after 1918.

This shows us that as great and as momentous a revolution as the Bolshevik Revolution could be directed without formal or individual positions. There was in-depth collective work, and thus collective leadership became one of the Leninist principles of operation. We feel, however, that profoundly dialectic historical laws cannot rely on just one formula; on the contrary, one category often hatches and gives rise to another. In other words, a leadership centralized in one individual because that individual is able to perform the functions of ideologue, organizer, political leader and military leader, could well give rise later to a collective leadership that not only complements him but also enables him to continue. Or the opposite could happen. A balanced collective leadership could produce among its own people and under very specific circumstances an outstanding leader in whom all these functions could be centralized because he has developed the talents needed to coordinate the roles entailed in a task as important as revolutionary leadership.

So then, by analyzing these past exploits and our own major frustrations that resulted from mechanical formulas, we reached the conclusion that simply and mechanically inventing positions and appointing comrades to fill them was not in keeping with the realities of life, the realities of individuals, the realities of history or the realities of collective operations and contributions. This is why one of our basic principles in the EGP is collective leadership. This is the guiding principle observed at every level of EGP organization. We consider this a general principle, although we do not rule out any other approach that might arise under other circumstances.

It is important for us to uphold and, furthermore, rationalize this principle. The unity of revolutionary forces that we have just now achieved would not have been possible in Guatemala, nor would it have been in Nicaragua or El Salvador, if we had not started with the principle of collective leadership, which at least for a time eliminates the possibility of centralized, one-man rule. As history has so often shown us, time and circumstances will tell whether a centralized, one-man rule is eventually necessary. What I do want to make clear is that our principles are a safeguard for us, so that artificial positions are not mechanically assigned to an individual who does not have the abilities to perform the comprehensive, centralized functions of an organization that has very great historic responsibilities. You cannot give powers to a person who cannot perform or who might later cause distortions and deviations leading to mistakes that could cost the revolutionary movement dearly.

One of the things that I try to remember and remind others of is that a centralized, one-man command of a revolutionary movement has always yielded poor results if the person does not have the necessary abilities. As I said, such leaders have to have special qualities, and for example, no one could deny that Commander Fidel Castro possesses them. He embodies the talents of a revolutionary leader not only for his own people but, as history has shown, for all of Latin America in many ways. In other words, the exception proves the rule. So, we feel that the exception cannot be made the rule, and this is what has led us to proceed cautiously according to our principles of profoundly democratic methods and collective leadership, one of whose norms is also internal criticism and self-criticism.

The principle of collective leadership has enabled us to complement the talents and abilities of our most outstanding cadres and to develop the talents and abilities of other cadres, so that we can have more and more comrades capable of performing vital functions for the leadership of the revolution, as well as raise and heighten their revolutionary awareness.

Your question also contains an indirect reference to the past failures of our revolutionary movement. I can assure you that there is collective leadership in Guatemala because of the needs and conditions not only of the EGP but also of our sister organizations and that the leadership of revolutionary unity, which has already been established, is collective too.

Vindicating the Indians

[Question] What has been and what is the role of the Indians in the revolutionary process in Guatemala?

[Answer] This is a particularly important element, and its historic roots are also very important.

The revolution, that is to say, the revolutionary forces, did not become aware of the importance of the Indians in Guatemala until the emergence of the armed struggle, the guerrilla struggle. I can say in all good faith and with no intention of underestimating or belittling the Democratic Movement of 1944-54, that the attitude then towards the Indians was still somewhat paternalistic. It was a mestizo revolution that wanted to vindicate the rights of the Indian, but from the viewpoint of the mestizo. I think that it is necessary, just and historic for the guerrilla movement in general and for the EGP in particular to totally vindicate the involvement of the Indian in the revolution. As revolutionary forces, we naturally have some differences in viewpoint in this regard, but we all start from significant practical experiences.

No guerrilla struggle is possible in Guatemala without the involvement of the Indians. We began systematizing the ideas that have enabled us to come up with quite constructive solutions to this problem, starting with our initial attempts at a guerrilla struggle in the Sierra de Minas when we founded the Edgar Ibarra guerrilla group in 1963. Some of us guerrillas who went into the mountains were of Achi origin, and their participation was of truly decisive importance. I should add that those of us in that guerrilla group instinctively realized that the Indians had to be completely integrated into the group, not just put beside the mestizos, discriminated against and treated unfairly.

There are several documents that record this new development. From that point on, we have thought about this and come to the conclusion that the Indians must take part physically in the guerrilla struggle in growing numbers to further develop our military and political forces and reverse the power balance vis-a-vis the enemy and defeat him; they must also, however, get involved in the area of culture and the nationalities. We thus began looking into the problem of the nationalities. Our first conclusion was that Guatemala is not a nationally integrated country. It couldn't be, because indigenous groups make up more than half of its population. In other words, because of their historic roots, their traits, their numbers and their relationship with nature, these Indian groups are, in fact, the true owners of our country, and though we mestizos are unquestionably part of the population, we are, in any case, derived from them. We are not trying to idealize the Mayan-Quiche peoples who gave rise to today's Guatemalans. No, this is just a quite realistic, consistent observation.

In studying some of the problems of the nationalities, including a great deal of scientific material from various places, we have realized that the problem of a national identity is a much more significant facet than people would like to think. The nationalities problem has not yet been completely resolved. It is not by chance that the constitution of the Socialist Republic of Vietnam clearly stipulates that Vietnam is a multinational state, even though ethnic minorities make up just 17 or 20 percent of the total population. Just imagine what it's like in Guatemala, where ethnic minorities make up more than half of the population. Guatemalans do not realize this, however. Guatemalans do not reflect this internal ethnic and cultural status, because they are being oppressed and exploited in shackles of domination by the exploiting classes and imperialism. For this reason, we have attached decisive importance to the involvement of the Indians, but no longer in just a paternalistic sense. On the contrary, we have said clearly that the revolution is impossible if the Indians are not part of it, but not just a mechanical, numerical part. They also have to be a human, cultural, ethnic part that contributes to the development of revolutionary Guatemala's physiognomy. In other words, the Indians have to be present in all aspects.

Because we are not idealists, we do not feel that the national cultures and ethnic groups that make up Guatemala are going to make contributions that are superior in many respects to those of other civilizations that have developed differently. Their contributions are undoubtedly going to be very important, however, and are going to help us resolve vital problems in forging a new and better Guatemala. Therefore, it is our feeling that the two driving forces of the Guatemalan revolution, which are often interconnected, are, on the one hand, the class struggle, the exploitation of our people, and, on the other, national integration, national identity, the ethnic problem, the contradiction that objectively exists when in a given territory there are groups that are not culturally and ethnically homogeneous and that have to have some sort of an arrangement for mutual relations, not just to coexist, but to become economically, politically, socially, militarily and culturally integrated, integrated without losing their identities.

We think that the revolution must resolve this problem, not the revolution as an abstract entity, the revolution that all of these groups undertake together, a revolution marked by and imbued with the traits of each group, in other words, a synthesis.

We can see that the countries that have taken care of national integration have done so through revolutionary processes in which they waged a war. We say this because only revolutionary war, with its accelerated, centripetal dynamics, can coordinate this process and lend it its true dimension. Any other effort, be it philosophical, academic or pedagogical, which is put forth through anthropological or cultural entities, is really futile. This process can be carried out only through much more dynamic, much more intensive, much more vital efforts, which in our case we consider to be revolution and the strategy of a revolutionary people's war.

This was the premise on which we began our rapprochement with the indigenous cultural groups in Guatemala; we also tried to distinguish between them and personalize them. We call the indigenous groups in Guatemala by their name. We respect their identity, we respect their personality. We call an Ixil an Ixil, a Cakchiquel a Cakchiquel, a Quiche a Quiche. When we refer to these peoples, we say the Quiche people, the Achi people, the Mam people, the Kanjobal people. We do not make generalizations, we do not call them Indians, we do not call them indigenous tribes.

We are acknowledging their personality, we are respecting their identity, an identity that they have defended over hundreds of years, preserving their languages, clinging to certain customs, certain rites, certain idiosyncrasies, a certain social system, certain methods of economic organization, which are not, however, common to all the indigenous peoples. Community habits are more developed in some than in others. You cannot wipe the slate clean. This respectful attitude towards our comrades in the ethnic and cultural minorities has been the premise on which we have been able to resolve, in practice, the problems that you now see being dealt with here. You have seen with your own eyes, right here, how our regular army and our regular units are made up of comrades of Ixil, Mam, Kanjobal, Quiche, Kekchis and Chuj origin. They have come together around revolutionary ideas, the struggle against oppression and exploitation. Without losing their personalities, they have joined together to form coordinated, cohesive groups with a single purpose. We have forced no one to adopt customs or language that are simply not theirs. Instead, we have tried to bring them together, coordinate them, give them an awareness of problems and ideas that transcend their differences, but this does not necessarily imply that they have to adopt uniform customs, language, etc.

You have seen that the general language of communication is Spanish, but at the same time the Ixils speak Ixil among themselves, and the same goes for the Kanjobals, the Mam, and Quiches, and us mestizos too, who are in the minority.

Multiclass and Multinational

So then, based on the premises that we have developed from our experiences, we have succeeded in systematizing a number of ideas and putting them into practice. Thus, we have been able to form an organization that is multiclass, on the one hand, and multinational, on the other. Free from contradictions. This does not mean that such contradictions are not going to or are not showing up to a minor degree or that they might not show up to a serious degree at some future point in the revolution, but the groundwork has been laid. As far as I am concerned, this groundwork is sound; 9 years of involvement in this campaign tell me so. You've seen the solution with your own eyes and heard it with your own ears. We have managed to resolve essential contradictions about fundamental ideas and premises, foremost among which are: the revolutionary people's war, the revolution and liberation from exploitation and ethnic-national oppression.

BRIEFS

HIGH UNEMPLOYMENT IN PETEN--Flores, Peten--A high unemployment index is noted in Peten Department, spurred on by several businesses which have completed their contracts and by others forced to discontinue their projects due to the closing of the border with Belize. COGEFAR Company, contracted to construct the Santa Elena airport, has let go more than 400 workers since the work was ordered and started by the president of the republic at a cost of 17 million quetzales. Another of the companies operating in Peten, MERIDIAN, has also laid off more than 200 employees. It was in charge of the construction and asphalt work on the Tikal Flores highway on which more than 9 million quetzales was spent. Lumber companies, including Buenos Aires, Maingua, and others, have been forced to lay off persons because closing the Belize border was financially hurting them. Many people, finding no work, have found it necessary to go into the heart of the Peten forest where they signed up for jobs with chicle contractors in the region. These are reasons why unemployment has been noted recently. The current situation has had repercussions on the economic status of poor families who hope the government will make further investments in this Department. TV CHANNEL FOR PETEN--Television Channel 10, soon to begin operations in Peten, will put an end to the systematic publicity influence of Mexican television on the citizens of the department, according to reports from authorities in the region. Channel 10 has been beaming its clear signals to Peten's central area. Its programs reportedly can be seen in Belize and in the Mexican border towns. The promoter for the National Agency for Economic Promotion and Development of El Peten (FYDEP), Col Jorge Mario Reyes Porra, said the programs to be broadcast will be limited to showing cultural and artistic richness and sports in a national context. "Our country," he indicated, "has a variety of range in these subject areas and it is fitting to make the details known to the people in El Peten. The FYDEP has accomplished the installation of this TV channel with resources obtained through savings achieved during the term of President Lucas Garcia." He said programs will be televised in color and that a link with Channel 5 will be pursued. Programming can be seen by Peten residents on Channels 4 and 10. Besides, this medium of communication will be free to put on live color programs and to transmit them at the same time. Colonel Reyes said for the time being only some Mexican TV channels, which are received blurred, can be picked up in Peten. Peten residents, he concluded, took this news in good spirit now that regular transmissions will start in a few days. [Text] [Guatemala PRENSA LIBRE in Spanish 24 Oct 81 p 6] 9908

ALIPO MEMBER DENIES RECEIVING CUBAN AID

San Pedro Sula LA PRENSA in Spanish 30 Oct 81 p 5

[Article by Fernandez Guzman: "It Is Not True That Fidel Castro Gave Money"]

[Text] "The report was published in the country in order to confuse international public opinion."

San Pedro Sula--Lawyer Fernandez Guzman characterized the report that was published by the Editors Press Service, Inc. and attributed to journalist Georgia Anne Geyer as "completely false" and said that its sole purpose was to confuse the citizenry and to distort the position of the People's Liberal Alliance (ALIPO) within the Liberal Party.

The report states that Cuban President Fidel Castro gave 6 million lempiras to the extreme left of the Liberal Party of Honduras in order to prevent next month's elections from taking place.

When questioned about this, Fernandez Guzman said that the report of course intended to involve the ALIPO. "I believe that the report appeared in our country for the purpose of distorting the position of our movement within the Liberal Party and to cause the citizenry to believe that we are trying to counter the electoral process, which is absurd...," he stressed.

He added that "the report is completely false for a number of reasons: in the first place because there is no extreme left within the Liberal Party; and in the second place because if we had had the amount of money that was mentioned, we could have carried out a publicity campaign that could have taken control of the party."

"We in the party cannot at any time be considered as extreme leftists, since the only thing that we advocate is the realization of a true concept of our political institution and the existence of a real democracy that will enable all of us as members to attain our rights. With respect to the economic position, the movement carries out its actions with the participation of those of us who sympathize with it," he said.

In the opinion of the political leader, it is very symptomatic that the above mentioned report appeared at the very time that the ALIPO opposed the internal elections of the party, which reaffirms his belief that this report was published in the country in order to distort and confuse public opinion.

"But in reality the opposition is only the result of the Tegucigalpa convention where the rank and file decided to express opposition for the purpose of correcting the great irregularities that occurred this past 12 July in the internal elections to fill party posts through popular election, when the principle of proportionality established by article 19 of the Electoral Law and of the Political Organizations was violated. The staff recorded by the Rodista Liberal Movement is therefore null and void and it will be up to the pertinent state organizations to handle the above mentioned legal provision," he added.

With respect to the likelihood that the interposed opposition will attain hoped for results, Fernandez Guzman said that "we trust that the National Electoral Board will construe the true meaning of the Electoral Law and that it consequently will clearly explain the manifested opposition, for the purpose of causing the leadership of the Rodista Liberal Movement to comply with the law.

PRI 1982-1988 BASIC PLAN AND PLATFORM SUMMARIZED

Mexico City EL DIA in Spanish 4 Nov 81 Supplement pp 2-11

[Text] 1982-1988 Basic Plan and Electoral Platform

Summary

Introduction

The party's Basic Plan Design and the Electoral Platform derived from it include the progress made in the National Planning System, the proposals from our party's sectors and organizations, and the intense, unified, militant efforts of the members of the IEPES [Institute of Political, Economic and Social Studies] Commissions. This document is a starting point for the phase of popular consultation which is beginning. It is a political document which will provide guidance for the people's participation in basic areas of national development.

I. For Reaffirmation of the Values of the Mexican Revolution

The Institutional Revolutionary Party confirms the goals of the rulers that it has brought to power, and realizes that history is not invented every 6 years. This organization has an obligation to maintain its fundamental principles, because the people believe in them, and because they are the values of our people. And it also has to forcefulness to articulate the new demands of its sectors, and to learn the desires of the majorities.

The Basic Government Plan includes the main proposals and orientation of the Total Development Plan which was devised and directed by President Jose Lopez Portillo personally. The central propositions of the Total Plan are essentially related to the principles that the party has always upheld. It is now incumbent on this organization to reaffirm its revolutionary orientation, and to organize the popular participation with regard to the people's old and new demands.

The Basic Plan is an essentially political document. It is primarily an ideological commitment. It is a recognition of the progress of a government of the revolution. It is a starting point for learning the people's sentiments, and the sentiments of the party's militants and organized forces.

National Design

The national revolutionary design is the one guiding the party of the revolution. We do not think that any intellectual creation nor any individual or collective endeavor could surpass what the people have expressed in their social struggles, their national struggles and their experience in participation.

Revolutions have aspirations, roots, moments and dialectics which are always unique, lending them grandeur and originality. The Mexican Revolution, which ranks among the great revolutions of the 20th century, contributed its own values and made them standards; it produced a mass participation which later became institutionalized; and it destroyed an outworn political system, creating institutions geared to its reality.

The propositions of the national design of the Mexican Revolution are fully effective: economic, political and cultural nationalism. Achieving justice along the path of liberty. The vigorous state of law emerging from a society at the height of a process of transformation. Democracy as a complete life style. The mixed economy, which guarantees the direction of development for the state and upholds social rights and individual liberties. The solidary internationalism which, without hostility or exclusiveness, associates Mexico in an active way through its principles. And democratic, popular legitimacy, as a constant confirmation of the Mexican Revolution's social pact. The party will continue to be the standard-bearer of these political principles; it will remain in the ideological vanguard of Mexico. The party of the revolution will continue to head the national design, through its ideological strength, its clarity of principles, the force of the popular organizations comprising it and its capacity for social mobilization.

The Constitution contains a national design: when it establishes the philosophical orientation that retrieves the best of Mexico's history, and gleans the desires of the majority; when it lays the groundwork to form the structures of a viable government; and when it proposes the types of government relations with the society that lead to democracy. The ideological foundations, the government structures and their relations with the society are mutually consistent. From an historical standpoint, they were brought up as proposals in a situation wherein even the territorial unity was being threatened, without linguistic unity and with many cultural confluences and contrasts, without political unity, and with incipiently developing social classes which could not propose to the nation a design that would be viable and acceptable to the society as a whole. The Constitution, as a product of the people, stipulates the grounds for achieving justice, within our territory and in the face of a complex international situation, along the path of liberty, and also for coming to grips with the enormous deficiencies from the standpoint of a democracy that benefits the majority and is backed by it.

The national design is consistent because its various elements are mutually compatible and because it establishes means for reconciling the social contradictions. It is feasible because it can be accomplished by means of a constant, systematic effort that will bring about radical changes, with a constant adaptation of the means to the circumstances that crop up, including the creation of new mechanisms. It is a design of popular origin, as befits a community which, in the exercise of its sovereignty, decided to shape its destiny by itself.

The constitutional design is a legal and political synthesis of the historic desires of Mexicans. It includes the fundamental political principles which have been proposed, ratified and developed by the great movements of the Mexican people, in their journey toward integration of the nationhood, political organization and sovereign affirmation. It takes from the revolution of independence the initial desire to exercise sovereignty and to form a free nation with an anticolonialist destiny; and it takes from the reform the affirmation of civil authority in opposition to the sectors that were challenging its legitimate supremacy, the secularization of the civil society, the making of a notably broad framework of individual liberties and their constitutional protection, and the liberation of property from old colonial patterns, by eliminating its amortization.

From the revolution of 1910, the constitutional design has taken the new concept of the purposes of the state, the transformation of the doctrine of human rights in search of balance among individuals, groups and the society into a dialectical synthesis, the mandate of creating the material conditions for implementing liberty, the bases for a mixed economy and the affirmation of the national entity. This evolution has occurred in a clearcut continuity of the various intervals of a single process of affirmation and advancement on the part of the Mexican people.

The constitutional scheme is one of social change; it is a revolutionary program dedicated to the transformation of the social structure, which will bring about not only a different class composition, but also new forms for the relations between the classes, with different bases and responsibilities, fitting into a common imperative for the general interest.

The Mexican revolution started with the principle of the people's right to restructure the sociopolitical system. The revolution, as a substantial transformation of the fundamental order of the state, was an act of sovereignty. The Constitution of 1917 followed the line of Mexican political thinking, recognizing the supreme source of power in the community, in the people. The principle of the people's sovereignty is the master key of the political system. From the Charter of Apatzingan to the Constitution of 1917, the people of Mexico have sought to translate their aspirations into legal standards and acts of government.

These are the philosophical principles of the Mexican revolution; they are the guide for the efforts of the government of the revolution in recent years; they are the ones included in the 1980-1982 Total Development Plan; they are the ones which will continue to guide the efforts for development in the years to come. They constitute the fundamental political decisions to which the people continue to adhere.

Today, our democratic existence demands reinforcement of the participation of the workers, farmers, popular sector and entire population in the decision-making and in the political life of the nation. We must continue to incorporate into political life anyone who so desires, and convince everyone that they should do so.

There is a need to intensify and expand the participation of the youth and women and, with their support, to lend politics an acknowledged commitment based on ideological conviction, authenticity, faithful dedication and moral integrity.

Mexico has younger generations who are willing to test the validity and effectiveness of the revolution's political ideology. They know that the viable path toward the nation's social advancement lies in revolutionary reaffirmation.

To lead the nation, with a democracy in a constant process of improvement, is a commitment of the party. With greater participation by the people in the political decisions, in the creation and enjoyment of culture and also in the processes of production and distribution, it will be possible to achieve the popular, representative democracy established by the ideology of the Mexican revolution. The correct route is the one decided on by the people, in which the people participate and which must benefit the people of Mexico.

II. Democratic Planning

Planning is a revolutionary task, because it is an exercise of reason, liberty and will for social transformation.

From its beginnings, the party set as a goal for itself the deliberate, directed transformation of the reality to construct a new society; that is why it has always supported democratic, participatory planning. That is why it devised the 1934-1940 Six-Year Plan for its candidate Lazaro Cardenas.

The party is revolutionary because it assumed the historic commitment to make a radical transformation in Mexican society based on the interests of the majority and on the historical conditions. That is why it included the need for planning in its Statement of Principles and in its Program of Action; and that is why it backs the significant progress in the establishment of a National Planning System that has marked the government of President Jose Lopez Portillo.

Planning means clearly setting objectives and goals based on the model of country to which we aspire; it requires a determination of strategies and priorities, as well as the allocation of resources, responsibilities and execution times, the coordination of efforts and the assessment of results.

The democratic planning of development is a tool which makes it possible to direct and arrange social change; and it is therefore a preeminently political process.

History has shown that social development does not occur automatically, and it has demonstrated the need for reorienting socioeconomic activities; with an effort, under the guidance of the state and in an atmosphere of liberty, to surmount the challenges and obstacles that impede the attainment of the major national goals.

This need for acting rationally and consistently has become more pressing for the developing countries, because they face the challenge of fulfilling social goals in a limited period of time, with increasingly meager resources, in a world wherein the fulfillment of needs is far more urgently needed than in the past, and wherein the gap separating progress from underdevelopment and poverty is increasingly large.

As has been admitted, not all the goals which emerged from the planning have been attained, although some have been exceeded; but the contribution from a National Planning System has been to direct the national effort for development with reason, order and liberty.

Under the concrete circumstances, the challenge for the party is to progress toward a more egalitarian society. For the party, the ultimate goal of democratic planning is human development and not growth in material things. The basic ideals demand the attainment of justice along the path of liberty.

The commitment to the popular majorities requires that the state, consistent with the terms established in the national design, maintain and intensify its role as a director, promoter, guide and manager of development. In the mixed economy system that is in force in the country, by virtue of a constitutional mandate, the state must intervene in areas that have assumed a strategic nature for the overall economic progress, and wherein its direct participation makes it possible to fulfill the public authority's responsibility in the production and distribution processes. Hence, the degree of that participation is determined, not on the basis of the number of areas and business firms in which it intervenes, but rather in terms of its social significance and the benefit to the people that it represents.

Planning is primarily nationalist, because it will solve the problems of Mexicans with the resources and efforts of Mexicans, and for their benefit. Planning takes place in the context of respect for liberty, but there is recognition of the inadequacy of private efforts to fulfill the national desires; therefore the state, within the context of democratic planning, must be the director of social change. Moreover, democratic planning, considered as a mere tool in the service of the major national goals, is backed by social consensus, expanding the people's participation, thereby becoming a vehicle for the country's nationalist, just and democratic progress. It is such insofar as it offers an explicit definition of the course of action to be followed, and a mechanism for evalutating the efficacy of the programs and action. It approaches the citizen and the different sectors of the society regarding priorities and proposals of general benefit.

The party recognizes and requires the directing function of the state, the expansion of opportunities for participation in development by the different sectors and the existence of a vast potential in the mixed economy system, provided it is geared to the principles of political philosophy of the revolution, and the guidelines set forth in the national development policy established by the government of the republic, as the nation's constitutional representative. There is a vast potential for increasing the social sector's participation in the economy.

The action of the public sector will continue to be bound to the guidelines of democratic planning; the mechanisms for coordination will be strengthened, so that the action on the various levels of government will contribute to the attainment of the goals of the national design; the handling of the economic and social policy will continue to prompt action by the social and private sectors, so as to make it consistent with those goals; ~~and~~, when action has been agreed upon with those sectors, the fulfillment of the commitments assumed will continue, and failure to fulfill them will be punished.

There will be an intensification of the total nature of planning, so as to hasten the social transformation. In order to strengthen its participatory quality, the planning will continue to include the three levels of government and the sectors which comprise the economy, with particular stress on the participation of the three sectors comprising the party of the revolution. In this way, the democratic nature of the planning will be maintained, and it will be directed toward fulfilling the desire of the majorities, with complete respect for the minorities' right of expression.

Planning is an irreversible process. The party asserts that, in Mexico today, development is inconceivable without planning. The nation's present and future eras require an increasingly rational and organized direction of the process of social change.

The central principle guiding the formation of the National Planning System does not lie in planning for its own sake, but rather as a tool in the service of the country's fundamental political and social goals.

The proposals of the government of the revolution have now been translated into a national system for planning development, backed by the extensive process of social reform, and at the same time tending to strengthen it, because it fosters a plural society, an orderly public administration and an economy in a genuine process of advancement.

The groundwork has been laid for democratic planning that must now be given an impetus as a higher phase of national development.

The conception, preparation and implementation of the plan must progress with increased political participation by the majority groups, expanding the people's commitments in the plan and to the plan. Democratic planning must be consolidated by becoming systematized from a legal and regulatory standpoint.

In brief, the party will strive to have democratic planning avoid the improvisation, waste and inefficiency caused by the unruly action of the market forces, without diminishing individual liberties and social rights. Hence, the ideological and political commitments required by the democratic, popular, nationalist and independent development upheld by the party will be expressed in a Total Development Plan which, based on the goals of the national design, will be the standard for action of the next government.

III. The Electoral Platform: a New Phase in the Revolution (Objectives and Strategies)

Objectives

The Institutional Revolutionary Party confirms the national objectives contained in the 1980-1982 Total Development Plan: independence, popular participation, employment and minimums for prosperity, growth and a fair distribution of income. In the new phase of the revolution, it reaffirms its principles, supporting them with an electoral platform which develops the main political, economic and social elements and those associated with international relations.

Strategy

Politics

1. Political Development

The Institutional Revolutionary Party will continue to foster the expansion and improvement of our democratic system, projecting the principles of political reform through the institutionalization of the political parties, proportional representation of the minorities, constant improvement of the electoral system, balanced cooperation among the authorities, intensification of federal and municipal political activity and complete effectiveness and regulation of the constitutional right to information.

2. Party

Since our organization is crucial to Mexico's political existence, it has proceeded to undertake an effort for reform and internal strengthening that will reaffirm the party's ideological function, expand its bases for articulating political and social demands, oversee the fulfillment of its programs, foster permanent, systematic relations with its popular representatives and members holding positions in different branches and on different levels of government, demand respect for revolutionary ethics and back the government programs. The best individuals in the republic will be selected for the positions chosen by the people and the government.

3. Popular Participation

The party will promote new types of participation for citizens in the nation's political activity, in the federated entities, the municipalities and the community. It will attempt to insure timely, concrete understanding of the social events supporting the common effort.

4. Granting Justice

It will foster the legal, administrative and cultural reforms leading to the most efficient granting of justice in its various aspects, so as to lend complete effectiveness to the individual guarantees and social rights established in the Constitution of the Republic, placing special emphasis on the principle of the equality of Mexicans before the law and the public administration.

5. Freedom of Speech

We shall continue to strive for the most complete respect for freedom of speech, as a necessary backing for the exercise of democracy, the formation of public opinion and the practice of liberty.

6. Federalism

Not only as a form of government, but also as a form of society, and a scheme for development: lending new vigor to the municipality; striving for its autonomy in all respects; strengthening its economy, giving it suitable relations with the state and federal governments and combating domination by political bosses.

Economy

7. A More Egalitarian Society

We advocate a viable economic strategy aimed at reorienting the patterns of accumulation, investment and production, for achieving total fulfillment of the demands of the majorities.

There will be continued promotion and expansion of the programs to increase productivity and training for employment. The revision of the legislation and the systems for control of monopolistic phenomena and the concentration of economic power will be fostered.

8. Intensification of the State's Capacity for Direction

Strengthening the state to meet the demands of a society at the height of its growth, and to effectively direct the social process toward the goals of national independence and justice.

Fomenting priority spending and reinforcing public enterprise, while eliminating excessive subsidies. Public spending will provide for the priorities, suitably rated and established on the basis of the objectives, and there will be an increase in the efficiency with which this is accomplished, through progress in administrative reform.

9. Democratic Planning

The party demands an intensification of democratic planning, to guide the nation's development through the National Planning System, so as to address the demands and aspirations of the majorities, and to harmonize the interests of the state, the workers and the businessmen of the nation, in order to hasten social change. Therefore, the National Planning System has been conceived in its total and sectorial aspects, so as to make it possible to guide the nation's economic and social activity as a whole, the economic activity relating to administrative sectors in particular and the activities of the parastate public administration.

The planning will be primarily nationalist, because we must solve the problems of Mexicans with our resources and our efforts, and for the benefit of Mexicans.

10. Reorienting the Productive Structure

Intensifying the production of basic goods that are socially and nationally necessary (with a particular impetus for domestic production of capital goods), as a requirement for attaining high rates of growth, with an increased generation of jobs.

Making a reality of the concept of total agrarian reform, and continuing with the Mexican Food System which is aimed at the goals of self-sufficiency in basic foods, improved nutritional levels for the people, higher employment rates, new nutritional education and the farmers' participation in the processing of agricultural products.

11. Employment and Gainful Wage

We pledge to increase the capacity for creating productive jobs that has been developed thus far, in order to implement the right to work established by the Constitution.

For this purpose, the party of the majorities will promote the incorporation into the Constitution of the gainful wage, that will allow for constant economic, social and cultural improvement of the working class, and higher levels of participation in the distribution of the national income.

12. Independence and Economic Relations With Other Countries

We shall not agree to be converted into an oil country. We shall attempt to establish an efficient association with other countries that will stimulate the modernization and efficiency of the productive apparatus, encourage non-oil exports, limit imports and gradually eliminate excessive protectionism, reduce the foreign debt, strengthen financial independence and cut the proportion of the national debt with respect to the GDP.

13. Foreign Investment

It will be subjected to the established legislation, and we shall attempt to aim it at projects with social priority. We shall avoid having its acceptance cause a substitution of already established national business firms, and we shall try to have its exporting at least equal the amount of foreign exchange that is sent abroad.

14. Financing of Development

Progressing with the strategy of new types of financing for development, by an intensification of internal savings and a reduction in the dependence on external savings. Two equally important elements are considered: the production and exporting of oil, which increases public savings by way of taxes, and PEMEX's [Mexican Petroleum's] own internal savings, and reduces the deficit in the balance of payments through foreign exchange income; and the improvement of the fiscal and financial instruments, basically the fiscal reform currently under way, the management of the public debt and the policy of public enterprises, which bolsters the national finances by means of cost-price adjustment and improvements in their productivity and administration.

15. Regional Development

By means of a decentralization of economic activity and human settlements toward the coasts and borders, the strategy is aimed at reducing the urban crowding, while at the same time attacking the excessive dispersion of small population groups.

16. Population

With complete respect for individual liberty, encouraging a reduction in population growth and rationalizing the territorial distribution of the population, through progress in the implementation of the policy on population and human settlements already devised, and support for family planning; also seeking to attain a more rational territorial distribution of the population and less rural-urban migration, achieved by greater prosperity for farmers.

17. Energy

The energy policy must be aimed at guaranteeing the supply and contributing to the overall independent development, fostering technological research and development, the efficient use of energy, and the development of new conventional and unconventional sources of energy to reduce internal dependence or that on hydrocarbons; while intensifying exploration, diversifying exports and helping to establish a new international economic order.

18. Curbing Inflation

When faced with such a complex national and international problem, we do not accept simplistic solutions. We are opposed to shock policies, and we shall strive by all means to avoid succumbing to a state of recession. We shall reduce poverty with the united attitude of the society's forces. This is a very serious political challenge which requires primarily that we continue the accelerated creation of jobs and income for the workers, and that we avert and combat speculation. We shall combat inflation with a general scheme, through participatory planning.

Society and Culture

19. Strengthening the Social Sector

Giving an impetus to training and social organization for work and the cooperative movement, as one of the most viable means for increasing the job opportunities and improving the workers' standard of living and productivity.

20. National Education and Culture

The orientation of education must abide strictly by the spirit of Article 3 of the Constitution, stressing its democratic and national nature. We shall use the news media to support a more rapid expansion of elementary and secondary education, and that for adults, as well as cultural dissemination programs in Central America, the Caribbean and border towns with a large Mexican population.

We shall attain the 10 years of basic education, and we shall improve its quality. With instruments such as the National Teacher Training University, we shall strive for the most complete gearing of education to social and production needs.

In the realm of culture, we shall espouse cultural nationalism as a requirement for political independence, as well as the development and participation of the people in the creation and enjoyment of culture. We shall retrieve cultural expression, and attach value to it through the news media.

21. Agrarian Reform

The fundamental principles of agrarian reform, stipulated in Article 27 of the Constitution, are irreversible. The types of land holding in the Constitution must be the basis for an organizational effort that will trigger the enormous potential of the rural people. We shall uphold the opportunities offered by the Law on Agricultural-Livestock Development to strengthen rural organization and to schedule action. We reject the large estate system as antisocial, and the small estate system as unproductive. The times demand organization of work to create production units as well as to protect the interests of the farmers.

22. Women and Youth

We are striving for greater participation by women in production, in our party's social organizations and in the nation's political life.

We shall continue to increase the opportunities, the numbers and the options for employment, so that the youth will find its personal and social fulfillment. With its participation, and its moral and revolutionary demands, we shall lend a greater impetus to the nation's construction.

23. Revolutionary Ethics

A renewed commitment will give politics an image marked by revolutionary ethics. Consistency with the revolutionary origins and necessities of present-day Mexico requires unchanging adherence to the law, as well as a greater dedication on the part of officials and citizens to the general welfare.

24. Concerted Action

There will be an increase in concerted action with the social and private sectors, and an intensification of the process of the people's participation in our development.

25. Quality of Life

It will be fundamental to the development strategy to meet the demands for food, health, security and housing. At the same time, an attempt will be made to create an environment that is more favorable to life, through greater attention to the ecology, clean environment, recreation, social tourism, sufficient and efficient transportation and urban safety.

Foreign Policy

26. Policy of Principles and Solidarity

Mexico assumes its political responsibility on the international and regional levels. We shall assume our responsibility in the areas with which we have the greatest proximity. With unchangeable principles, we shall uphold Mexico's moral authority and its major specific weight.

27. Respect and Unity

We demand of the highly developed countries fair treatment, respect and mutual dignity, total respect for the internal institutions and fair economic relations.

Toward the developing countries we project our consciousness of unity in defense and the proposal of common interests, which lends us a particular solidarity that we want to foster and translate into converging action and instruments.

28. World Energy Plan

We advocate the adoption of the World Energy Plan, as an expression of our principles of justice and solidarity, and as a practical means of constructing a new international order.

IV. National Development Policies

Political Development

There is no phenomenon that has had a greater effect on recent political activity than the political reform. The reform has strengthened the existence of the political parties, has encouraged the proportional representation of the minorities in Congress, had lent a new style to the cooperation among the branches of government in the union by bolstering the functions of the legislative branch and the state governments, has promoted the constitutionalization of the right to information and has been reflected in the guarantee and respect for unrestricted manifestation of freedom of speech and assembly.

Based upon the positive assessment of the political reform, it is now fitting to lend it a new impetus. Insofar as the party system is concerned, it must be admitted that sufficient social articulation has not been achieved. With a minority participation, the opposition parties have often curtailed their activity to detect and criticize the government's alleged or real mistakes. It is fitting to respect their activities but, in particular, to renew and modernize the majority party, and to pave the way for types of organization of a new variety that will address the needs of an increasingly urban society.

The party will have to engage in greater ideological activity, and will develop new types of articulation for demands and improved handling of the people's interests. Our party will have to continue its activity during the inter-electoral periods, and will be watchful regarding the administration of the officials that it has brought to power. We shall strengthen our party and modernize it, so as to continue achieving majority adherence to the principles of the revolution. Our organization will be an effective bulwark against reactionary pressure of any kind, both internal or from abroad.

As for the proportional representation in Congress, the latter will have to assume its constitutional responsibility as a representative of the national sovereignty with increasing fullness. The pertinent organic legislation must be passed to include the new methods and advances of the political reform. The responsibility of the Congress must be accompanied by advice and greater technical backing for the people's representatives.

We shall continue to give an impetus to the updating of the electoral system, so that elections will be increasingly fair, so that there will be greater participation, so that abstention will decline and so that political activity will be bolstered. Democratic life must be enhanced not only on the federal level, but also, definitely, on the local and municipal level.

To make a reality of the principle of the right to information, the state has created a National System of Statistical and Geographical Information, the law for which requires giving information to the community. There is now a need to pass the law regulating Article 6 of the Constitution, which involves the various aspects of this right, but totally upholds freedom of speech and expression of ideas.

Foreign Policy

The principles of the foreign policy are firm and unchangeable. They have a practical application. The policy based on principles, under the new conditions in Mexico and the world, has increased Mexico's specific weight in the community of nations. The moral authority has been reflected in greater respect for Mexico.

Consistent with its national philosophy, the party maintains that it is not enough to attack the external manifestations of conflicts and their instruments, but that action must be directed toward the deepseated causes of the hostility: poverty, hunger, unhealthy conditions and injustice. There must be an active peace, which is not merely the absence of war; a peace established as a requisite for eradicating injustice and attaining the advent of prosperity for all. A passive peace, based on the balance of terror, puts off the solution to the needs of the world's majorities.

Armed Forces

The party voices its recognition for the loyalty and patriotism of the Armed Forces, which have guaranteed the nation's security and backed the strengthening of the country's political and social institutions.

The loyalty of the Army and the Air Force, as well as of the Navy, to the republic and to democracy is unchangeable. This is the source of the people's respect and affection for them. The Armed Forces of Mexico have made a serious effort to modernize, placing special emphasis on military education, greater autonomy for their supplies and cordial communication between the civilian and military personnel of the Federal Government.

On the basis of the Constitution, and as an intrinsic part of the revolutionary state, the Armed Forces have taken the orientation and traditions which have exalted them and lent them a specific essence in each phase of national development. The specific functions currently associated with these institutions of the nation are established in the pertinent regulatory laws.

Granting Justice

There can be no total development nor fulfillment of the political values of the Mexican Republic without an efficient system for granting justice. This is a fundamental goal of the development strategy proposed by the party.

We claim the need for strengthening the system for granting justice, so that it may contribute to a greater extent to the implementation of the national design. Adherence to the law, and to the division of authority was conceived by the revolution as a means for guaranteeing, in addition to human rights, social rights, and mainly those of the working class in the rural and urban areas.

Social Development

As demanded by all sectors of the party, the distribution of income and employment are the basic priority for development, and are being backed by the elimination of the structural imbalances in the economy. In this way, economic development is being strengthened and consolidated with social justice.

However, the goals of justice and equality that our revolutionary leaders proclaimed have not been fully and completely attained in our country. Morelos' proclamation to reduce wealth and poverty is still fully valid. The desire and effort to achieve them have never declined. On the contrary, it is our party's intention to increase and organize our efforts to change the real social structures which have prevented us from becoming a more egalitarian society. This is the present challenge.

Therefore, we advocate a strategy which, with complete economic viability, will be aimed, as a priority, at reorienting the patterns of accumulation, investment and production, so that the results thereof will be distributed more fairly, to achieve the total fulfillment of the basic demands of the majorities, particularly in the areas of food, health, education and housing (which means a plan of extensive scope), and to lead the country toward the prompt, definitive solution of the basic shortages affecting the population, within the essential dimensions of the national design.

In a situation marked by increased employment and gainful wages, the demand for the elements of a decent life will necessarily increase, both in quantity and quality. There will be a continued promotion and implementation of programs to increase productivity and training for employment, and encouragement will be given for the revision of the legislation and systems to curb monopolistic phenomena and concentration of economic power.

The party of the majorities will strive to incorporate into the regime's Constitution the gainful wage, that will allow for the constant economic, social and cultural improvement of the working class, and higher levels of its participation in the distribution of the national income.

The Institutional Revolutionary Party backed and will continue to back the strategy of the Mexican Food System, as a totalizing program and an instrument for complete planning in the food area, that proposes goals and action in the fields of agricultural and livestock, fishing, commercial and industrial policy, and the policy on basic food consumption, as well as an improvement in the levels of organizations, especially in the cooperative area, to benefit both consumers and the small and medium-sized producers.

During the coming years, the challenge will be formidable: The growth of the population, which is still high, combined with the lag to be surmounted, demands an effort to provide each and every one of our fellow countrymen with the quantity and quality of food and essential basic products to achieve a minimally satisfactory diet, as well as to engage fully in their economic, political and social activities.

The Institutional Revolutionary Party lends its support to the program for integration of the public health services, for effective, timely provision of service to benefit the majorities. All Mexicans must have access to the health and social security systems, as a fundamental element for welfare and equality.

There must be total backing to make education available to all Mexicans. Otherwise, the integration into the benefits of the nation's development and democratic life would be hampered and the most valuable principles of our revolution would be betrayed.

The cultural policy that is proposed has a high rating. With a clear concept of what we are and what we can be, there will be an effect on the production and distribution processes, as well as on political participation.

Popular culture must be developed which will influence coexistence, work and the necessary recreation, including the enjoyment of life and its quality.

Cultural nationalism is an essential requirement for the nation's political independence. We must be alert to preserve and enhance it, and to increase the people's participation in its formulation and enjoyment.

The possession of decent housing is a fundamental element in basic human rights. The great, disorderly development of our cities, combined with high population growth rates, has brought about a considerable increase in housing needs. In order to make this aspiration of the great majorities a reality, the party demands total coordination in providing this service, as well as a concentration of action aimed at housing of social interest.

Dealing with the housing problem involves territorial organization, the use of urban land, and the provision of urban infrastructure, equipment and services; in other words, the development of a "habitat" such as is demanded by our nation's majorities.

The party claims that the economic progress is justified only when it is translated into actual improvements in the quality of life of Mexicans; hence the most pressing concern of the social policy, in its various categories, actions and goals, must be to achieve the most effective and successful mobilization that is possible of public, social and private resources, to give all Mexicans the capacity to meet their needs, converting them into demands based on the fulfillment of the social rights established in our laws.

We consider the environment our patrimony and that of future generations. Consequently, we shall strive to implement policies for a clean environment that will improve and preserve the ecological balance, reforestation in the rural areas and the expansion of green areas in the urban sections. We shall also strive for sufficient, effective transportation, that will reduce the levels of urban crowding, the smog and noise and, in general, environmental pollution, for the benefit of the urban and rural majorities.

For the Indian population, the party proposes greater participation in production and in the benefits of national development, fulfillment of the basic needs of the ethnic groups, an increase in the capacity to protect their individual and social rights and an intensification of the national consciousness, through respect for ethnic pluralism.

The solution to alienation must be one of the main concerns of the social policy, that will translate the precepts of political philosophy into action for employment, welfare and attention for neglected groups. This is not an attempt to subsidize indefinitely the consumption of the lower-income groups, but rather to produce the conditions whereby they themselves can become fully incorporated into the fruits of national development, chiefly through full-time employment.

The economic, political and social implications of a high rate of demographic growth require a curbing of the population growth by means of family planning, which has unlimited respect for the right of each couple to decide in a free and informed manner on the size of its family.

There must be a continued reinforcement of the demographic policy, so that by the year 2000 our population will have an annual growth of 1.0 percent. For this purpose, it will be necessary to intensify the action for family planning, particularly in the areas where the fertility indexes are still at rates similar to those of the 1960's.

Federalism and Regional and Urban Development

Our party will not spare any effort to enable us to gain, increasingly, the capacity to decide upon and carry out the solution to problems in the areas wherein they occur. The governments emanating from the revolution, aware that the process of federalization in turn demands a decentralization of functions, have decentralized, and will continue to decentralize the exercise of their authority, considering geographical and sectoral features, and those of other types, so that the authority will be implemented and the services rendered with greater efficacy, and in a manner more closely associated with those demanding them.

The Economy

From the most deepseated crisis of recent times, Mexico is now passing, under the accurate guidance of President Jose Lopez Portillo, through an historical threshold which brings with it the political, economic and social opportunity to fully complete the design which the Revolution of 1910 promised and which our Constitution establishes.

It should be reiterated that the economy has grown and is still growing; and the growth has been qualitatively different, generating employment and, with a sectorial reorientation, increasing the importance of the basic goods demanded by the popular majorities.

Nevertheless, we admit that the productive structure shows imbalances and inadequacies. The oil sector, that of capital goods, the production of durable goods and certain branches of the non-durable consumer goods production are evincing an accelerated dynamism, and the agricultural-livestock sector has become revitalized. However, other sectors are lagging and inadequate, such as transportation and the production of certain basic products and raw materials. These sectorial maladjustments cause distortions in productive activity that are intolerable over the medium term and incompatible with the fundamental goals to meet the basic demands of the popular majorities and to generate jobs. The party will strive, on the basis of the general features of the plan, to eliminate these distortions and to preclude monopolistic practices in the industrialization process.

The attainment of the goals of the revolution's popular, democratic, national design requires a balanced productive structure geared to meeting the real needs of the population. Therefore, the party will see to the correction of these imbalances which are real obstacles to the development with justice and liberty that we advocate.

Sectorial

Agrarian reform does not mean merely distributing land, although this is still a primary, fundamental step. Nor should it consist of the creation of small farming units, lacking all resources and types of organization which are essential for a rational, efficient and fair exploitation of the land. Agrarian reform also means a redistribution of productive resources.

The party claims that the farmers should receive, along with the land and for their collective and communal organizations, a supply of productive resources for working it; including a technological package geared to their needs, that will lay the groundwork for their progressive, autonomous capitalization. Scientific and technical professionals should go to the rural areas in higher quantity and quality.

We shall see to it that the fishing development strategy is geared to the rational exploitation of the maritime potential and aquiculture, and that there is an inducement for consumption of food from the sea and the interior waters, as a means of meeting the basic food needs of the nation's majority population.

The fishing policy must convert this industry into a major support for the diversification of food for popular consumption and for self-sufficiency in food.

We claim that, in the future, the industrial sector will continue to play a leading role in the progress of our national design, and will have great challenges. It will have to create, to a greater extent, full-time, well-paid jobs for the growing population, in addition to continuing the high rate of growth in production during a period of slow world growth.

In a very special way, it must achieve greater production of goods for popular consumption, and do so with more efficiency, so as to raise the population's level of prosperity and improve the purchasing power of wages.

The party is concerned with balancing the market structure. We shall battle against the tendency toward oligopolic concentration in the most dynamic industries, and we shall foster the association of big business with small and medium-sized business. We shall strengthen and support small industry, through a total development program that will afford it greater access to the mechanisms available for fiscal, financial and technological backing.

It is incumbent on the state enterprises to play a basic role in the qualitative change in the economy during the years to come. They will contribute to capital formation in strategic branches of industry, and to the supply of popular consumer goods that must be fostered to support the living standard of Mexicans. The programs to expand the public enterprises will encourage investment in other priority sectors by offering a greater supply of the goods which they manufacture, and will bring about a greater demand for national machinery and equipment.

The energy policy must seek: a guarantee of a timely supply of energy to meet the internal demand, and thus contribute to a high rate of steady, complete and independent economic development; an impetus for technological research and development, so as to lay the groundwork for increased independence from other countries; the efficient use of energy; a reduction in internal dependence on the use of hydrocarbons, through the development of alternate energy sources, both conventional and unconventional; an intensification of exploration as a means of increasing the knowledge of the country's energy resources, thereby guaranteeing the constant determination of its potential; diversification of hydrocarbon exports, in order to benefit the largest possible number of economies; and demonstrating the feasibility of undertaking action aimed at establishing a new international economic order, the base of support of which will be the responsibility and commitments assumed by the entire human race.

An improvement in the standard of living of Mexicans and the nation's development will be possible if we convert commerce into an effective distribution system that will provide consumers with the necessary goods at prices within the reach of the majority; a commercial system that will spur the total effort aimed at the creation of guidelines for production and consumption geared to the potential and needs of the country's majority population.

We want a massive supply of basic products, low prices, timeliness in the popular supply and a definitive elimination of excessive middlemen, reducing to a maximum the gap between producers and consumers.

The essence of tourism must be changed, directing it primarily toward an improvement in the living standard of the working class, and making the right to recreation a reality. It is also necessary to insure that tourism becomes a leading source of income and self-improvement for the residents of the centers in which this activity takes place.

In this regard, the decisive impetus for social tourism as a means of prosperity for the lower-income social groups has emerged as a requirement of justice. For this purpose, we propose the establishment of a National Social Tourism System, with the joint participation of the state and the social sector.

In order to achieve the development that the country requires, the efficient, rapid and timely mobilization of the work force and of socially and nationally necessary goods is an indispensable operation.

For all these reasons, we shall strive to implement a total national program for the transportation system in Mexico which is consistent with the goals of development, which fosters and streamlines transportation in all its branches and which makes them complementary.

Instruments of Development

Public spending is a key factor for attaining the great national goals, because it is one of the most active and effective instruments for guiding and regulating the process of economic and social development.

With a policy directed toward such goals, in recent years satisfactory results have been accrued on the whole; however, it must be pointed out that there has not been a complete and exact adaptation to the goals which had been set.

The party indicates that the action aimed at increasing productivity and efficiency in public spending must be intensified, through the mechanisms of budget-programing and with greater attention to its follow-up and evaluation. The control of spending must be improved with a suitable regulatory and accounting system, redoubling the efforts for vigilance to eliminate corrupt practices.

The history of our social movement confirms that the public enterprises, rather than being a fortuitous accumulation of improvised acts of government, constitute the most important economic, social and political legacy that the state of the revolution has given to the people of Mexico, and are the result of a prolonged effort, a nationalist continuity and the unusual historical vision of the organized Mexican society.

The major increase in the state's participation, mainly through its sector of enterprises and agencies, has to a great extent determined the country's socioeconomic evolution.

The strategy adopted in the area of public enterprises has in recent years made it possible to improve the economizing in a large number of them, although the goals have not been met in others. The development of public enterprise must take into consideration the distribution of costs among the consumers of the goods or services, through suitable prices and rates, and the efficient, productive responsibility of the enterprises on their two levels, namely, the administrative management and their workers.

In establishing the goals in the area of public enterprises and agencies, the party stresses that a preeminent requirement is the intensification of the state's role as a guide and promoter of Mexico's socioeconomic development and, in this context, a continued assumption of responsibility for the development of the strategic sectors. The state must also provide for those areas of social interest which the private sector cannot or does not wish to cover; for which purpose it will have to develop them by itself, with the aid of other sectors of society.

There must be a strengthening of the fiscal administration, to eliminate shortcomings that cause a low tax burden, and a continued improvement in fiscal coordination with the federated entities.

We must strive for a tax reform that will restore sufficient revenue to the state which will enable it to perform its guiding function without worsening the social situation of the majority classes. There must be a tax policy to benefit the working classes. We must also avoid tax evasion and loopholes.

During the past few years major efforts have been expended to reorient the policy of tax incentives directly toward the promotion of employment. Although progress has been made, there are still problems involving dispersion, lack of precision in the priorities and contradictory goals, as well as administrative problems.

The tax incentives must be rationalized to prevent their becoming additional profits at the expense of the national treasury, without compensation to the society in terms of employment and reductions in price levels, and so that they may be used for purposes of regional development in neglected or national priority areas.

In order to give the goals and results of the tax incentives and their association with the management of the public sector greater visibility, the party proposes that an explanation be given in the public accounts rendered annually to the Congress, in greater detail, of the results of the policy of tax incentives, its costs and its benefits.

The policy on debt must be kept consistent with the needs for financing imports, avoiding an excessive accumulation of foreign exchange. Moreover, the policy for putting public finances on a sound footing should help to bolster the revenue of the public sector itself, resulting in a greater release of funds for the investment of the social and private sector, and in a gradual reduction of the increase in the public foreign debt.

The party maintains that the financial policy must promote an institutional management of the financing entities, which are merely a right granted by the state, and achieve greater balance in the structure of the system through the strengthening and backing of intermediate groups in a sound condition. There must also be an improvement in the rules aimed at decentralizing the assets of the financing entities and in the rules to prevent a concentration of credit.

There is also a need to strengthen and modernize the national credit institutions, the mixed banks and the workers' banks, and to give the popular classes greater access to the available financing.

The party is of the opinion that a more balanced structure for the system should be supported by lending greater emphasis to the insurance system and the stock market, while at the same time stimulating sources of long-term financing.

A revision should be made in the orientation of the policy of selective control of credit, and it should be adjusted so as to improve its coordination and contribution to the priorities of national planning. Furthermore, the policy on interest rates should preclude excessive profit margins and excessive differences between the active and passive rates, which only harm the majorities.

Efforts will be redoubled to oversee and control banking operations, and forceful action will be taken against bad management and fraud. There will also be an attempt to prevent the bad management of banks from having an effect on backing, thereby burdening the public treasury.

The balance of payments problem demands taking action to efficiently link the national economy with the international one, to rationalize protection and imports, to promote exports; to implement an international strategy for Mexican foreign trade; to use the public sector's purchasing power in relations with other countries, and to stimulate the commercial development of the border areas and free trade zones.

The party proposes that Mexico continue its policy of diversifying trade relations with different parts of the world, avoiding dependence on the United States, seeking to increase its relations with all countries and striving for a revaluation of raw materials and greater equity in world trade. Priority will continue to be given to the intensification of economic and commercial relations with Central America and the Caribbean, and to the pursuit of the potential for economic integration of Latin America.

The overall long-term goal of achieving self-determination in the area of science and technology should not be confused with autarchy, but rather should be interpreted as the fostering of a national capacity for generating, disseminating, selecting, adapting and applying scientific and technical knowledge, consistent with the possibilities and requirements of the aforementioned development strategy.

Foreign investment must be stringently subjected to the legal provisions and priorities for development. It can contribute to the modernization of the country's economic apparatus, once the foregoing requirements are met. Three criteria should govern the foreign investment that is subject to our laws: It must generate new sources of jobs, it must provide new technology and it must support the opening of markets for Mexican exports.

Few problems hurt the society so seriously as inflation, because it is felt primarily by the majority groups, making daily purchases of the goods and services that they require. Priority attention must continue to be given to the lines of action intended to protect and increase the prosperity of the popular classes, without entailing a setback in the economic process, and in the generation of jobs.

The party maintains that the anti-inflationary policy must seek the causes which bring about the inflationary process in the structural problems of the economy and the society; in the time-lag between a growing public and private aggregate demand and a supply of goods and services which has not progressed at the same speed as the former; in the effects of international inflation on the economy; in the burdensome nature of the commercial system; and in the current maladjustments which are reflected in speculative activities that bring wealth to a few to the detriment of the majority.

Therefore, it is impossible to solve such a difficult problem with simplistic, partial measures.

In the battle against inflation, all the tools at the state's disposal must be used, preferably the promotion of the internal supply and the modulation of the demand, and a trade policy with forceful measures to prevent and combat speculation and to correct regional and seasonal shortages in supply.

This problem very clearly points to the need for a participatory planning system, as an instrument whereby the policy to combat inflation will be carried out.

The foregoing summary of the Basic Plan Design and the Electoral Platform shows that they are political documents establishing the general guidelines for undertaking the national, popular consultation on democratic planning. These documents confirm the political principles of the Mexican revolution; they show the progress of a government of the revolution, systematized in the Total Development Plan; and they project and strengthen them for the new decade that we are already traversing.

With these principles and this platform, and with the best man of the revolution, our candidate, Miguel de la Madrid, the country's majorities, in the electoral contest which is approaching, will again confirm their adherence to the most vanguard position: that of our party, that of the Mexican revolution.

MAGAZINE WARNS ABOUT 'MILITARIZATION' OF CABINET

PY130138 Lima MARKA in Spanish 30 Oct 81 pp 12, 13

[Excerpts] The departure--a predictable one--of Minister De La Jara sounds a warning which should be listened to. In his letter of resignation the former minister stressed his democratic convictions which we, from a position opposed to the government of which he was a member, respect and extol. His convictions explain De La Jara's departure.

De La Jara clearly stated that his resignation has to do with the killing of a university student in Cuzco on 23 October, an event which "offends my democratic conscience." As others, that killing resulted from the actions of the repressive forces which are subordinated to the Interior Ministry.

An economic policy which has condemned the large majority of the people to a continuous process of impoverishment and drove thousands of Peruvians into unemployment could not but lie at the root of the social crisis which is wracking the country. And this crisis is destabilizing the government of architect Belaunde.

In the midst of this difficult situation, the interior minister has resigned and been replaced by a retired general who had been holding the post of air force minister. Furthermore, three military ministers have been replaced by three new ones, Gen Luis Cisneros Vizquerra, Vice Adm Jose Carbajal Pareja and Lt Gen (ret) Jose Garcia Calderon.

The appointment of the "gaucho" Cisneros--whose family connections with Prime Minister Manuel Ulloa were pointed out--had already been mentioned months ago. It seems quite ironic that the best interior minister of the dictatorship, the person who closed down newspapers, who arrested members of the opposition due to family connections or other less advisable connections should become the war minister of Belaunde's regime. What a country!

The arrival of the military is the answer to the anxious request for the establishment of order in the country. The saddest part of this is that this request is made precisely by those who should establish an order capable of overcoming the suffocating situation which is spreading throughout the country. Yes, we already know all about it, we have seen this skit before: together with the strong-handed military will come the strong measures and this hardening will result in a sort of dictatorial political regime handed to us in the wrappings of a democratic election.

With Da La Jara we lose an honest democrat, with Gan Cisneros a true dictator joins the cabinet. By simple deductions the results could not be clearer: democracy has lost with the government's militarization.

ECUADOREAN PLANE PURCHASE--Lima, 18 Nov (LATIN-REUTER)--Aeronautics Minister Jose Garcia Calderon asserted here that Peru will have to compensate the balance of forces with Ecuador, should that country acquire the K-fir fighter planes which are built by Israel under a U.S. license. During his first meeting with the media 3 weeks after assuming his post he stated that it is regrettable, but it will be necessary to take that measure. The minister, who talked to journalists after a meeting with President Fernando Belaunde Terry, pointed out that the Ecuadorean purchase will force Peru to do the same, which would mean spending treasury funds which could be better used in the country's development. At the beginning of the year after mutual accusations of territorial violations there were armed clashes between Ecuador and Peru in an undemarcated border zone. DEMONSTRATION BROKEN UP--Serious incidents involving some 80 municipal workers who have been on strike for 13 days took place yesterday near the municipal palace in Lima. The police were forced to use antiriot vehicles to break up the demonstration. The events took place when a large group of demonstrators arrived at the municipal palace accompanied by (?leftist) senators Jorge Del Prado and Genaro Ledesma Izquieta who offered to mediate between the workers and the municipal authorities. The senators were not allowed to enter the municipal palace and this led to a struggle between the workers and security personnel. The struggle ended in a fistfight. The police were forced to break up the demonstration by aiming streams of water at the workers. In the end senators Del Prado and Ledesma met with Lima mayor [words indistinct] who told them that he was willing to take their demands into account, that is: withdrawal of the official charges against worker (Antalio Quisana) and other workers; reinstatement of dismissed workers and resumption of talks with the leaders of municipal workers. FORMER COLOMBIAN PRESIDENT INTERVIEWED--Lima, 15 Nov (AFP)--Former Colombian President Carlos Lleras Restrepo said here today that his country's democratic regime is firm and that it is not staggering under the growing terrorist activities. Lleras, who arrived here to attend the 19th conference of executives which opens tomorrow, said that democracy in his country has a good basis despite divisions in political parties and that the main threats to democracy in the Americas are social inequality and the complexity of current economic conditions. Regarding the purchase of airplanes by Venezuela, he said that Colombia is not concerned about it but what really concerns Colombia is when other countries try to emulate Venezuela's purchase of planes. He also denied that Colombia has taken an interventionist attitude in El Salvador but explained that his country did oppose the French-Mexican declaration regarding the internal affairs of Central America. Regarding terrorism he said that this is a difficult problem to deal with because it varies from one country to another but that as much effort as possible must be made to enforce respect for the law and human rights. He went on to say that the role of the armed forces is to maintain the constitutional order. He also denied that he has been proposed as a candidate for the presidency. This is something I do not want, he said. [Text] [FY171329 Paris AFP in Spanish 1937 GMT 15 Nov 81]

COOPERATION WITH NETHERLANDS--Planning Minister Ricardo Martinez visited the Netherlands on 12 and 13 November and met with the ministers of economy and agriculture. They reviewed cooperation programs between the two countries. The minister reported that the Netherlands is interested in cooperating in the naval industry, in an agricultural master plan for the oil producing zone of the Orinoco and in irrigation and water and soil projects. That country has a great deal of experience in these areas which could be adapted to Venezuela's needs. Cooperation agreements between the two countries could be signed in January 1982. Materials from foreign-language sources are translated; those from English-language sources are transcribed or reprinted, with the original phrasing and other characteristics retained.

Headlines, editorial reports, and material enclosed in brackets [] are supplied by JPRS. Processing indicators such as [Text] or [Excerpt] in the first line of each item, or following the last line of a brief, indicate how the original information was processed. Where no processing indicator is given, the information was summarized or extracted.

Unfamiliar names rendered phonetically or transliterated are enclosed in parentheses. Words or names preceded by a question mark and enclosed in parentheses were not clear in the original but have been supplied as appropriate in context. Other unattributed parenthetical notes within the body of an item originate with the source. Times within items are as given by source.

The contents of this publication in no way represent the policies, views or attitudes of the U.S. Government.

PROCUREMENT OF PUBLICATIONS

JPRS publications may be ordered from the National Technical Information Service, Springfield, Virginia 22161. In ordering, it is recommended that the JPRS number, title, date and author, if applicable, of publication be cited.

Current JPRS publications are announced in Government Reports Announcements issued semi-monthly by the National Technical Information Service, and are listed in the Monthly Catalog of U.S. Government Publications issued by the Superintendent of Documents, U.S. Government Printing Office, Washington, D.C. 20402.

Correspondence pertaining to matters other than procurement may be addressed to Joint Publications Research Service, 1000 North Glebe Road, Arlington, Virginia 22201.

PRISON GETS SOLAR HEATING SYSTEM

Santiago EL MERCURIO in Spanish 1 Nov 81 p C 4

[Text] A modern solar energy system, started by the French, will be responsible for providing hot water and heating to the 1,328 prisoners who will be sheltered at the Metropolitan Center for Social Rehabilitation, located along the San Martin International Highway in Colina.

The time limit of 320 days to construct the project, all of whose buildings are now ready, expires on 27 November. The investment, which comes from treasury funds, is $18 million.

EL MERCURIO yesterday made a tour of the various sections of the model prison accompanied by engineer Sergio Rivas of the Delta construction company, which is building the prison.

Small City

The Metropolitan Center for Social Rehabilitation already has the look of a real city. With its perfectly developed streets it is divided into three areas, which are defined according to their use and location. These areas are: administrative; job, education, religion and education; and a third area assigned for the prisoners' bedrooms.

Sergio Rivas pointed out the character that was imparted to the project to "effectively" achieve a center for rehabilitation. In this regard, Rivas emphasized the existence of a transparent circle that in the shape of a C surrounds 80 percent of the grounds, allowing the prisoners to see the beautiful countryside where the prison is located.

Currently the Delta company is finishing the details on each building and setting up some gardens and surfaces allotted for the prisoners' recreation.

Behind the administrative and personnel block, through which visitors will enter, we also find completed the buildings of the diagnostic and treatment unit, the hospital, the covered gymnasium, the big dining room, the kitchen and laundry, the thermal power station and warehouses, a school, the church, the industrial and crafts workshops, the six dormitory buildings and the stadium with grandstands and grassy courts.

This whole complex adds up to a constructed surface of 31,000 square meters, which was built in a record time with the participation of 700 persons plus the team of professionals who planned the project and were responsible for its execution.

Solar Energy

Despite the prisons's having various features that, according to its builders, make it one of the most modern and complete in Latin America, attention is drawn to the system of solar plates installed on the six dormitory buildings and on one of the warehouses of the prison.

The function of these solar plates is to provide hot water and heating to the prisoners, through a system that will pay for itself in a few years because of its great usefulness to the prison population, according to sources.

Security

The prison is surrounded by a mesh circle made of a "highly resistant" material. It includes two parallel lines separated by a space of 15 meters, called the "security area," where it is believed that magnetic fields and television cameras will be installed to avoid escapes.

Together with this, surveillance booths provided with a radio system are distributed throughout the perimeter of the rehabilitation center.

It is believed, moreover, that the prison will start to operate in the early months of 1982, as soon as they are finished equipping it, and as soon as the guards, who are already familiarizing themselves with the buildings' features, have finished their training period in the modern structure.

WORK BEGINS ON COLBUN MACHICURA HYDROELECTRIC PLANT

Santiago EL MERCURIO in Spanish 6 Nov 81 p C 12

[Article by Eliecer Villarroel Medina]

[Text] Talca--Tomorrow work will be underway on the contract for ENDESA (National Electric Power Inc) by the Chilean Spanish consortium Inela-Huarte to build the structures of the Colbun-Machicura hydroelectric complex, which will return the waters of the Maule River, restoring them to irrigation.

The consortium consists of the Chilean construction company Neut Latour and the Spanish firm Huarte, and the contract is for $42 million.

As a result of the hydroelectric works, which require the building of artificial dams in Colbun and Machicura on the Maule River, irrigation of the area presently served by the North Maule and South Maule systems will be changed.

The return of the waters and the restoring of irrigation will increase the possibility of available water supply for about 200,000 hectares.

The new system will consist basically of a master canal that will receive the flow of the river from the discharge of the Machicura power station and through delivery from the Colbun dam.

The waters expelled through the Machicura power station or through the spillway of the dam will be restored to the Maule River through the return canal, whose capacity will be about 380 cubic meters per second.

The ceremony for getting the work underway, which will include the presence of the Intendant, Colonel Sergio Perez, as well as high-level personnel of the Inela-Huarte consortium, will take place tomorrow in the La Orilla district, at 17 kilometers on the road from Bobadilla to Colbun.

MINISTER URGES FOREIGN INVESTMENT IN OIL EXPLORATION

Quito EL COMERCIO in Spanish 6 Nov 81 p A-1

[Text] The need to turn to foreign investments to provide incentives for the hydrocarbons industry was discussed by Minister of Natural Resources and Energy Eduardo Ortega yesterday, while he noted that if such resources cannot be found, the country is in danger of having to import crude oil by the end of this decade.

He noted that the hydrocarbons industry requires vast investments which the country does not have. By way of example he said that to explore a sector of 200,000 hectares in the Amazon region, a minimum of $25 million is needed, while to explore a similar area at sea, the sum required is $50 million. From this it can be concluded, he said, that to explore the five blocks in the eastern zone, the amount needed would be $125 million.

He reiterated that since the government of Ecuador does not have sufficient economic capacity to cover the cost requirements of the hydrocarbons industry, the need for foreign capital becomes urgent.

He said that with this in mind, it is necessary to adapt domestic legislation to the new reality. Intensive exploration and exploitation have not been achieved within the framework of the present norms, he noted. This means that something is wrong. The government has therefore proposed a series of amendments to the hydrocarbons law to the National Chamber of Representatives.

However, he went on to say, the amendments are not an end in themselves but a means of obtaining foreign investments. Therefore, the government does not insist on them, but it also wants to make it clear that there is no other suitable way of achieving this goal. Moreover, he said, there is a national consensus on the need to have recourse to foreign risk investment in the hydrocarbons sector.

The natural resources official noted that 55 percent of the export income comes from sales of hydrocarbon fuels and that this sector accounts for 90 percent of the energy sources. This is an indication of the importance of hydrocarbons and the dependence of the national economy on them.

He explained that the goals of the government policy in this connection are specifically greater production of hydrocarbons and rationalization and savings with regard to them.

He stressed that the country has, in addition to the concession blocks granted to the CEPE [Ecuadorean State Petroleum Corporation] and Texaco, 25 blocks in the Amazon region, 30 blocks on the coast and 16 offshore, all of them meriting immediate exploration.

In fact, he emphasized, the economic capacity of the country is not sufficient to undertake this great task, which can no longer be postponed. Thus the national government has determined that it is necessary to turn to private investment, be it domestic or foreign, within the limitations allowed by our legal structure.

Minister Ortega stressed that the amendments to the hydrocarbons law include a new type of agreement, a service contract for the exploration and exploitation of hydrocarbons, by means of which the state will not only promote exploratory activity in our national territory but will retain real and effective control over the resources discovered.

He added that this type of contract gives the contractor priority rights in purchasing all or part of the exportable balance. He said that according to this system, if a contractor uses his own economic and technical resources and discovers hydrocarbon substances, he is entitled to reimbursement for his investments, costs, expenditures and payments for services rendered, entirely in cash and not in oil. However, he said, the contractor has a priority right to purchase the resources found at the price prevailing on the international market. If the company does not find the resources being sought, the CEPE is not required to pay reimbursement of any kind.

He said that these amendments were submitted in due course to the National Chamber of Representatives for study and approval, but that to date no positive action has been taken. The national government has carried out its historic responsibility, because it has taken the steps necessary to encourage exploratory activities, he stressed, repeating that the amendments proposed pose no threat at all to the dignity of the state, national sovereignty or the interests of the collective, but will greatly benefit the country.

He also revealed that the CEPE has set in motion a number of investment programs, among which he mentioned the secondary recovery efforts in the Shushufindi and Sacha fields, with a view to obtaining an increase in the recoverable reserves of the country within a period of 30 months totaling about 422 million barrels of crude oil, which will make it possible to produce 10,000 additional barrels of oil per day. This program will be carried out jointly with Texaco in the partnership areas.

ALTERNATE ENERGY SOURCES--The National Energy Institute has developed prototypes of solar panels, low-power wind control apparatus, biodegradation mechanisms and improved stoves, the Ministry of Natural Resources has announced. It was also revealed that in accordance with the research program on new energy sources, the institute has established energy use options making it possible to utilize all the resources available, to which end it is necessary to choose the renewable technologies which will make it possible to resolve each of the problems which our country is likely to face immediately. Within this framework, the National Energy Institute and the National Polytechnical School have developed a prototype for a low-power wind plant in one project. This plant will utilize wind energy, which will be converted to electrical energy by means of a mechanical system, it was explained. The importance of prototypes based on the knowledge that sun and wind sources, among others, are free and also allow maintenance of the ecological balance, it was added. It was also stated that the initial application of wind energy uses will be in the neglected rural sectors, where it will operate grain mills, water pumps, and will provide electrical energy for craft enterprises and residences, among other things. CERRO PRIETO TO SELL POWER TO U.S. BY 1984

Mexico City EL DIA in Spanish 11 Nov 81 p 8

[Text] By 1984, the geothermal plant in Cerro Prieto will be ready to start the flow of power that will be sold to the American companies San Diego Gas and Electric Company and Southern California Edison Company, whose representatives, E.N. Helm and R. Watking, were in Mexico to inspect some technical areas in the connection system for delivering power.

The contract was signed in November of last year between both firms and the Federal Electricity Commission [CFE], calling for the sale of 220 megawatts per day for 10 years.

Helm and Watking indicated that the infrastructure which will make the sale of power to the companies that they represent possible will be totally financed by CFE, adding that the terms of the purchase and sale include possible changes in the rates per megawatt.

The foreign exchange income involved in the sales contract, with supplies coming from the plant located in Mexicali, Baja California, amounts to $200 million per year for Mexico.

Both representatives claimed that Mexico will accrue as a benefit from this agreement the creation of jobs in the area in which the plant is located.

PEMEX HAS PLAN TO SAVE ON DRILLING COSTS

Mexico City EL SOL DE MEXICO in Spanish 9 Nov 81 Sec B p 3

[Text] A scientist announced, on the basis of research done by the Mexican Petroleum Institute, that chemical products made from agricultural and industrial waste will make it possible to save from 3 to 5 million pesos on each well drilled by PEMEX [Mexican Petroleum].

Successful drilling of wildcat wells has already taken place in the area of Villahermosa, Tabasco, where the drilling fluids obtained through the use of waste material were employed.

Chemist Rosa de Jesus Hernandez claimed that the application of this new technique has opened new prospects for PEMEX, adding that, as a result of the processing of the fluid which, in addition to being of low cost affords a reduction in the drilling expenses, there may be a savings of from 3 to 5 million pesos per well.

She noted that an attempt is also being made to eliminate the payment made to import containers, and a study is being conducted on the possibility of making them in Mexico out of waste polyethylene, natural fibers, sheet metal and other materials.

At the present time, in drilling a well use is made of fluids made with chemical products manufactured from raw material, or also with imported finished products which are too expensive. When one considers the fact that they are used on a large scale as well, the expense increases sizably, and tends to make the activity detrimental to the economy and the balance of payments.

Those were the main reasons which prompted the Petroleum Institute to engage in a search for raw material derived from agricultural and industrial waste.

Chemist Hernandez Alvarez said that, in Mexico City alone, the industrial waste amounts to 20,000 tons per day, sufficient to meet the demand for the manufacture of chemical products with a high degree of consumption and, at the same time, to aid in solving the problem involved in discarding, burning or storing waste of this kind.

She explained that the experiment has made it possible to cut costs, not only in the drilling of oil wells, but also with respect to water and geothermal areas. At the same time, it will replace imports of the pertinent chemical products, the worldwide demand for which will rise from $23 million to $142 million worth by 1990.

ANDEAN PACT REACTIVATION AMID INDUSTRIAL SECTOR CRITICISM

Negative Trade Balance

Caracas RESUMEN in Spanish 1 Nov 81 pp 38-39

[Text] Experience has shown that Venezuela does not need either joint programming or the Andean Pact Group for its development.

According to the experts on the subject of the Latin American economic integration process "is just at the expectations stage without anything concrete or positive in prospect, at least for the present." A great deal has been said and written about the merits of the idea but there is a wide gulf between this and the conclusion of practical agreements which would make integration, which has been so ardently yearned for as an ideal, actually workable for Venezuela. In nations of the south, it is now being said that perhaps the fate of the Andean Pact will be known in December; that means that it is beyond the "we'll see" stage.

Meanwhile, in the other Andean Pact nations a thousand and one conjectures are being made as to the Pact's advantages and disadvantages for each country. It has been reported here that the Foreign Trade Institute (ICE) is looking into a "total renegotiation of the automotive program," which means a fundamental change in one of the key programs.

The issue does not stop there. Dr Jose Raul Gonzalez Agreda, as acting president of Conindustria, recently commented on the much discussed Declaration of Caraballeda in which the industrialists demanded that "Venezuela withdraw from the Pact." Some political circles expressed their disagreement with this. Doctor Gonzalez said their disagreement was an off-the-cuff assessment, that they know nothing about and have nothing to do with the Venezuelan production apparatus. They speak about the problem as mere dilettantes, inspired by so-called "ideals" which have nothing to do with the prevailing economic reality of the subregion. The news has just come out that the Venezuelan Industrial Council "will propose a plan for modifying the Andean Pact." This report is based on a new document which presents more arguments on the need for modifying the Pact.

What will be the outcome of all of this? That is an open question. Probably a long time will go by before the many unknown aspects of this problem are clarified. No sensible perion doubts that the question is very difficult, especially because of the great risks and losses Venezuela may incur in any integration of countries which economically are so heterogeneous. To get a general idea of this colossal problem, it is enough to know what Corindustria has said about the "structural differences between Venezuela and the other Andean Pact nations." And if this is not enough, there is a recent "Analysis of the Subregional Integration and the Situation of Venezuela in Relation to It so Far as the Metal-Mechanic Sector is Concerned." This was sent to the president of the republic on 4 August 1981 by Engineer Esteban Godayol Rovira, president of the association of Metallurgical and Mining Industries, the text of which was published recently in RESUMEN.

Critical Analysis

"...One may say that the Cartagena Agreement is logical in its theoretical concepts. However, it is precisely in the long term policy concepts that our country has characteristics totally different from the other nations," according to Drs Elena Rosenblat Mendoza and Franklin Rojas Penso who point out: "...more than 10 years after the Cartagena Agreement was signed, experience has shown the impossibility of programming everything that was planned, and difficulties have arisen in the approval of common tariff rates and basic trade regulations."

"Experience has also shown," they add, "that Venezuela does not need either joint programming or the Andean Group for its development."

In one section of the critical analysis, Drs Elena Rosenblat M and Francisco Rojas P stated the following:

Results of the Agreements

Let us analyze the consequences of the inclusion of Venezuela in these plans with regard to the flow of trade as well as specific aspects of marketing and the foreign investment system.

1) Analysis of the flow of trade

Andean Group

a) Importance of Venezuela (Table I)

During the period 1974 to 1979, Venezuela made more than 34 percent of the total exports, including fuels, of the Andean Group to third countries. The high percentage is due to the rise in petroleum prices. Later there was a drop in Venezuelan exports which again rose sharply in 1979, almost to the 1973 level.

From the point of view of Venezuelan negotiating power, as a member of the Andean Pact, with third countries it is more important to determine Venezuela's relative share of the Group's total imports.

During the period analyzed, imports were at least 51 percent of those of the Andean Pact market, having reached 63 percent in 1977 and then dropped to 52 percent in 1979.

b) Venezuelan trade with the Andean Group

Venezuelan exports to the Andean Group (see Table II) averaged about 2 percent of the total Venezuelan exports. Similarly, Venezuela buys from the Andean nations less than 3 percent of its total purchases.

c) Composition of Venezuelan export to the Andean Group

One can see in Table III that most of Venezuelan exports to the Andean nations are petroleum, more than 80 percent of the total up to 1979, although in 1980, nontraditional products rose to 25 percent of the exports.

Analyzing next the composition of the nontraditional exports (Table IV) one can see the important role of aluminum ingots which during this period constituted more than 34 percent.

Two conclusions may be reached from this analysis:

The largest percentage of Venezuelan exports to GRAN [Andean Regional Group] are of petroleum and aluminum. Therefore, although this is not the objective of the integration, Venezuela tends to duplicate, in its trade with the nations with which it is integrating, its role as an energy exporting nation.

Evidently the sales of petroleum are not due to preferential customs treatment. Those of aluminum, on the other hand, are due to the guaranteed supply which Venezuela provides to the Andean countries.

If we add to this that the other marketed products (fertilizers, steel products) are on the reserved list, we may conclude that the Andean Group has not stimulated the export of nontraditional Venezuelan products. In 1980, Venezuela's share of the Andean trade of nontraditional products is just 6 percent while the shares of Colombia and Peru together amount to 85 percent of it, according to Andean Group Information Bulletin No 109 of February 1981 issued by the Board of the Cartagena Agreement.

d. Balance of Trade

Table V, which includes data on fuels, shows that while Venezuelan exports increased only 1.78 percent during the entire period of 1974-1979, total imports from the Andean nations increased 575 percent during the same period.

Therefore the surplus in 1974 of USA $152 million became a deficit during the last 2 years: of USA $126 million in 1978 and USA $113 million in 1979. If one considers only the Venezuelan exports of non traditional products, the result is even more discouraging. While the Venezuelan exports between 1974 and 1978 increased 2.2 times; its imports increased 6.8 times. The result was that the deficit increased 11.5 times, growing from U.S. $23 million in 1974 to USA $263 million in 1979.

Commission President Outlines Problems

Caracas EL NACIONAL in Spanish 29 Oct 81 p D-13

[Article by Agustin Beroes on president of the Cartagena Agreement Commission, Edgar Moncayo's press conference in Caracas on 28 Oct 81.]

> [Text] According to the president of the Cartagena Agreement Commission, internal problems of a political nature prevented the holding of meetings during the first 6 months of this year.
> In November another meeting will be held in Quito and an effort will also be made to hold another one, of an intermediate nature, before then.
> The Andean Pact should be adjusted to the new international economic conditions.

"The most important step needed to revitalize the Andean Pact is to carry out completely the agreements and decisions already reached before making new commitments so as to give the Cartagena Agreement respectability and reliability."

The above statement was made by Edgar Moncayo, president of the Cartagena Agreement Commission, which is at present meeting in Caracas and is attempting to arrive at formulas which will reactivate the Andean Pact and justify its existence in the present and immediate future in view of the virtual standstill at which the subregional agreement finds itself.

During a press conference held yesterday noon, Moncayo pointed out that the current crisis of the agreement, which prevented the member nations from meeting during the first half of this year, is due primarily to political problems, internal or bilateral, of each of its member nations.

He mentioned the border war between Peru and Ecuador, the negotiation of the dispute between Venezuela and Colombia and the delicate Bolivian political crisis. These problems prevented the meeting of the bodies making up the Andean Group.

He said, "After direct negotiations between the presidents of the countries and a meeting held recently in Colombia we are reconstructing the weakened union and are making an analysis of the immediate actions which could contribute to this end."

It is precisely within this framework that this meeting in Caracas is taking place. It is the second since the moments of great crisis which interfered with the holding of meetings. A date has also been set for another meeting in Quito at the end of the year. The present Caracas meeting falls within the 38th period of plenary meetings which were agreed to in Colombia.

"This series of Colombia-Venezuela-Ecuador meetings aims at incorporating government opinions into the process of revitalizing the Cartagena Agreement." He then said that the agenda prepared for Caracas, where the current meeting is being held, is "very tight."

"In these discussions priority has been given to implementation of the agreements and decisions already agreed upon by the Pact."

Moncayo also said that they will take up subjects related to the concrete results of the sectorial programming, the initiation of discussion of a timetable for implementing these programs, the joint action of the Andean Pact nations, within the framework of Aladi [Latin American Integration Association], so as to be able to negotiate internationally.

They will also discuss matters relating to the incorporation of the agriculture and livestock industry into the integration process, as well as the physical infrastructure and the participation of entrepreneurs and the labor sector. He said, "The latter has been neither active nor decisive."

When he was asked about the denunciations of the Andean Pact by the Venezuelan Industrial Council [Coindustria], Moncayo replied that this was due to very private interests of some sectors of Venezuelan entrepreneurial groups and that those denunciations are totally baseless.

Moncayo then spoke of the sectorial program which is not on the agenda. He said, "There is talk of revising industrial development programs but this problem has been very poorly handled. The Commission is not trying to cover up. It is a question of recognizing that these programs have been found hard to carry out."

Later on he said that these problems are due rather to world problems and the Cartagena Agreement is attempting to provide a new operational and functional policy for the subregional agreement.

"We see clearly a policy of expanding the free trade sector and lowering the priority of the industrial program. Probably, except for the steel industry program, no other new industrial programs are likely to be approved."

Moncayo pointed out specifically that the principles on which the Andean Pact were based have been changed from those of 12 years ago when it was created and so the priorities which were set must be changed. Along with this, there have been important political changes in each of the countries so that the political distribution of the Agreement is not the same.

Finally he said that the Andean Pact should take on a new economic dimension as a result of the current world economic situation: "This means the intensification of the Andean Pact's international relations within the framework of the southern nations' relationship with one another."

Expectations for 1982

Caracas EL NACIONAL in Spanish 30 Oct 81 p D-8

[Article by Rosa Uztariz]

[Text] Wednesday night there was an interesting meeting at Miraflores (Foreign Ministry). Government figures met with representatives of the private and industrial sectors. "We are in an excellent position to smooth out differences and create a climate of trust indispensable for making these proceedings serve an active and fundamental purpose."

Sebastian Alegrett, president of the Foreign Trade Institute, ICE, said the above on leaving the hall, where a sizable group was holding the 32d Regular Meeting of the Cartagena Agreement Commission. He stated further, "The meeting is proceeding normally. The agenda is being followed. I am especially satisfied with the participation and cooperation of the private sector in the various events."

There is an atmosphere of optimism in Conference circles at Parque Central. The common denominator of the enthusiastic participants is a cheerful greeting with an Andean accent. They agree that "1982 will be the year of the Andean Pact."

[Question] Dr Alegrett, is there any basis for all this optimism?

[Answer] I believe that this Caracas meeting has facilitated contacts between entrepreneurs and Commission members and has cleared up many of the doubts, misunderstandings and distrust harbored up to now, especially by the industrial sector.

The fact that the government listened to its proposals of the 19th of this month (October) on which there was a meeting attended by the Ministers of the Treasury, Development, Cordiplan, MAC [Ministry of Agriculture and Livestock] and ICE, on one hand, and Perez Mijares, Gonzalez Agreda, Salas Romer and other on the other hand, has made us see that by exchanging views we may come to respect each other's position and there are cordial relations between us. We have also seen that a radical solution is not necessary and that the Cartagena Agreement can solve internally the problems that arise and will provide a solution which is adequate to bring about successful integration."

Edgar Moncayo: 1982 Will Be a Crucial Year

The president of the Cartagena Agreement Commission, Edgar Moncayo, an enthusiastic and cheerful young man, stopped and said,

"The meeting is going well. The failure to keep the agreements is being analyzed exhaustively. Venezuela was 2 years late in carrying out the Free Trade Program, and the responsible chairman has agreed to put it into effect within a month. The Minimum Common Foreign tariff and the Free Trade Program will remain on schedule and in 1983 we may have entirely free trade among the large countries; and other problems, such as that of Customs Nomenclature, will have been solved.

[Question] When do you expect to see concrete results?

[Answer] This meeting is part of a series planned to reactivate and adjust Andean integration. The first meeting was at Paipa, we are now holding the Caracas meeting, in December there will be one in Quito and another in Cali. At the end we will have a full picture of the situation. We are bringing ourselves up to date.

Roberto Persivale Serrano

"We are in the transition to integration. We must cast aside any uncompromising and closed attitudes and make a long-term economic evaluation of the benefits of full integration."

Roberto Persivale, minister of industry, tourism and integration, is one of the members of the Peruvian delegation participating in the Cartagena Agreement meeting. He believes that the difficulties faced by the Pact are due to concrete and logical needs inherent in any process, and he describes the present period as a "transition to integration."

On the basis of this analysis, he believes that the attitude of the industrialists in general, should take this position.

"The successful industrialist or entrepreneur has reached his position by making large investments which he does not want to risk because he links the present with the past, because he sees that future steps may be expensive, because during the transition he may lose markets he already has and he would be forced to increase the productivity of his industry by lowering prices to the Venezuelan consumer, and other nations may take away his customers. He does not see that along with these drawbacks, he will also reap additional benefits such as selling his products to other countries which in the long run will produce greater profits for him. But this will require that he work hard, and it will take time."

Persivale, who is also deputy for the Popular Christian Party of Peru, believes that at the CAES (Economic and Social Advisory Committee) meeting, which is part of the Cartagena Agreement, a very significant procedure was followed, namely that the three representatives of the entrepreneurs and the three of labro were elected by their organizations, not by the governments as had been the custom.

"In the case of Peru, it was the Society of Industry, The Exporters Association and the Chamber of Commerce who did the electing; this is the new tonic we are giving the Andean Group."

[Question] Some days ago there was uneasiness due to the Peruvian statements regarding the limitations of Decision 24. What is the current position of your country on this matter?

[Answer] After a period of stalemate and paralysis of the Group due to political matters which we all know about, the governments have made official pronouncements. In August 1981, the president of Peru, in September that of Colombia and last Wednesday that of Venezuela, as well as President Herrera Campins at Cancun, have all stated that they are in agreement, satisfied and happy with Decision 24 which regulates foreign investments. In the case of Peru, the statement by President Belaunde Terry marked the completion of the review by the new democratic regime of the international agreements and commitments of Peru, among which the Andean Group is of the greatest importance. This was interpreted as a change, but actually it was just a study. Peru and all the partner nations believe that the rules of the game for foreign investments are really attractive.

PERUVIAN PROJECT SUPPORTED--Yesterday Ecuador indicated its firm determination to work with and support the Peruvian project for linking the three South American river basins--those of the Orinoco, Amazon and La Plata Rivers. The head of the Ecuadorean delegation, Teodoro Bustamante Munoz, told the press that the meeting of technical specialists on the interlinking of these basins is of special importance to his country because of its vast implications. Concerning relations between Peru and Ecuador, Bustamante said that the Lima meeting provides an opportunity to deal with problems "with courage, resolution and a spirit of compromise." He added that there is a firm determination to eliminate the causes of resentment so that the factors uniting the governments of Presidents Fernando Belaunde Terry and Oswaldo Hurtado can prevail. He stressed the generosity and hospitality of the Peruvian Government and said that the interlinking of the three basins, which would create the longest waterway in the world, linking 11 Latin American nations, offers the prospects of a promising future. This project, Bustamante went on to say, will open up new possibilities for utilizing natural resources to the benefit of millions of Latin American citizens. 'HERALD' SEES PUBLIC ANXIOUS OVER PRESIDENTIAL SITUATION

PY031952 Buenos Aires HERALD in English 3 Dec 81 p 8

[Editorial: "Up for Grabs?"]

[Text] The Argentine political crisis was already bad enough before President Roberto Viola was suddenly taken ill and ordered to rest for a few weeks. Since the news of his bout of high blood pressure and his heart problems was made public, however, the crisis has gotten a good deal worse. But it is not, needless to say, concern for the president's health alone that is disturbing Argentines. Doubts about the president's chances of returning to office, doubts about the motives behind the policy changes introduced by acting president Horacio Liendo, and doubts about the intentions of the army commander-in-chief General Leopoldo Galtieri have combined with the regime's taciturnity to plunge the nation into a state approaching anguish. Nobody outside a small circle of men really knows what is going on. There is, however, a widespread suspicion that the country's immediate fate will be decided by a confused power struggle now going on among several different interest groups. Argentines, in other words, strongly suspect that their country is once again up for grabs and will fall into the hands of whoever manages to mobilize most power at the appropriate time.

The feeling that minorities within an already small minority are scheming for power behind the backs of the people will do nothing to increase public confidence either in the "process" or in any other program of military rule. It is quite intolerable that the government of a country of Argentina's stature should be decided not by consultations with the representatives of the Argentine people nor even by orderly and public consultations among the ruling minority, but by obscure intrigues. This, however, is what many people obviously believe is happening right now. Unless they are proved to be utterly wrong, the result will be to destroy whatever residue of confidence in the authorities may remain and poison the already fetid atmosphere still further. This would mean that whoever turns out to be the ruler of Argentina after the present period of imprecision has passed will find himself in charge of a country whose population has no faith either in him or in his government and only wants both to depart as soon as possible.

For a short time in 1976 much of the country accepted the "process." Although many people had serious misgivings, they acquiesced to military rule and in so doing gave it as much legitimacy as it could possibly have. Since that initial period, however, the "process" has been steadily losing support. After the latest series of episodes, its chances of getting a larger share of the votes in a general election than was won by Brigadier Ezequiel Martinez in 1973 will be small. The regime's indifference to public feelings about it would be understandable, although not justifiable, if it could boast of a number of significant achievements. Unfortunately for Argentina, it cannot even do that. It is in fact hard to believe that holding elections after a reasonably short and clearly specified period would be more risky than continuing with a military government that, since defeating left-wing terrorism, has achieved none of its objectives. Nothing suggests that this alternative is even being considered by the people close to power. Whatever else happens, the government of Argentina seems certain to remain the concern of a handful of people accountable only to themselves, whose objective will simply be to cling onto power for as long as possible. Argentina, however, belongs to all Argentines, not just to a few. Any attempt to exclude the representatives of a vast majority from power forever is sure to cause the country irreparable damage and to reduce its prospects of ever becoming the prosperous democracy the military have always insisted is their overall objective.

POLITICAL LEADERS SEEK INFORMATION ON DISAPPEARED

PY031938 Buenos Aires HERALD in English 3 Dec 81 p 9

[Text] (NA)--Leaders of several political parties said in a statement issued yesterday that Argentine society has "the right to know the fate and whereabouts of missing people, and even more so when everything leads to conclude that the authorities have ample information on the subject."

The 60-line document starts: "The subject of human rights violations as a result of repressive action by the state is a central problem in Argentine life. The question goes beyond the pain involving thousands and thousands of families, with the drama this implies."

The statement goes on to say that one of the main causes for the appearance of violence in Argentina "was the recurrence of political crises," adding that after the 1966 overthrow of Arturo Illia's constitutional government, youth "did not find structured ways to express itself."

"Violent acts that took place later were serious, as were their human and political consequences. But even more serious was the decision of binding the state itself, and so the whole community, to a massive repression, carried out outside any legal framework," the statement says, adding: "The arrest and disappearance of thousands of persons, including pregnant women, teenagers and small children, on whose fate and whereabouts no one reports, are today the most tragic expression of this painful episode in our history."

The politicians go on to say that, in the face of this, it is impossible to explain why political leaders attend meetings at "commands and barracks, where these delicate questions are discussed while being kept hidden by both sides from the general public, which constitutes a serious (act of) complicity."

The statement adds: "The arrogance shown by high-ranking officers of the armed forces, who want to prevent the events for being reviewed now or in the future, is a poor substitute for the requirements of truth and justice (current) circumstances demand."

Saying that "...no argument is valid in the face of ethical and humane reasons," the statement adds its criticism of a government project for a political parties statute which "would try to force silence over the facts."

Among politicians signing the statement are: Vicente Saadi, Wilda Garre, Jose Serrabayrouse, Mario Campora and Jorge Vazquez (Peronists); Nestor Vicente, Guillermo Frugoni Rey, Enrique de Vedia, Angel Bruno and Augusto Conte (Christian Democrats); Alicia Moreau de Justo, Manuel Outerino, Oscar Palacito, Boris Pasik, Simon Lazara, Alfredo Bravo and Hector Polino (Socialists); Rafael Marino and Diego May Zubiria (Intransigents), Ricardo Molinas (Progressive Democrat) and Aldo Tessio (Radical).

COLUMNIST SEES 'IRREPARABLE' DAMAGE TO PROCESS

FY062100 Buenos Aires HERALD in English 6 Dec 81 pp 3, 13

[From the "Politics and Labor" column by James Neilson]

[Excerpts] Most disturbing of all to the old guard "process" loyalists was the sudden delivery of a new batch of economic measures that, it was agreed, ran totally counter to the "philosophy of the process," whatever that may have been. These, it seems, were cooked up by the Interior Ministry—the fief of acting president Horacio Liendo—on Saturday night and immediately issued without clearing them with the junta, let alone the hapless economy minister Lorenzo Sigaut, first. Although the "liberals" loudly lamented the backsliding these measures seemed to reflect, they were not really that heretical, consisting of partial exchange controls, indirect control of interest rates, a reserve fund for covering bad debts, and the creation of a foreign currency futures market, all of which might be considered by impeccably conservative governments in Europe without their running much risk of being accused of embracing developmentism or Bolshevism.

It was widely suspected, however, that there were far more to these measures than met the merely economic eye.

The most popular explanation was that they were part of a complicated power struggle between Liendo and those of his colleagues who want the "process" to continue on the general direction sketched out by Dr Jose Martinez de Hoz. According to this view, Liendo is throwing his weight about in a desparate attempt to shove the "process" into a new course.

One big mystery was President Roberto Viola's role in this affair. His supporters in the government did their best to convey the impression that he was the real mastermind behind the new initiatives and that when he returned to office the country would see something much more drastic. Viola's chances of coming back, however, wavered during the week and then fell sharply as it ended when it was stated that he would probably have to have by-pass surgery to put him back in working order. There was even talk about the advisability of sending him to St Luke's Hospital in Houston, Texas, so that he would have adequate treatment. Should this happen it would be in order to get him out of the country for a while, as Argentine surgeons are perfectly capable of doing the operations involved.

Viola's chances of remaining president depend less on his medical condition than on the shadowy political intrigue that is now going on in the upper reaches of the armed forces. On Wednesday it was reported that his old friend former president Jorge Rafael Videla has entered the fray as a mediator between Viola and army commander-in-chief General Leopoldo Galtieri, who is still the odds-on favorite to be Argentina's president by the time 1982 begins. Army HQ sources however, denied that Videla had seen Galtieri, thus making an already murky situation ever murkier. Viola, it would appear, refuses point-blank to throw in the sponge and his foes are unwilling to treat him as though he were a mere civilian president and simply boot him out.

Whatever happens, the last few weeks have been just as costly for the "process" as the previous year had been, and that, with the 6-month "transition" and the slow-motion Viola administration was bad enough. Were Viola to return the country would be doomed to new political crises within a week or so. If Liendo stays—an unlikely prospect, but nothing is impossible—doubts about his ability to survive would ensure a permanent state of unease. And if Galtieri takes over he will be seen as an usurper by the followers of Videla and Viola, in other words, the damage that has been inflicted on the "process" by the goings-on of the last few weeks is almost certainly irreparable and the belief that this military dictatorship was somehow different from others has been destroyed.

UN RESOLUTION DRAWS CRITICISM--Another political show against Chile is under preparation at the United Nations. For a change it will now be staged by the Third Human Rights Commission which year after year condemns Chile for alleged violations of those rights. This year the document against Chile is sponsored by Cuba, Algeria, Mexico and Yugoslavia. These are the countries which have made a farce of legitimate democracy and human rights. But the show must go on. This year Chile was condemned by the Human Rights Commission and at the UN General Assembly for the following sins, in the opinion of the sponsors: The Chilean Government should be sanctioned for enforcing a political constitution which has been approved by 67 percent of the citizenry; Chile has also violated human rights when it tried to detain a terrorist group that commits murder and holds up banks; and finally because in the opinion of Cuba, Algeria, Mexico and Yugoslavia, Chilean courts do not fulfill their mission adequately. Naturally, Chile is the only country which is being accused. For the United Nations there are no human rights violations in the USSR where a Nobel Peace Prize winner like Andrey Sakharov is banished and on hunger strike. Neither does anything happen in Iran where popular and revolutionary courts sentence to death 100 persons every 24 hours. Nothing happens in Afghanistan either where the invading Red Army destroys entire towns with poisonous gases accusing them of being guerrillas who oppose the Soviet occupation. According to the third commission, only in Chile are human rights violated, thus deserving year after year the UN sanction. The farce is exposed once its sponsors are known: Cuba, Algeria, Mexico and Yugoslavia. [Text] [FY231447 Santiago Chile Domestic Service in Spanish 1000 GMT 25 Nov 81]

JOINT COMMUNIQUE ISSUED WITH LAOS DELEGATION

Havana GRANMA in Spanish 13 Oct 81 p 4

[Cuba-Laos joint communique, signed 11 October 1981 in Havana]

[Text] At the invitation of the Cuban Minister of Foreign Relations, Comrade Isidoro Malmierca, Comrade Phoun Sipaseut, minister of foreign affairs of the Lao People's Democratic Republic, paid an official and friendly visit to Cuba between 7 and 11 October 1981.

The minister of foreign affairs from the Lao People's Democratic Republic held fraternal and friendly meetings with Comrade Carlos Rafael Rodriquez, member of the Politburo of the Central Committee of the Communist Party of Cuba, vice-president of the councils of state and ministers of the Republic of Cuba; and Comrade Jesus Montane Oropesa, acting member of the Politburo of the Central Committee of the Communist Party of Cuba and head of the general foreign relations department of the Central Committee of the Communist Party of Cuba.

During this visit, the two ministers signed a collaboration plan on behalf of the Ministry of Foreign Relations of the Republic of Cuba and the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the Lao People's Democratic Republic covering the years 1981-1985.

During the official talks, which took place in an atmosphere of friendship and mutual understanding, Ministers Isidoro Malmierca and Phoun Sipaseut engaged in a broad exchange of views on the development of socialist construction in their respective countries and bilateral relations, and opinions on the international situation, reaching full agreement on all the subjects discussed.

Both ministers indicated that the fraternal friendship and combative solidarity linking Cuba and Laos are strengthening and becoming deeper with every passing day. They voices the will of the governments of their countries to continue this strengthening and to expand bilateral cooperation.

The Cuban representative expressed his satisfaction with the successes achieved by the people of Laos in economic, social and cultural rebuilding and the defense of the nation since the founding of the Lao People's Democratic Republic, and in the application of the first five-year plan for development.

The Cuban representative also expressed satisfaction with the fact that the foreign policy of the Lao People's Democratic Republic is making an important contribution to the consolidation of peace and safety in Asia, and to the struggle for national independence, democracy and social progress. In this connection, it firmly supports the seven principles set forth by the first deputy prime minister and minister of foreign affairs of the Lao People's Democratic Republic, Comrade Phoun Sipaseut, at the 36th Session of the UN General Assembly, and he confirmed that this position on the part of that nation, established after consultation and agreement with the People's Republic of Kampuchea and the Socialist Republic of Vietnam, demonstrated the good will of these nations and their desire to create an atmosphere of peace and stability in Southeast Asia.

The Cuban representative condemned the pressure and further threats of aggression utilized by the Chinese leaders against the people of Vietnam, Laos and Kampuchea, and denounced their policy of hegemony and expansion and the growing political and military cooperation between China and the United States, which is increasing the threat to peace endangering security in Asia and throughout the world.

The representative of Laos expressed his satisfaction at the successes achieved by the Cuban revolution in the political, economic and social aspects of building socialism and the fulfillment of the resolutions of the second congress of the PCC. He confirmed his energetic condemnation of the economic blockade and the violation of Cuban airspace by U.S. spy planes, and he denounced the seriousness of the fact of the existence of bacteriological warfare waged by the Yankees against Cuba in a vain effort to isolate and destroy the Cuban revolution.

The representative of Laos reiterated his full support of Cuba's demand that the territory illegally occupied by the naval base which the United States maintains in Guantanamo, against the will of the Cuban people, be returned to it.

The representative of Laos had high praise for the importance of the internationalist aid provided by the Republic of Cuba to the peoples struggling to win their full sovereignty and independence in Asia, Africa and Latin America, as well as its outstanding action while presiding over the Movement of Nonaligned Countries for the protection and strengthening of the unity of the movement and the maintenance of its principles.

In analyzing the international situation, the two parties agreed that the aggressive policy of the imperialist forces, in particular the new administration in the United States, has complicated the world situation, with their efforts to disturb the process of detente. They also energetically condemned the decision of the U.S. government to increase the mass production of new weapons, including the neutron bomb, for the extermination of mankind, and they issued an appeal to all peoples of the world to voice their rejection of it.

The two parties acknowledged that the successes achieved by the countries in the socialist community, the Soviet Union in particular, in building socialism and communism and in their consistent policy of peace, along with the triumphs won by the national liberation movement and the international revolutionary workers movement, contributing decisively to the change in the balance of forces on the world level in favor of peace, social progress and socialism, and giving their full support to the peace proposals of the Supreme Soviet of the USSR in its appeal to all the parliaments and peoples of the world.

The two parties voiced their determined support of the struggle of the peoples of Asia, Africa and Latin America to win full independence and sovereignty, to eliminate all forms of discrimination and exploitation, to eliminate underdevelopment and to promote the new order in international economic relations, based on principles of equality, justice and democracy.

In the light of the complex international situation, both parties reiterated the extraordinary importance and transcendent historical significance of the movement of nonaligned countries, which they regard as a particularly significant factor in the struggle against imperialism, colonialism, neocolonialism, and racism, including Zionism and apartheid, and against every form of imperialist domination and in defense of peace, international safety, detente and disarmament, as well as for the elimination of the economic and social inequality which prevails in the modern world.

Both ministers expressed their satisfaction with the positive results achieved by the Sixth Summit Conference of Heads of State and Government in the Nonaligned Countries, which was held in Havana and the ministerial conference of the movement held in New Delhi, which have had a positive influence on the international scene.

They noted that the international capitalist economic crisis is most seriously and particularly affecting the underdeveloped countries and those in the process of development, making it most urgent to contribute to the solution of the problems of these countries. In this connection, they voice their solidarity with the statements made by Comrade Fidel Castro as president of the Movement of Nonaligned Countries at the 34th General Assembly of the UN and as president of the Council of State of the Republic of Cuba at the 68th Conference of the Interparliamentary Union held in Havana recently, and his proposal on this complex of problems.

They hailed the triumphs of the people of Nicaragua under the leadership of the Sandinist National Liberation Front in the rebuilding of the country and the defense of revolutionary gains, and they reiterated their determined support of the struggle being waged against the aggression and maneuvers of the U.S. imperialists and their allies. They also manifested their militant solidarity with the people and the revolutionary government of Grenada, who are successfully confronting the imperialist threats and pressures.

The energetically condemned the aggressive policy of the U.S. imperialists toward the people of El Salvador, designed to maintain the bloody military Christian Democratic dictatorship established in that country, through direct military intervention and massive shipments of weapons. They voiced their support of the just struggle of the people of El Salvador and the forces representing them, the Farabundo Marti Front for National Liberation and the Revolutionary Democratic Front. In this connection, they hailed the statements on El Salvador contained in the joint declaration issued by Mexico and France on 28 August 1981.

The two ministers denounced the terror perpetrated against the people of Guatemala by the tyranny imposed with the support of the new U.S. administration and expressed their solidarity with the heroic struggle being waged by the revolutionary forces.

The two parties definitely supported the people and the government of Panama, struggling to require of the United States strict implementation of the new treaty on the canal and respect for Panamanian sovereignty over all of its territory.

The two ministers reiterated their support of the people of Puerto Rico in their struggle against the colonial domination maintained by the U.S. imperialists and for their self-determination and national independence, in accordance with the resolution of the Decolonization Committee of the UN.

The two delegations view the winning of independence by Belize with satisfaction, since it constitutes an important step forward toward decolonization in the area.

With regard to the situation in Africa, the two ministers warmly praised the victories won by the popular and democratic revolutionary forces Ethiopia and Mozambique as well as other liberated nations, for example the important triumph of the patriotic forces in Zimbabwe.

The two parties firmly condemned the acts of aggression on the part of the racist regime in South Africa against the People's Republic of Angola and the People's Republic of Mozambique. They demanded that the South African government immediately cease such actions and show respect for the independence, sovereignty and integrity of these nations.

They confirmed their militant solidarity with the peoples of Namibia and South Africa, and the groups which legitimately represent them, the SWAPO [South-West African People's Organization] and the ANC [African National Congress]. They condemned the maneuvers of South Africa designed to maintain its domination in Namibia and the support the regime in Pretoria has received from the imperialist powers in pursuing its plans, exemplified in particular by the recent veto by the U.S. government of the decision by the majority of the members of the UN Security Council to impose just sanctions which would contribute to forcing the apartheid regime to put an end to its illegal occupation of Namibian territory.

Consistent with the resolutions of the UN and the OAU, the two parties urged the exercise of the right of the people of the Western Sahara to self-determination.

With regard to the tense situation in the Middle East, both parties denounced the divisive policy of U.S. imperialism and reasserted their position that a peaceful and just solution can only be achieved on the basis of complete withdrawal of Israeli troops from all the Arab territories occupied in 1967 and the exercise of the inalienable right of the Arab people of Palestine to self-determination, including the right to establish their own nation.

They stressed that in order to achieve a true settlement of the situation, the PLO, the only legitimate representative of the Palestinian people, must participate.

The two delegations expressed their concern about the present armed conflict between Iraq and Iran, and urged the governments of these nations to make every effort to find a peaceful, just and honorable political solution to their differences. The two parties voiced their most energetic condemnation of the United States for the attack perpetrated against the claims of the Socialist People's Libyan Arab Jamahiriya in the Gulf of Sidra, which was an open violation of the independence and sovereignty of that nation and international law.

The two parties hailed the brilliant success achieved by the People's Republic of Kampuchea in the United Nations.

They both categorically rejected the resolutions of the so-called International Conference on Kampuchea, and urgently demanded the expulsion of the representatives of the Pol Pot-Ieng Sary-Khieu Samphan gang from the UN and the reestablishment of the legitimate rights of the People's Republic of Kampuchea in the United Nations organization.

The two parties agreed that the problems of peace and security in Southeast Asia should be resolved by the nations in the area themselves through peaceful negotiations based on the principles of equality and mutual respect, and without the imposition or interference in their domestic affairs of other nations.

The two parties expressed their full solidarity with the just cause of the Afghan people and their support of their efforts to pursue the tasks of the April Revolution successfully. They condemned the continuing maneuvers of the imperialists and their allies designed to frustrate the revolutionary process in that country. The two ministers manifested their support of the efforts to transform the Indian Ocean into a zone of peace, and they condemned the aggressive imperialist policy of establishing new military bases in the zone and strengthening those already located there.

The two parties warmly hailed the suggestion of the People's Republic of Mongolia on the signing of a treaty banning aggression and the use of force in relations among the Asian and Pacific nations.

Both parties expressed their solidarity with the Democratic People's Republic of Korea in its struggle for the peaceful reunification of its territory without foreign interference.

The two ministers expressed the belief that the fruitful results of the visit paid to the Republic of Cuba by the delegation from Laos will contribute to the future development of collaboration between the two countries.

The representative of Laos expressed his sincere thanks for the warm and fraternal hospitality accorded his delegation by the Communist Party, the government, and the people of Cuba.

The Cuban minister of foreign relations, Isidoro Malmierca, expressed his pleasure on accepting the invitation extended by Minister Phoum Sipaseut to pay an official and friendly visit to Lao People's Democratic Republic. The date of the visit will be determined at some future time.

HAVANA'S MARRERO CRITICIZES U. S. POLICIES IN LATIN AMERICA

Puerto Rico Annexation 'Plot'

Havana GRANMA in Spanish 30 Sep 81 p 6

[Article by Juan Marrero]

[Text] The Yankee imperialists are not discouraged in their intention to turn Puerto Rico into the 51st state of the United States. For several years the annexationist conspiracy has been on the march. Let us recall that the administration of Gerald Ford went so far as to present to the Congress in Washington a draft bill looking toward an eventual annexation of Puerto Rico to the United States. This produced general rejection in Latin America and the rest of the world, in addition to causing feelings of reserve and confusion among many members of the U. S. Congress itself and in important sectors of North America public opinion. Then Carter supported the plan of the colonial governor, Carlos Romero Barcelo, creating a joint commission to study the possibility of statehood for Puerto Rico. And now, in a categorical way, the Yankee vice president and former director of the CIA, George Bush, who is in Puerto Rico participating in the convention of governors of the southern states in the United States, has said: "I also share your dream (referring to Reagan) of making Puerto Rico the 51st state. Neither the President nor I am going to abandon our position. You have friends in the White House who believe that the country (the United States) would be stronger, that we would all be better, if Puerto Rico were the 51st state." Such statements by Bush are one more manifestation of the fascist, retrograde, and caveman mentality of the present tenants of the White House, who speak and act as if the world were the same as it was in the last century or 50, 40, or 30 years ago, when the imperialists were still succeeding in imposing thier decisions on a large part of the world. Such annexationist statements by Bush are an offense to the people of Puerto Rico, who are holding high the independence banner of Albizu Campos, and also to world public opinion which has been expressed in the last few years in the United Nations and in the Movement of Non-Aligned Countries in favor of the inalienable right of the Puerto Rican people to self-determination and independence- in accordance with Resolution 1514 (XV) of the UN General Assembly. A few weeks ago, in August, the Decolonization Committee of the United Nations a resolution which recommends that the General Assembly examine the colonial question of Puerto Rico during its 37th session. In his statement the oil millionaire Bush also said that "We have begun a very ambitious program of Caribbean development." It is quite clear. The annexation of Puerto Rico goes beyond the limits of ambition, above all if we keep in mind reports published in the last few years that there are geological structures with oil-bearing potential in Camuy, Tortuguero, Dorado, and San Juan. Perhaps for that reason Bush should have said that if Puerto Rico is the 51st state, the United States would be stronger. And Bush would be richer, one should add.

Falcon Vista Exercise

Havana GRANMA in Spanish 7 Oct 81 p 6

[Article by Juan Marrero]

[Text] Today, Wednesday, the North American - Honduran warlike exercise, "Falcon Vista," begins in Caribbean waters near Nicaragua. The Yankee amphibious ship "Fort Snelling" is already in Puerto Cortes, sent there from its base in the Panama Canal Zone. According to cabled reports, it brought with it to this Honduran port a tug, 3 patrol boats, 130 "Marines" and the equipment necessary for the military maneuvers. Further, there are reports of the participation of jet warplanes in the exercises. This is what we have been able to learn, up to now, about Operation Falcon Vista. However, coinciding with the preparations for the North American - Honduran maneuvers, Col. Samuel T. Dickens, representative of the United States on the Interamerican Defense Council, which is located in Washington, has arrived in Tegucigalpa. By his presence it has been possible to see and verify what is in the background of the "Falcon Vista" exercises. After stating that in the United States "the advance of communism in Central America is causing concern" and that "international communism has seized control of Nicaragua," Colonel Dickens urged the Armies of Guatemala, El Salvador, and Honduras to revitalize the Central American Defense Council (CONDECA), an aggressive, military pact and instrument of imperialism which was seriously weakened when the Nicaraguan revolution achieved its victory. As is known, the Sandinist revolution destroyed the Samoza army, which was one of the fundamental building blocks of CONDECA, and created a new, people's army which is anti-imperialist and a defender of the interests of the people. It has become evident today that Yankee imperialism is accelerating its plans for aggression against Nicaragua. And in connection with those plans it is pressuring and inciting the direct participation of the Government of Honduran. That comes out clearly from a typically interfering statement by Colonel Dickens--and which up to now, as far as we know, has not recriticized the fact that Honduras is proclaiming "neutrality toward aggressive neighbors like the Nicaraguans...I can't understand why are so neutral." The "Falcon Vista" maneuvers and those statements by the hawk Dickens, openly urging military aggression against Nicaragua, together with the denunciation of the training of former members of the Somoza National Guard in camps in the United States and in Central American countries, are reasons of substantial weight, and certainly are not the ones, which fully justify the defensive measures and the mobilization of the people which the Sandinist revolution has ordered in the last few days, at the same time as its leaders repeat that the revolution is irreversible and that all of the people will defend it with their lives.

MINREX NOTE ON VENEZUELAN PLANE BOMBING INVESTIGATION

Havana GRANMA in Spanish 23 Oct 81 p 6

[Text] It has come to the attention of the Cuban Ministry of Foreign Affairs [MINREX] that a report published by the Venezuelan daily paper EL NACIONAL in its issue of Wednesday 7 October this year says in paragraphs 1 and 2 given below verbatim:

"Brig Gen Elio Antonio Gracia Barrios, present of the Martial Court, said yesterday that this high tribunal is being subjected to the various kinds of pressure brought to bear on its judges to make them come to a decision on the case of the Cuban plane.

"The president of this high military court said that they have studied the over 20,000-page long case file but are still waiting for answers to their writs to furnish better proof which were sent to Barbados, Trinidad, Guyana and Cuba asking for additional information on the events of 6 October 1976 in which 73 people died 5 years ago yesterday."

On 25 May last, the Venezuelan press published what is claimed to be a request for information issued by the Venezuelan Martial Court, and addressed to our country, requesting specific data relating to the case of criminal sabotage against the Cubana Airlines plane which took place on 6 October 1976.

For all these reasons, and in order to clearly establish the truth before world public opinion and Venezuela and before the governments of countries with whom Cuba maintains normal relations, the Cuban Ministery of Foreign Relations deems it necessary to declare that, to this date, it has not received any official "rogatory" petition or "order to furnish better proof" from the Venezuelan Government or from any other authority of that country relating to the criminal act of sabotage against the Cubana Airlines plane in which 73 peoplea lost their lives in the Barbados area. The Venezuelan Ministry of Foreign Affairs is well aware of the fact that no request of this type has been submitted.

In conclusion, it is not gratuitous to reiterate that as soon as the criminal act of sabotage became known, Coba spontaneously offered to supply the appropriate authorities in Venezuela with all the necessary information required to unravel this contemptible deed and to bring to trial its proven and confessed perpetrators, and this is an attitute which Cuba has always maintained providing that there is a just trial where those who are guilty will receive a punishment commensurate to their crimes in contrast with the attitude adopted by the COPEL [Social Christian Party] Government whose stance on the matter of the trial is very well known and has already been denounced by Cuba.

COLOMBIA SCORED FOR SIDING WITH U.S. POLICIES

Havana GRANMA in Spanish 3 Oct 81 p 6

[Article by Juan Marrero]

[Text] By now, the Colombian Government doesn't know what to do to please Yankee imperialism and, more particulary, the present fascist tenants of the White House. Let us remember how shamelessly that government went along with the U.S. scheme to prevent Cuba from being elected to the UN Security Council. Later, it broke off relations with Cuba contributing to the Yankee policy of intensified blockade and isolation of our country. More recently, it announced that Colombian troops will be dispatched to the Sinai to uphold the Camp David agreements against the Arab countries and, specially, against the Palestinian people. Also well known is the Colombian stance against the French-Mexican declaration recognizing the Salvadoran patriots as a representative group and offering a negotiated and political solution to the Salvadoran tragedy. Thus the government of Turbay Ayala (which claims to be democratic) stands, alongside with Yankee imperialism, as the champion of those who assassinate, massacre and torture the Salvadoran people. Colombian Foreign Minister Carlos Lemos Simmonds is currently visiting Beijing where he met with Deng Xiaoping, Zhao Ziyang, Huang Hua and other Chinese leaders. The wire services mention that they had "lengthy and extensive talks dealing with Cuba" (against Cuba, of course) and these talks were so amiable that after each meeting the Chinese as well as the Colombians mentioned "a very cordial atmosphere," "close friendship," "identical views" and so on. But something which has caught our attention is the fact that Foreign Minister Lemos Simmonds resorted to the pseudo-revolutionary phrases used by the Chinese. Is he perhaps trying to blot out and make people forget his subservient behavior toward imperialism? He will find it impossible, of course, because not even the Chinese have managed to do so although they keep on trying all the time. Among other things, Lemos Simmonds said that "we hope that the Caribbean Sea can stay out of the confrontation between the superpowers and become a sea of peace." This is an outrageous statement on the part of China but it is even more outrageous coming from Colombia particularly in view of the fact that the South American country took part in this year's military exercises called 'Ocean Venture 81' which started in the Caribbean and continued in the Atlantic—exercises amounting to a provocation—and will also participate in the 'UNITAS' maneuvres with the United States, the superpower which considers the Caribbean Sea as "a zone under its ownership." Is this how Colombia will help to turn the Caribbean into a sea of peace? All the people in the Caribbean want peace but they are also aware—and this is something which the Colombian foreign minister knows perfectly well—of the fact that what represents a serious danger to peace in the Caribbean is the presence of a 16,000-strong Yankee military force stationed in the bases of Puerto Rico, the Virgina Islands, Guantanamo and the Canal Zone as well as the constant patrols by U.S. warships, offensive air and naval manoeuvres frequently staged and the threats of Yankee intervention. Using the Chinese phraseology about the superpowers in the Caribbean is a crude tactic on the part of the Colombians. And, in fact, not even the Chinese doctor will save them.

LEGISLATORS CONTEMPLATE GREATER EXECUTIVE POWERS

Quito EL COMERCIO in Spanish 8 Nov 81 p A-3

[Text] The desire to grant the executive branch greater power in relation to the parliament seems to be one of the basic goals the Popular Democrats in the government party are seeking within the context of the amendments which may be proposed to the constitution now in effect.

However, both the Popular Democratic Party and the Democratic Left seem to want to defend some of the basic principles endorsed in the constitution which give it that aspect termed progressive.

Deputy Juan Manuel Real reiterated that any plebiscite or referendum should have as its purpose amendment of the constitution only if and when amendment has been rejected by the National Chamber of Representatives.

He said that during the meeting the Popular Democrats held with Minister of Goverment and Justice Galo Garcia Feraud, he told him that in his personal opinion, substantial reform should involve a return to the bicameral system because of the many shortcomings to be found in the present system.

He emphasized that the fact that there is a single chamber has not led to rapid legislation and that in the final analysis, with the mechanism in effect, much impassioned effort has been made, deflecting the import of legislation toward the political rather than the social sector.

The single chamber system has lent itself to allowing passions to come to the fore at certain times, to the point of scandalizing the country.

Thus, he said, he believes that the bicameral system with certain needed amendments could enable us to establish more sensible, fully discussed and carefully considered laws with greater social import and less political influence. This would allow political passions to abate somewhat, while a single chamber develops into a cauldron.

He said that this is the amendment which has been discussed in his party and with a number of the members of the National Chamber of Representatives.

Juan Manuel Real defended the two-chamber system, stating that his knowledge of history suggests that this mechanism has never resulted in real failure.

He acknowledged that the bicameral system has been slow and has never allowed the nation to produce laws with the necessary speed. But he noted that with a single chamber, there is the problem of legislation which is too hasty and superficial, such that within a short time the work has had to be redone, as was the case with the traffic law.

He stressed that the bicameral system has produced excellent results in many countries, and that flexible constitutional elements making it possible to avoid the errors of the past need to be introduced.

He insisted that the bicameral system does not mean a return to the past, because both this system and the single-chamber system are in effect in many countries.

The fact is that we have retained the latter system too long, and however many amendments are made, its basic shortcomings will continue to exist, the Popular Democratic legislator added.

Representative Juan Tama Marquez, also a member of the Popular Democratic Party, said for his part that the present constitution, instead of being amended, needs to be implemented, because there is a whole series of new institutions supported by the progressive political parties and approved by popular vote which have never been made a reality.

Among these he mentioned the four basic ownership sectors. No change can be effected in the country and we will never be capable of consistency with the theses of social and economic change except by altering the ownership structure. And the four ownership sectors in the constitution are a dead letter. Today, on the parliamentary level, we have not seen the promulgation of laws with a view to organizing these sectors so that all of the basic industry in this country will be in the hands of the state, and so that the new forms of ownership such as the self-management the Popular Democratic Party urges will begin to function.

If we can say this about the four ownership sectors, we could also mention other institutions, such as worker participation in enterprise management, which is set forth in the constitution now in effect, as are socialized medicine and popular consultation, both now in the same situation.

This the constitution needs to be realized in fact, instead of being amended, Tama stressed.

But when it comes to amendment of the constitution, two basic aspects have been discussed in the dialogue between the parties and the minister of government and justice. One of them is the shortening of the legislative period and the other the return to the bicameral system.

This representative added that, when it comes to the continuity for which the present constitution provides in the structure of the parliament, so as to prevent elections halfway through the period from facing the executive branch with a majority which may hinder administrative projects, it is the desire of the present government to make it possible for the government to express their views.

He said that the present government is certain that in an election of this sort, it would win the support of the people, as the results of the most recent elections showed.

On the subject of the two-chamber system, Tama said that it contributes greatly to the consolidation of leadership in the executive branch. For if we want to have a strong executive branch, we cannot also have a strong parliament.

He maintained that the country has historically sought to have a strong executive branch which can be efficient. But this kind of executive branch, if paralleled by a parliament in a similar position, would lead to constant conflict, he added.

He stressed that the present parliament is a strong one because it has a single chamber, has fewer members than the parliament of the past and is in office longer.

He explained that the bicameral system gives the executive branch greater maneuverability in the legislature, and on the basis of lengthened discussions, gives it greater power in the final analysis. He added that the expansion of the number of legislators also leads to longer discussions and that the shortening of the term of office eliminates the need of having to deal constantly with the same group of members.

He said that basically, this is at the root of the battle between the branches, because the country is witnessing the strengthening of a very strong parliament along with an executive branch which has the same characteristics.

One or the other must be the weaker if cordial relations are to prevail, he stressed.

He said that the democratic concept is prevailing over the old ideas which meant a division of authority. Now, a government is democratic when it works for the majority sector of the population, but is not democratic, even if there is a formal division of political authority, when it works for the oligarchic or elitist sectors of the population, Tama said.

Meanwhile, Democratic Left legislator Alejandro Carrion Perez said that his personal view is that the legislature needs amendment.

He said that it is urgent to amend the structure of the parliament, and that his party will probably propose a flexible, modern and efficient mechanism.

Carrion added that his party will propose that a supervisory function be established for the state, making it possible to introduce efficiency criteria in state administration.

He maintained that if amendment of the constitution in some superficial and still other basic respects is necessary, the prospect of change should never be a tool allowing the political right wing to hinder the changes which won the approval of the people in the 1978 referendum, at least from the declarative point of view.

The country must not allow any challenge to the system of ownership endorsed by the constitution, a real advance which regrettably has not been taken as seriously as it should by all branches of the state, Carrion stressed.

To revise that scheme would be a regressive action which could arouse the resistance of progressive sectors and could even cause chaos in the country, he said further.

In the realm of political rights, altering the right of illiterates to vote would also be a regressive step which could also arouse the resistance of progressive sectors, he said.

He indicated that to raise the issue of certain social gains again as the right wing wants to do would also be an error which could lead to a confrontation.

Any constitutional amendment should express what the people of Ecuador want, and not the individual viewpoints of government leaders or any other group, the legislator said in conclusion.

ECONOMIC COOPERATION AGREEMENTS SIGNED WITH YUGOSLAVIA

Quito EL COMERCIO in Spanish 8 Nov 81 p A-7

[Text] Belgrade, 7 November (EFE)--Yugoslavia and Ecuador signed an economic cooperation protocol at the conclusion of the visit paid here by a delegation from that South American country headed by Minister of Commerce Orlando Alcibar.

In the protocol, the two countries expressed their readiness to expand their trade exchange to include new products and to encourage cooperation in the realm of bilateral production enterprises in the electrical, automobile and tractor industries.

The protocol supports the participation of Yugoslav enterprises in carrying out various energy, food industry and electrification projects in Ecuador.

Minister Alcibar told the EFE news agency that "Yugoslavia has confirmed its interest in purchasing products from Ecuador, widening the variety and increasing their volume, but because of the balance of payments problem, it has insisted on participating in infrastructure projects which are being carried out in Ecuador."

During the talks held with the Yugoslav delegation headed by Minister Metod Rotar, that European nation expressed its interest in developing purchases of traditional products such as bananas, and expanding purchases to include cocoa products, fish meal, frozen fish and shrimp and tropical fruit juices.

On the subject of Yugoslav participation in infrastructure projects to be carried out in Ecuador, Alcibar told EFE that Yugoslavia may participate in a future multiple electrical energy plant project, which, in addition to facilities for the production of electrical energy will include irrigation and drainage installations in the Guayas River basin.

Alcibar said that Yugoslavia will allocate 26 percent of its available foreign exchange in 1982 for purchases from countries in the process of development (50 percent more than this year), and that Ecuador will benefit from this decision.

New markets are opening up for products from Ecuador in Romania, and sales will be expanded in Czechoslovakia, and will be made direct, since previously such trade was channeled through the GDR.

MONETARY SQUEEZE HITS PRIVATE SECTOR

Quito EL COMERCIO in Spanish 6 Nov 81 p A-1

[Text] The monetary shrinkage which has prevented proper financing of productive activity, among other things, has had a basic effect on the private sector and banking this year, official figures indicate.

The situation has not been rosy thus far in 1981.

Among other things, according to the statistics available from the Central Bank, international monetary reserves declined, the balance of payments deficit increased, the funds in the hands of the private sector dropped and there was a substantial decrease in the available funds of private banks.

On the other hand, the funds in the hands of the public sector and available Development Bank funds increased substantially.

The Central Bank increased currency issues by only 3 percent up to 16 October of this year. This increase is only a third of that during the comparable 9-1/2 months of last year.

The monetary shrinkage was the result in particular of the sales of foreign exchange by the Central Bank which absorbed a substantial volume of sucres.

International monetary reserves declined by 7.724 billion sucres, according to these same statistics provided by the Central Bank.

In 1981, the foreign sector of the economy saw monetary shrinkage, while in 1980 there was expansion in excess of 4.5 billion sucres.

The volume of money in the hands of the private sector dropped by 1.816 billion sucres by 8 October, as compared to the December 31 balance. Money available in banks also declined during the same period by 3.075 billion sucres.

The monetary shrinkage has prevented the adequate financing of productive activities.

Only money in the hands of the public sector increased in 1981. This figure had increased by 2.685 billion sucres by October, despite which the government is continuing to seek foreign credit to finance the budget.

Funds available in private banks had dropped by 5.976 billion sucres by 18 September of this year, and private deposits with the Central Bank were down 3.644 billion.

NAVY ACQUIRES OCEANIC RESEARCH VESSEL

Guayaquil EL UNIVERSO in Spanish 30 Oct 81 p 9

[Text] On 21 October, the new oceanographic research vessel "Orion HI-92," built at the Ishikawajima-Harima Shipyards in Japan set sail for our country. It is the most recent purchase made by the navy of Ecuador for the scientific research departments of oceanography, meteorology, geophysics and hydrography at the Oceanographic Institute.

The oceanographic vessel "Orion HI-92" has the following characteristics:

1. Suitable laboratory distribution and adequate deck space for sampling purposes.

2. Adequate propulsion systems of the diesel and electric types, with a bow propeller to facilitate oceanographic tasks.

3. High-level noise and vibration reduction.

4. Very comfortable crew accommodations (air conditioning).

5. A cruising range of 30 days (6,000 nautical miles).

6. Extensive functional capacity at low speeds.

7. Capacity to prevent drift while on station.

Its dimensions are as follows: length—70.20 meters; gross tonnage—1,100 tons; cruising speed—12.0 knots; and cruising range of 12 knots—6,000 miles.

It carries a crew of 45, including officers, crew members and scientists.

This brand new vessel is equipped with the latest and most sophisticated scientific research laboratories, which will enable the Oceanographic Institute to carry out the tasks dictated by the scientific and technical advances in the sciences of hydrography and oceanography and urgently needed by the maritime countries which, like Ecuador, base their geopolitical aspirations on the development of maritime awareness in terms of the exploration and exploitation of the natural resources of the sea.

The purchase of this oceanographic research vessel represents an important landmark in the growth of the INOCAR, established by the hydrographic department on 2 February 1932, marking, as it does, a new stage in its advancement as the celebrations of the 50th anniversary of this institute's service to the maritime interests of Ecuador and the world begin.

SUGAR PRICE HIKE SPARKS DEMONSTRATION, SPECULATION

Quito Demonstrations

Guayaquil EL UNIVERSO in Spanish 29 Oct 81 p 12

[Text] Violent student demonstrations resulting in dozens of arrests and slight injuries to three persons occurred in the early morning hours in this capital city yesterday, in reaction to the increase in sugar prices decreed by the Economic Front.

At 7:30 in the morning, students, from the Mejia National Institute and the Central University of Ecuador, in particular, blocked the main thoroughfares, such that traffic was halted, serious traffic jams occurred and many vehicles were damaged.

On 10 August and America avenues and at the Vargas Street intersection just below the Mejia Institute, students put up barricades, interfering with the passage of vehicles and pedestrians, but the students were dispersed by police.

The students arrested, including five minors from the Mejia Institute, were initially taken to the temporary detention center at the Garcia Moreno Prison, but then, on instructions from the Ministry of Government and Justice, they were released, it was announced.

The students lifted a number of vehicles bodily and placed them so as to block traffic on 10 August Avenue, opposite the Central Bank of Ecuador. Until noon, the police, proceeding cautiously, were unable to clear the street.

However, security agents used a number of tear gas grenades to scatter the demonstrators until their goal was achieved.

By 1300 hours, calm had been reestablished in the sectors where there had been disturbances and both mass transport and private vehicles could proceed without obstruction.

Meanwhile, three persons suffering minor injuries due to carelessness were treated at the infirmary of the Mejia Institute.

Amparo Vilana, 20 years of age, suffered scrapes on the right foot and leg while in transit to the Mejia Institute, and returned to his home after being treated at the school.

Marco Esteves, a third-year student at the Mejia [illegible]ute, suffered a broken little finger while hastening to get off a bus being att[illegible]d by the students.

Jaime Carcelen, 19 years of age, was struck in the head by a stone and suffered a skull fracture.

This was the first demonstration of popular protests against President Osvaldo Hurtado since he took office on 24 May of this year.

Price Gouging

[Text] The new sugar prices established by interministerial decree No 406 promulgated by the Economic Front had not gone into effect until yesterday, since they had not yet been published in the REGISTRO OFICIAL.

This publication, the official gazette of the national government, did not appear yesterday and the issue which should have come out will be made available at 10:00 o'clock this morning.

Decree 406 provides that the new prices will become effective as of the date of their publication in the REGISTRO OFICIAL.

However, both retail and wholesale merchants began selling sugar at the new price (650 sucres per quintal) resulting in protests by the citizens.

Retail grocers were selling sugar at 8 sucres per pound, while others were charging 7.50.

Meanwhile, the chief of the General Police Administration of Pichincha, Galo Chiriboga Zambrano, dispatched four ENPROVIT [National Enterprise for Vital Products] trucks to various parts of the city to sell sugar at the prevailing government price until the decree setting the new prices goes into effect.

INTERIM PREFECT NAMED--Guayaquil, 6 November--Economist Cecilia Calderon de Castro, vice-president of the Guayas Provincial Council, has temporarily taken over the functions of the prefect of Guayas, taking charge of the inspection of the installations in which road machinery is made in the absence of Prefect Guido Chriboga Parra, who is visiting Japan as the guest of a firm in that country. One of Calderon's first actions was to tour the shed workshops and the council offices, observing the employees in their normal activities at their labor posts. Calderon stated that "during this interim period, efforts will be devoted to promoting the labor fronts to which the council has committed itself in the province, as well as obtaining the quotas assigned to the council by law from various state bodies for the financing of its projects." SALVADORAN GUERRILLAS ENTERING COUNTRY AS REFUGEES

PA250132 Tegucigalpa Radio America in Spanish 1145 GMT 24 Nov 81

[Article by (Anaribe Calix) from San Pedro Sula]

[Text] Salvadoran guerrillas pose as refugees to enter the country. According to the newspaper LA PRENSA, it has been confirmed that Salvadoran guerrillas enter Honduran territory disguised as refugees to seek the protection offered by Honduran neutrality in the internal conflict of that neighboring country. The report, confirmed by a ranking government official, added that the situation created by these elements jeopardizes the Honduran position.

According to the report, the Salvadoran refugees enter Honduras as if it were home, which makes it difficult for the authorities to detect whether these Salvadorans truly seek protection in Honduras. The guerrillas, the report added, come and go as they please in the refugee camps without any control from the Honduran authorities. This makes it possible for the actual guerrillas to carry out their actions against Salvadoran troops, reach the Honduran border, enter the country posing as refugees without any trouble and avail themselves of the Honduran neutrality for protection.

Honduran Foreign Minister Col Cesar Elvir Sierra confirmed the information, indicating that the situation has become a very serious problem for the Honduran Government which is trying to uphold its neutrality policy. Because these elements take advantage of this neutrality to freely harass the enemy, they cause serious difficulties for the government.

According to the reports, the Honduran authorities often detect the presence of leftist elements in Salvadoran refugee camps. When they are asked to leave the country, however, and avoid causing problems to the country, they claim to be refugees and there is nothing then the authorities can do about it. This situation has placed Honduras in a very delicate predicament, the minister said.

Meanwhile, the Salvadoran army knows that groups of guerrillas leave refugee camps in Honduras to carry out acts of terrorism and when chased by the troops, they hide in the famous hollows and later appear on the lists of refugees.

The foreign minister asserted that the actions of these elements, besides jeopardizing the Honduran neutrality, constitute a very serious problem. Recently, a group of Salvadoran leftists entered Honduran territory, ambushed a Honduran patrol and killed two soldiers.

JLP: NOTHING WILL HOLD BACK TAX REFORM

Justice For Taxpayers, Municipalities

Mexico City EL SOL DE MEXICO in Spanish 8 Nov 81 pp 1-A, 12-A

[Article by Roberto Noriega G.]

[Text] Tuxtla Gutierrez, Chis. 7 Nov (OEM) --[Mexican Publishing Organization]). At the close of the 14th Meeting of Tax Officials, the president of Mexico said that the tax reform, launched some time ago and given further impetus under this administration, will continue during other administrations in order to attain the goal of distributing the public expenditure burden in a more equitable and proportional manner among Mexicans and fundamentally "to strengthen federalism and to give the municipalities a guarantee of decent survival."

The nation's chief executive addressed tax officials throughout the country who met in the capital and told them that this pursuit of the great ideas contained in the constitution is a continuous one. "This is not just a matter of doing justice to the taxpayers but also to the regions, to the states, and to the municipalities. This is a constant effort of education and justice which is encountering obstacles; but it overcomes these obstacles, it proposes solutions which in turn become obsolete and which must be replaced."

The meeting's closing ceremony took place today, at noon, in a modern hotel in this state capital in the southeastern part of the country; regarding the results obtained, President Lopez Portillo noted: "What we have heard here on this occasion fills us with satisfaction because it underscores the consistency and congruence of our intent to strengthen federalism.

"In this way, the government of the republic pursues justice, equity, and proportionality regarding the taxpayer and the attainment of the institutional objectives on the three levels of government. The conclusions, the results, the promotion effort, and the initiatives springing from this fill us with satisfaction," said the chief executive who on his trip was accompanied by the ministers of commerce and of agriculture and water power resources, among others.

After thanking the tax officials "for the way they have been performing their duties in the government, for their understanding and good will," the chief executive said that "a country is built in all of its parts, in all of the directions of its geography. This is what history tells us.

"I can see here the entire geography of our country, of our Mexico, and you are building it, you are making and writing history, in your areas of responsibility, you are writing the country's contemporary history," said the chief executive; he asked the treasurers of all states to be "aware of the importance of the decisions which have been adopted here and those that were adopted a year ago and even before, so that we may be aware of the continuity of the effort that identifies us and our undertaking as Mexicans."

After the end of the ceremony, the president of the republic granted audiences in the rooms of the hotel to the various sectors of this agency for half an hour, approximately, in order to resolve problems that had come up.

Shortly after 1230, the head of government departed for the airport in order to return to Mexico City.

Ibarra M. Announces Initiatives

Mexico City EL SOL DE MEXICO in Spanish 8 Nov 81 pp 1-A, 12-A

[Article by Roberto Noriega G.]

[Text] Tuxtla Gutierrez, Chis., 7 November (OEM). Finance Secretary David Ibarra announced that the executive branch will, this year, submit to the Congress of the Union a series of initiatives intended, among other things, to amend tax legislation; all of this is part of a "process of perfecting tax policy which tends to give federal, state, and city tax officials a greater ability to cope with short-term contingencies and demands for transformation in the production structure without causing discouragement in the basic processes of production, work, savings, and investments.

Ibarra Munoz, the main speaker during the closing session of the National Meeting of Tax Officials, said that we would persist in the effort to make new progress in amending income tax provisions, both from the viewpoint of better legal techniques and to extend the general nature of this tax, making it more equitable.

He asserted that this meeting managed to enrich the National Tax Coordination System which "constitutes new progress toward strengthening the economic autonomy of the federated entities. "As a matter of fact," he pointed out, "the various provisions which were agreed upon here signify the increase, by about one point, of the percentage of total federal tax collections which are transferred in the form of tax sharing to the federated entities and municipalities (10 billion pesos).

"Widening the autonomy of the province does not mean weakening federal power," said Ibarra Munoz, pointing out that, on the contrary, the strength of the Mexican state now depends more than ever before on the vigor of its federated states. "This is why strengthening the province today means giving renewed vigor to the pact which links us as a nation."

As for the initiatives which will have to be submitted to the Congress of the Union this year, he first of all singled out the draft of a Federal Law on Taxes. The new set up seeks to regulate the entire matter associated with the rendering of federal public services for which an economic reimbursement is collected.

"The initiative is based on the realization that the growing complexity of the economy and of government functions has turned taxes into an important and permanent part of the entire system of federal collections. Therefore, perfecting the system of democratic decisions within our government of laws implies that the determination of these decisions is in keeping with legislative acts and not simple administrative procedures, as has been happening so far," said the finance minister in his speech.

Furthermore, for the purpose of encouraging low-cost housing construction and to accomplish this primarily in the new development centers and in decentralized urban areas, the federal executive branch, in agreement with the federated entities, has decided to submit a bill which would amend the system of federal home purchase taxation.

"The Federation would yield all of the earnings from fees on the transfer of real estate property and its registration to the federated entities. Those who opt for the new system will, upon receiving the benefits mentioned, pledge to include in their legislation the same basis, taxes, exemptions, and incentives contained in the federal law," said Ibarra.

The official then explained: "The renewal of Mexican federalism could not be based any longer on the benevolent paternalism of the center toward the interior. Today, more than ever before, federalism does not have exclusive claim to liberty and sovereignty, ahead of the federated entities and municipalities, nor does it end simply with support for democratic participation; instead, at the same time, it contributes the necessary cohesion of efforts needed for a common undertaking of the nation which must be perfected day after day."

He also announced that, just as growing financial resources have been channeled in support of state and municipal governments, so have allocations for private activities, located in the province, also been increased considerably. And he gave two examples: loans for small and medium industry granted by FOGAIN (Guarantee and Development Fund for Medium and Small Industry) have been multiplied by 6 over the last 3 years. Credit for the agriculture and livestock sector has been increased three times during the same period of time.

"For the first time we are granting tax credits for investments in agriculture and the livestock industry which can be used to pay taxes or to pay back loans which may have been taken out with banking institutions."

The meeting, which in the beginning was addressed by Governor Sabines Gutierrez, to welcome the participants and to outline the tax measures adopted by the agency to "extend and understand the administration's economic and social policy," was also attended by CP Antonio P. Marin who talked about the results of the meeting, pointing out among other things that the share of federal funds channeled to the states in 1977 came to 27,758,000,000 pesos; in 1980, the figure was 112.53 billion , in other words, four times more; it is expected that the figure will be 156 billion in 1981, in other words, the amount has been increased six times in 5 years.

He also pointed out that, out of the total number of state taxes, 458 have been dropped and this, together with 31 federal taxes, has made it possible to modernize and reorganize the national taxation system and to simplify and mechanize the taxation system.

He also announced that the site for the 15th national meeting would be in the city of Puerto Vallarta, in Jalisco.

At this same meeting, Heriberto Galindo, director of mass communications of the Finance Secretariat, read the draft of the National Plan for Tax Education proposed by the Finance Secretariat ; the objective is to create an awareness of social solidarity regarding tax collections among current and potential tax payers in Mexico. The plan will be drafted by the finance authorities in coordination with the education authorities.

He noted that this plan is not obligatory. "This is a suggestion of an experimental nature, aimed at the design and application of a national system of tax education as a contribution to the construction of a just, united, and responsible Mexican society," said Heriberto Galindo.

Treasury: Insufficient Resources Cause Deficit

Mexico City EL SOL DE MEXICO in Spanish 8 Nov 81 pp 1-A, 12-A

[Article by Roberto Noriega G.]

[Text] Tuxtla Gutierrez, Chis., 7 November (OEM) —In view of the stories to the effect that the public expenditure deficit will come to 250 billion pesos, the undersecretary of revenue in the Finance Secretariat noted: "Tax funds certainly are not enough to cover this expenditure," and he announced at the same time that there will be a reasonable increase this year in tax collection amounting to 925 billion pesos.

Guillermo Prieto Fortun, interviewed in this city where he attended the National Meeting of Tax Officials, said that, in view of this shortage of tax funds to cover public expenditures, it is necessary to resort to domestic and foreign borrowing.

During the interview, the official from the Finance Secretariat said that this problem is getting worse because of the fact that "there are undoubtedly tax evaders against whom we are conducting a permanent struggle without truce in getting the Finance Secretariat to tackle this problem."

However, contrary to what is being said, Prieto Fortun explained: "I cannot give any figure as to the number of tax evaders and the amount of money we loose in tax revenues. It would be arbitrary to give any specific figure on that score."

The undersecretary for revenues then said that, if the tax authorities knew where those tax evaders are, "we would move directly against them."

He then noted on the other hand that there had been a considerable increase in the tax burden in recent years, without going into details. At that point he noted that there will be an increase in the collection of taxes this year so that public expenditures naturally will not show a deficit while loans will be reduced.

Prieto Fortun also talked about other topics relating to the support which the federal government gives to the states and municipalities through tax sharing—a topic which the finance secretary covered during his participation in the closing ceremony of the meeting headed by President Lopez Portillo.

MINISTER'S RESIGNATION REJECTED--Lima, 27 Nov (AFP)--The general secretariat of the presidency tonight reported that President Fernando Belaunde Terry has rejected the resignation Aeronautics Minister Lt Gen (ret) Jose Garcia Calderon submitted today. Garcia Calderon submitted the resignation because one of the promotions proposed was not approved. The minister resigned because the Senate did not approve the promotion of one officer from the list submitted by the air force command. The president reiterated his confidence in Garcia Calderon. Belaunde said that the Senate has constitutional rights whose application does not imply criticism. [Text] [PY281211 Paris AFP in Spanish 0310 GMT 28 Nov 81]

MISMANAGEMENT CHARGES--Lima, 26 Nov (TELAM)--General Francisco Morales Bermudez, a former Peruvian president, last night accused President Fernando Belaunde Terry's administration of being responsible for the heavy deficit of the national budget and for seeking excuses to justify mass sales of state-owned enterprises to private businessmen. In his statement to the press the former president said that when he left power on 28 July 1980, the country had a balanced budget and now, 15 months later there is a budget deficit of $851 million, for which he can find no explanation. Morales Bermudez was the second president of the so-called Peruvian revolution which kept power in the hands of the military from 1968 until the advent to power of the current administration last year. "I do not believe that we should be selling state enterprises to pay fiscal deficits and making it a precedent which may become a habit," Morales Bermudez said. Morales Bermudez, who relieved President Juan Velasco Alvarado in 1975, said that in his opinion there are no sensible reasons whatsoever for selling public enterprises to private businessmen at this point. The military officer concluded by saying that it is too early to talk about his possible presidential candidacy for the 1985 elections. "We can hardly tell what will happen between now and then," he said. [Excerpts] [PY271840 Buenos Aires TELAM in Spanish 1325 GMT 26 Nov 81]

FORMER PRESIDENT'S STATEMENT CRITICIZED--Senate President Javier Alva Orlandini has said that Peru was handed over to the constitutional government in a state of economic and social bankruptcy. He made this statement at a press conference during which he commented on the statement made by former president Gen (Ret) Francisco Moralea Bermudez before leaving for Caracas, Venezuela. Alva Orlandini said that he did not know what Morales Bermudez had said, but, he added, if there are some Peruvians who do not have enough moral standing to criticize the government's economic policy, one of them is precisely general (ret) Morales Bermudez. He recalled that during the first stage of the military government Morales Bermudez performed as finance minister, bearing, therefore, responsibilities in the economic sector. Later, as president he had substantial control of the country's economic and financial policy with the results that all of us regret. He also said that the recent violent and [word indistinct] actions are executed by antisocial agents who are given instructions from abroad. FOREIGN INVESTMENTS IN ANDEAN GROUP DISCUSSED

Caracas NUMERO 4 in Spanish Oct 81 pp 54-55

[Article by Washington Herrera: "Foreign Investments in the Andean Group"]

[Text] Since 1970, Bolivia, Colombia, Ecuador, Peru, and Venezuela have been implementing a joint system of foreign investments and technology which was modified in 1976 to adjust it to conditions prevailing on the domestic and foreign markets. Little is known in Europe about the real scope and meaning of this instrument for harmonizing the policies of the Andean group. Unjustified questions are being asked or gratuitous attacks are being made perhaps because of this lack of knowledge. For the same reason, the advantages of this common handling of foreign investments are not known.

Investments are attracted to a greater extent when a project can generate profits and when the standards are steady in medium-range and long-range terms. The permanent aspect of this procedure must spring from harmony between the attitudes and actions of the investor and the receiving country but that calls for a balanced legal framework with characteristics of certainty.

In the past, foreign investments in some Andrean countries were subjected to policies fluctuating between restriction and liberalization, between control and absence of control, between excessive advantage and stifling restriction. The rules were changed as administrations with different orientations followed each other or even when a minister was thinking in a manner different from his predecessor. This situation of uncertainty and instability no longer exists in the Andean countries because they are using a system that cannot be modified except by unanimous accord among the five countries. This feature has been justified by international enterprises and, for example, the Council of the Americas, with headquarters in New York, which consists of United States firms with investments in Latin America, has accepted these rules and has changed its critical position in favor of open understanding and coexistence.

Beneficial System

The system involved in Resolution 24 for the Andean countries has been beneficial because it has enabled them to find out what kind of foreign investments are coming into their territories and how much and when. They can do a better job in negotiating the costs of technology transfer; they involve their domestic investors in the economic and production activities of the foreign enterprises; and they know what the rate of return is as far as profits are concerned. It is not true that, as a result of the implementation of Resolution 24, some enterprises decided to drop out or refrain from making investments. We do not know of any enterprise which, because of the implementation of this common system, decided not to participate in a good project.

During the period of 1971-1977, direct foreign investments in the Andean Group grew by 6.6% per year, a rate comparable to the general tendency in the developed countries. Here is the origin of investments: United States, 56%; Panama, 8%; United Kingdom, 3.5%; intra-Andean, 3%; remaining countries, 30%. The amount of foreign capital accumulated in the Andean Group in 1977 was $8 billion. In the manufacturing industry sector, the cumulative amount during that same year was $1.86 billion. Before Resolution 24 took effect, there were 663 branches or subsidiaries of foreign enterprises and by 1976 there were 1,228. All of these indicators show that the common system is not an obstacle to foreign investment although of course their beneficial effects will be delayed when the conversions of foreign enterprises into mixed or national enterprises begin to operate, especially in the industrial sector, which is where Resolution 24 has its greatest effect or is applied most.

Basic Rules

In response to the criticisms which are often expressed, it is important to stress the fundamental rules of this common instrument. There are four main norms:

(1) The remittance of net profits can come to 20% or more, so that there is no maximum or rigid ceiling. Here there is no reform needed other than a reform that would impose a limit.

(2) The obligation to transfer 51% of their shares to national investors within a period of 15 years for Colombia, Peru, and Venezuela and 20 years for Bolivia and Ecuador. I ask myself this: Is a foreign enterprise, which can get its capital back in 5 years or less and which refuses to sell shares after 15 or 20 years of having operated, desirable for a country? I must however remark that the following foreign companies are exempt from this obligation to become mixed enterprises:

(a) Enterprises whose output is intended to the extent of 80% or more for markets outside the subregion;

(b) Enterprises involved in the tourism sector;

(c) Enterprises engaged in exploration and exploitation activities involving liquid and gaseous hydrocarbons, construction of oil pipelines, gas pipelines, and forest operations;

(d) Enterprises in the public utility sector, such as water, sewage, energy, sanitation, and communications;

(e) Enterprises in the banking, finance, and insurance sectors;

(f) Enterprises involved in internal transportation, publicity, radio, television, daily newspapers and magazines, and domestic sales of any kind;

(g) Finally, enterprises which in Bolivia and Ecuador are involved in primary agricultural and animal husbandry activities.

Manufacturing Industry

This obligation however does apply to enterprises in the manufacturing industry to make sure that the Andean business operators and investors can gradually participate in ownership, in administrative management, and in the technological capacity. In this way, the costs of Andean integration will have benefits on Andean territory as a counterpart.

(3) The payment of royalties is worked out in an effort to provide equity and avoid abuses. This has been good for Andean business operators because they have been able to negotiate better with the suppliers of technology.

(4) We do not allow clauses here which take possible conflicts or controversies away from the national jurisdiction and authority of the receiving countries or which permit the substitution, by the states, of the rights and shares of the investors. This is a basic norm which is in line with a policy position of our countries that cannot be renounced.

The joint system of handling foreign capital has given the Andean Group an appearance of its own and a pioneering character worldwide; but it must be noted that the uniform implementation of these rules is running into some difficulties due to the absence of common regulations and insufficient relations between the national agencies of the countries that are responsible for the implementation of these provisions.

It is urgent and necessary to perfect its implementation, thus strengthening its full effectiveness and guaranteeing attainment of its main objectives. For this purpose it is indispensable to provide impetus for a process of agreements and successive stages toward the gradual adoption of common regulations. Fortunately, all countries agree with that idea and if there were any doubts at any time in Peru, they were dispelled at the right time.

CONTROVERSIAL ASPECTS OF BERMEJO PROJECT DISCUSSED

Buenos Aires LA NACION in Spanish 10 Nov 81 p 9

[Article by Julio Cesar Fossati: "Bermejo River: Works or Debate"]

[Text] By agreement between the president of the nation and the governors of the provinces of Jujuy, Salta, Formosa, Chaco, Santa Fe and Santiago del Estero, a pact was signed on 2 October to create the Bermejo Regional Commision [COREBE]. The Steering Committee of this body will consist of a minister of the national government and the governors of the riparian provinces on the Bermejo river (Jujuy, Salta, Formosa and Chaco), and the provinces of Santa Fe and Santiago del Estero. The two latter provinces were included as the result of a long case history.

The body thus created will set up its own statute in which it will establish its operative mechanisms as well as the scope of its authority and functions with respect to studies, plans, construction, financing and administration of the works, especially as regards their hydraulics, with the object of achieving total regulation of the Bermejo river.

The purpose of the regulation is to smooth out the irregularity of flow arising from its natural pattern of inflow--which is excessive in summer, causing floods and erosion, and scanty or nonexistent in winter, causing water shortages and droughts--to achieve a permanent availability of water in the form of a constant --or at least manageable--flow of the total volume delivered for the various uses to which it is to be put. This regulation is achieved by storing the water in reservoirs during the season in which there is an excess, and using the accumulated water during those times when the demand exceeds the river's incoming supply.

In the Bermejo's upper basin (in Argentina, Bolivia, and sections common to both), four groups of works projects that will enable such regulation have been identified: 1. The shared Bermejo Group (Las Pavas and its equalizer); 2. The Tarija Group, with one Bolivian and one shared project (Cambari-Astilleros and equalizer); 3. The Pescado-Blanco Group, Argentine (Pescado I, Pescado II, El Portillo and Vado Hondo); 4. Zanja del Tigre and its equalizer; 5. The Navigable Canals and Connected Works Group.

Groups 1 and 3 can be undertaken irrespective of the others, from the standpoint of the main objectives to be achieved. The decision as to their ordering will depend upon technical, political and economic factors. On the other hand, the efficiency of Group 4 (Zanja del Tigre) will depend upon whether or not Groups 1 and 3 have been built.

Each of the said groups would provide guaranteed outflows of close to 70 cubic meters per second and installed hydroelectric power outputs as follows: Group 1: 147 megawatts; Group 2: 242 megawatts; Group 3: 647 megawatts; and Group 4: 463 megawatts.

Group 1 consists in its first phase of the Las Pavas dam and its equalizer. This project would have an installed power of 150,000 kilowatts and would supply a guaranteed permanent flow of some 70 cubic meters per second at Zanja del Tigre. In subsequent phases, use would have to be made of the difference in levels between Las Pavas and its equalizer located at the site named Arrazayal, which would double the installed power of the binational section of the Bermejo, that is, to some 300,000 kilowatts. The guaranteed outflow would be increased slightly.

Group 2 includes the Cambari project (Bolivian) and the Astillero and its equalizer (shared). This phase of the project would provide a guaranteed outflow exceeding 80 cubic meters per second at Zanja del Tigre and would accommodate an installed hydroelectric production of 242,000 kilowatts. A second phase under this group would call for analyzing the possible use of the level drop between Astilleros and its equalizer to achieve, through another project, probably San Telmo, a higher level of energy production.

Group 3's projects are entirely within the national territory and will contribute substantially as well to achieving a reasonable degree of control over suspended solids and sediments, this being the sector of the Bermejo basin that is most affected by this problem. The first phase would guarantee a flow of 80 cubic meters per second at Zanja del Tigre and an installed power output of 647 kilowatts. Subsequent phases would require the study and construction of the Pescado III works on the Pescado river and the Monoyo and San Jose works on the Iruya river, which would increase the installed power of this group by 100 megawatts.

Group 4 consists Zanja del Tigre and its equalizer. This project is in Argentine territory and has a strategic role from the technical standpoint: a) It is the one that will enable optimization of the hydroelectric management of the other three groups described above; b) it is the necessary and indispensable project to make river navigation possible; c) it is the group needed to complete the regulation of the Bermejo river. Optimization of its operation, however, minimization of its cost and maximization of its service life all depend upon the above three, especially the works projects of Group 3.

Group 5 consists of: I. A lateral canal off the Bermejo river emptying into the Paraguay river with a run of 728 kilometers. II. A Santiago del Estero or a Mediterraneo canal emptying into the Parana river at the level of the city of Santa Fe, with a run of 1100 kilometers. III. Connected works projects, exclusive of ports and railway links.

Technical and Economic Data on Bermejo Works Projects Groups

Situation	Guaranteed Flow(1)	Installed Power(2) (MW)	Average Annual Energy(3) (GWh)	Cost(4) in U.S. Dollars a/o December 1979 (in millions)
Present status(5)	24	---	---	---
Group 1 (6)	70	147	400	140
Group 2 (7)	80	242	1,117	411
Group 3 (8)	80	647	1,780	1,185
Group 4 (9)	130	463	1,170	1,480
Group 5 (10)	---	---	---	(12)
Theoretical total regulation (11)	310	---	---	---

Key:

1. Guaranteed flow at Zanja del Tigre (cubic meters per second).
2. Installed power: MW = 1,000 kW.
3. Average annual energy: GWh = 1,000,000 kWh.
4. Costs converted to present worth as of December 1979.
5. Flow is for river under natural conditions: present minimum.
6. Comprises: Las Pavas (binational) and its equalizer reservoir.
7. Comprises: Cambari (Bolivia); Astilleros (binational) and its equalizer reservoir (binational).
8. Comprises: Pescado II; Pescado I; El Portillo and Vado Hondo. Deals with the zone of intensive erosion (all are Argentine works projects).
9. Comprises: Zanja del Tigre and its equalizer reservoir.
10. Comprises: The lateral canal (parallel to the Bermejo) 728 km, and the Mediterraneo or Santiago del Estero canal (1,100 km).
11. Theoretical total regulation will provide average figures shown.
12. Present-value figures not available; cost of a navigable canal, not in-including costs of excluded works and connected works, would be some $2,000,000 per kilometer.

Construction times would be: Group 1: 5 years; Group 2: 5 years; Group 3: 7 years; Group 4: 7 years; Group 5: depending upon technology to be used.

A- Las Pavas
B- Cambarí
C- Astilleros
D- Pescado II
E- Pescado I
F- El Portillo
G.- Vado Hondo
H- Zanja del Tigre

It has been reliably estimated that the present minimum volume of flow, that is, its flow under natural conditions (some 24 cubic meters per second) at Zanja del Tigre, and without major modifications in the use that is currently being made of its waters, would be adequate only until 1990. Beginning in the next decade, unless the minimum flow is increased, the deficit will slow the present rate of development of the province of Salta and of the western parts of Formosa and Chaco. Any one of the above groups of works would result in a threefold or fourfold increase in availability beginning in 1990 to meet human, agricultural and livestock requirements.

The guaranteed flows of Groups 1 to 3 are additive, so that combinations would provide flows as follows: Groups 1 and 2: 150 cubic meters per second; Groups 1 and 3: 150 cubic meters per second; and Groups 1, 2 and 3: 230 cubic meters per second.

The reservoir at Zanja del Tigre, owing to its effective impoundment volume, would add some 130 cubic meters per second.

Regulation of the waters is the prior requisite for the definitive allocation of flows for different uses. The allocation of these flows must also take into account under planned uses the rights of the national and provincial states, which have jurisdiction over the use and management of the water. There are consumer- or partially-consumer-type uses (navigation, irrigation) and other uses that are not consumer-type (generation of energy), and still others in which the allocated volumes are partially consumed but in which their quality is modified (supply to the population and to industries, and contaminated effluents) and which therefore require inversion processing for their reuse. The national government, on the other hand, has full jurisdiction over water use for navigation, while its jurisdiction with regard to the generation of hydroelectric power is debatable. And control of a river's waters for all other uses is the right of its riparian provinces, especially their use to supply populations and industries and for irrigation, because of the social, political and economic aspects involved.

It is precisely these aspects that have produced the most heated debates on the Bermejo river since the creation of the national commission, which was headed by Admiral Portillo, because of the many proposed projects. The riparian provinces maintain that the river has flows that, even if regulated, would only limitedly supply the needs of very vast regions already suffering from a shortage of water, if flows are to be diverted to other basins, such as to those of Santiago del Estero and Santa Fe, assigning navigational and irrigational priorities to them. The provinces of Santiago del Estero and Santa Fe, for their part, maintain that the proposed navigable canal would enable the development of a region which is today effectively being retarded by the lack of an adequate, high-freight-capacity system of transportation that is more economical than the rail system. The national government, on the other hand, has, from an international standpoint (specifically with respect to Brazil), maintained its opposition on principle to the diverting of flows from one basin to another, holding that the diverting of flows from the Bermejo basin to that of Pasaje Juramento-Salado constitutes a contradiction with respect to that principled position.

The fact is that the debate is senseless at this time for various reasons: 1) The works described do not make any of their projects irreversible (neither the irrigational not the navigational ones), even after all of them have been built; 2) If regulation is not provided, none of the beneficial uses of the water will be available, and the flood-drought cycle will be prolonged indefinitely; 3) The question of the location and design of, and the decision to construct, navigable canals is exclusively the province of the national government, it being moreover useless and perturbing to demand an immediate decision when the assured and absolute technical feasibility of the projects involved depends, under the best of circumstances and for the time being, upon regulating the flows, even though only partially. This will not be possible until the year 2000, even if the plan of construction of the works and its funding were to be decided and were totally assured as of this very moment.

The creation of this interjurisdictional body of the national and six provincial governments--assuming its approved statute and functions are sufficiently ample--will make it possible to address the entire project through a joint effort among them. It will undoubtedly be welcomed enthusiastically by the Republic of Bolivia into the binational planning effort, since the regulation of the river flow will also link it to the Parana and Plate Rivers and to the Atlantic Ocean.

REPORTAGE ON TRANSFER OF STATE-OWNED FIRMS TO PRIVATE HANDS

Presidential Announcement

La Paz PRESENCIA in Spanish 5 Nov 81 p 1

[Text] Gen Celso Torrelio Villa has announced that next year the government will begin the gradual transfer of a few state-owned firms "to a new form of ownership and management" while protecting sources of employment. He announced at the same time that the armed forces will be modernized, both to insure the security of the frontiers and so that they can participate "in the struggle for economic and social development."

Torrelio was attending yesterday's ceremony marking the 156th anniversary of the founding of the Camacho 1st Artillery Regiment, which is stationed in the city of Oruro.

He delivered a speech in which he underscored the anniversary of that military unit, whose history, he said, "is the same as the history of the fatherland," since it was organized with fighters from the war for independence.

He said that the armed forces program for government "has proclaimed the unpostponable need to improve and modernize the three branches making up our military institution, not only to insure the security of our frontiers but also so that the military can participate more fully and efficiently in the struggle for the economic and social development that will guarantee the great destiny deserved by our fatherland."

He added that "for the goals we propose to achieve in development, the action and philosophy of our military institution will be of extreme importance, especially in the establishment of active frontiers, the development of the community--mainly the rural community--and the intransigent defense of our resources, both human and natural."

He pointed out that the government is seeking to expand private enterprise's sphere of action by gradually reducing state participation, especially in those sectors where state management has been running a deficit. He said that this reorientation reverses the trend toward nationalization which has given rise to the formation of a contradictory society, but that in this reorganization of ownership, there is no thought of abandoning strategic areas or those "that symbolize our Bolivian-based will and essence."

He said: "Although we have already approved the necessary economic austerity measures aimed at reducing spending by the central government and will next year--after the appropriate studies and evaluations are completed--begin the gradual transfer of a few state-owned firms to a new form of ownership and management, we will not in any way, through these or other actions, deliver the Bolivian worker up to the fate of unemployment that would result from an irresponsible economic attitude lacking all social wisdom."

He said he was sure that the operation of a free labor market regulated by the law of supply and demand would be the final result of economic development, but never the instrument for achieving it.

Lastly, he promised that his government would pay special attention to solving the problems of Oruro and invited the inhabitants to join the "great crusade for national salvation" undertaken by the armed forces government, adding that by accepting a historic challenge, "our efforts and our persistent work toward that end will set the example that the entire country will follow."

Denationalization Denied

La Paz EL DIARIO in Spanish 6 Nov 81 p 3

[Text] Minister of Foreign Relations Gonzalo Romero denied yesterday that the government is considering the denationalization of state-owned firms.

He said that if denationalization were considered, it would have to be dealt with not only at the cabinet or government level: "I feel that public opinion would have to be consulted through the media and that the matter would also have to be closely studied by those who, as ministers in those particular areas, could make a report to the national cabinet."

He was categorical in stating that "none of that is going on" and that at least as far as the government and cabinet are concerned, nothing has been considered in that respect.

Concerning a number of publications reporting that it is the IMF which is urging a policy of denationalization, Romero said it was not obvious, since the Bolivian Government would not bow to any pressure, whether internal or external, concerning its handling of its economic and financial problem: "It is a serious problem in itself and one that would in no case be mixed in with the questions being asked of me."

Meeting of Foreign Ministers

Concerning the meeting of foreign ministers that begins next week in Santa Cruz, the minister of foreign relations said that as in previous meetings concerned with integration, experiences are being gathered through the meeting and that many of those that have been implemented have already made it possible to carry out projects.

He said that such meetings contribute to the general integration of the continent and, especially, that of the subregions.

He said that the Plata Basin holds an extraordinary future for Bolivia because it provides one means of obtaining access to the Atlantic Ocean and of linking ourselves with brother peoples, in addition to creating factors for development in what could be called territory bordering on the great rivers that flow into the basin.

Concerning the river link, he emphasized that the problem of dealing with it is a vast one, but that it represents a factor for almost subcontinental integration that is much greater in scope than any other.

The topic will receive special treatment at a conference which has already begun and in which Peru has been invited to cooperate with Bolivia in organizing the event scheduled to take place in the city of Santa Cruz.

Editorial: Far-Reaching Changes

Santa Cruz EL MUNDO in Spanish 5 Nov 81 p 5

[Editorial: "Denationalization of State-Owned Firms"]

[Text] On several occasions the president of the republic has mentioned the possibility that several firms managed by the state will be returned to the private sector. The announcement has to do with a basic change in the country's economic management, which until now has been characterized by a strong trend toward nationalization.

The transfer of state-owned firms to the private sector in some cases and the implementation of a policy favorable to private enterprise in others will give the national entity a new face that is much more compatible with its basic obligations.

Institutions such as the Bolivian Development Corporation--whose achievements in establishing several firms cannot be denied--apparently will not be affected by a change in economic policy if a place can be found for them in the field of project promotion. The funds they would gain by transferring their firms to the private sector should be allocated to the promotion of new projects.

The reason for the proposal to make a far-reaching change in the country's economic orientation is that the state-owned firms--under the influence of current political circumstances--have given rise to a flourishing bureaucracy that reduces their efficiency while also doing serious economic damage to the state.

It should be emphasized that a change in the state's economic orientation must not reflect a hasty decision on the part of the government. In the specific case of the transfer of state-owned firms to the private sector, the state's legitimate interests must be taken into account, since in the final analysis, they are also the interests of the country itself. For the private sector's part, it must adopt a responsible attitude, meaning in fact that it must make a positive contribution to the solution of national problems rather than being an additional factor for disturbance.

The denationalization of state-owned firms and the promotion of free enterprise must proceed in parallel with the modernization of those areas--such as education, health, and road communications--which have been ignored by the state as an entrepreneur.

These are really far-reaching changes that we are approaching after many long years of a nationalizing experience that is producing obviously negative results for Bolivia.

Government Control of Natural Resources

La Paz HOY in Spanish 6 Nov 81 p 6

[Text] Santa Cruz, 5 Nov--President Celso Torrelio has said here that natural resources will remain in the government's hands. He also announced that the new investment law will establish the guidelines for future activity by private enterprise, both domestic and foreign.

He also announced that the Porvenir hydrocarbon deposit, officially inaugurated today in the Department of Chuquisaca, will relieve the disturbing decline in petroleum production and mean a 35-percent increase in the current production rates of crude oil and condensate.

The president of the republic, who took part in the ceremony held at noon today at the facilities for the field discovered by the contractor, Bolivian Occidental, 325 kilometers south of this city, acknowledged the importance and significance of the deposit in question, where a total of $70 million was invested in the exploration phase and in preparing the infrastructure for exploiting, recycling, and pumping the resources discovered.

Also attending the ceremony were Jose Clemente Maurer, the Bolivian cardinal; Jorge Zamora, minister of energy and hydrocarbons; Adolfo Linares, minister of planning and coordination; Col Otto Lopez Murillo, general manager of Bolivian Government Oil Deposits [YPFB]; Chuquisaca officials, and special guests.

After the cardinal primate of the church had blessed the field, Donald R. Gladden, chairman of Bolivian Occidental, announced that the facility's capacity will permit a production and injection level of up to 100 million cubic feet of gas per day, resulting in the production, at full capacity, of approximately 8,000 barrels of petroleum daily.

He said that with this deposit having been put into operation, the company is now turning its attention to the exploration of new fields in the Chaco and Robore blocks, where Occidental also has operating zones obtained through contracts with Bolivian Government Oil Deposits.

Occidental currently has three operating fields: in the Robore block; the Tita field, where hydrocarbons have been discovered and which is currently producing 43 million cubic feet of gas and 1,300 barrels of petroleum daily; and the Chaco block in Chuquisaca, where Porvenir is located. This last-mentioned deposit--the largest discovered by Occidental--has a total of nine drilled wells, eight of which are production and/or injection wells.

The YPFB and Occidental are now negotiating a new contract for hydrocarbon exploration and exploitation.

Also speaking at the ceremony held at the Porvenir field was Robert Teistworth, Occidental's president for Latin America, who said that Occidental is indebted to YPFB personnel, whose help made the discovery and development of the field possible.

He said his company is proud of the Bolivian personnel working for Occidental (of the 301,000 technical and manual employees, 270,000 are Bolivians).

He said that production currently totals 3,000 barrels of petroleum daily, but that at the beginning of next year, it will rise to 3,000 [as published] barrels, representing 35 percent of Bolivia's production.

Lastly, he expressed his hope that the company will discover new producing fields for the benefit of both Occidental and the YPFB.

The minister of energy and hydrocarbons discussed the hydrocarbon policy established by the government, which assigns priority to the discovery of new reserves that will, basically, insure the country's self-sufficiency.

He added that for that purpose, using both its own resources in the form of deposits and private risk capital, the maximum effort is being made and will continue to be made to achieve that goal during the government's 3-year program.

He emphasized that the addition of the Porvenir field is a clear indication of how the established policy is being carried out.

He maintained that only through concerted action between our YPFB firm and risk contract firms such as Occidental, which have the necessary financial resources and access to our technologies, will we be able to move ahead with the discovery of new fields.

Lastly, he described the operating contract with Occidental that resulted in the discovery as being "favorable to the country's economic and social development."

In his short speech, the president of the republic expressed the satisfaction of the government and people at the startup of the Porvenir field, which, he said, "serves to avert from us the dangerous decline in petroleum production" that could have forced us to import hydrocarbons.

He mentioned the new policy of rapprochement between the government and private enterprise as part of the 3-year plan that was made public in October.

He emphasized the importance of the partnership between the government and private enterprise as far as insuring the rational exploitation of natural resources and improving the population's living standard are concerned.

He reaffirmed the policy of rapprochement with private capital for developing natural resources, "which will remain the property of the state," and said that the new investment law "will delineate the sphere of future activity by private capital."

He said that the country does not have adequate resources for engaging in intensive exploration for hydrocarbons, nor does it have the modern technology permitting full use of the existing resources by the inhabitants.

Reiterating his viewpoint regarding the opening of negotiations between the government and private enterprise, he said those negotiations must take place in an atmosphere of mutual respect that will help to preserve national sovereignty.

Lastly, he congratulated the YPFB and Occidental on their success in Porvenir and predicted greater successes for the benefit of the firms and the entire country.

Comparison of Public, Private Investment

Santa Cruz EL MUNDO in Spanish 1 Nov 81 p 1

[Text] La Paz, 31 Oct (ANF)--Private enterprise has carried out a better investment program over the past decade than government enterprise has.

Private enterprise fulfilled 75 percent of its approved plans, while the figure for government enterprise did not exceed 50 percent.

That official information is contained in a document published by the minister of industry and commerce in which the problems currently being faced by the productive sectors are detailed.

In the case of private enterprise, almost all of the credits intended for industry were used as working capital funds with which to build up inventories, and that was the main problem.

That characteristic was noted in the period from 1970 to 1979, and it presented a new negative feature in 1980, when the growth rate for industrial added value was less than 1 percent, while that for the GDP was 0.81 percent.

The phenomenon has its roots in the delayed startup of many projects in the public sector and the government's budget cuts.

It was also due to the weakening market encountered by some firms in the private sector due to adverse or inefficient economic, financial, and management conditions.

Another cause mentioned is the deficit position of some state-owned firms that have not been able to increase their production levels, thus spoiling their short-term possibilities, as well as the international economic blockage and political instability.

The official report adds that as industry grew through investments by the public sector, the market for the private sector was reduced.

In the last decade, the public sector fulfilled only half of its investment program, which totaled nearly 7.5 billion Bolivian pesos.

In the private sector, on the other hand, approved investments for the same period totaled 7.45 billion pesos, of which approximately 77 percent were completed, and incursions were made into nontraditional activities such as metal engineering, building materials, and chemical products.

NONINTERVENTION AT OAS MEETING--Castries, 3 Dec (AFP)--Brazilian Foreign Minister Ramiro Saraiva Guerreiro today reiterated in Saint Lucia the necessity to preserve the principles of self-determination, and non-intervention, within the OAS. Saraiva Guerreiro had a meeting this morning with the U.S. secretary of state, Alexander Haig, with whom he examined the current situation prevailing in El Salvador. The Brazilian foreign minister asserted, as had other speakers, that the OAS is passing through financial crisis which does not allow it to effectively confront the serious economic and social problems of the continent. In order to balance the growing demands of those sectors and the organization's income Saraiva Guerreiro asked for the utmost rationalization of the bureaucratic-administrative expenditures, including those for the organization's personnel. He also alluded to a projected reform of the Bogota charter, which he termed important but said that exaggerated hopes should not be placed on it. The preservation of the principles of non-interference and self-determination of peoples were considered by Saraiva Guerreiro to be indespensible in keeping Latin America immune to conflicts and from the contamination of its own dynamics by worldwide confrontations. RAUL ROA WARNS OF U.S. 'AGGRESSION'

Managua BARRICADA in Spanish 9 Nov 81 p 12

[Text] "Central America is not going to be a picnic for them. They have to think about that carefully because they will run into compact resistance with worldwide implications. A filibusterer attack is not easy; many interests are involved."

This is the answer given by Raul Roa, president of the People's Government Assembly of Cuba and former foreign minister of his country in view of the danger of a United States military invasion of Central America.

With impressive vigor, at the age of 72—65 of which were completely devoted to the anti-imperialist cause—Roa, whom the world knows as the "foreign minister of dignity" because of his untiring defense of the Cuban revolution and his outstanding participation in hostile international forums, without hesitation answered the questions put to him by BARRICADA on the international situation in an exclusive interview which he gave yesterday morning.

Full of confidence by virtue of the strength constituted in the anti-imperialist struggle by the people's and liberation movements, the nonaligned countries, the socialist community, Roa said: "The fundamental thing is not to be afraid of their blustering. When it comes to propaganda, they can say anything; they can threaten us but it will be difficult for them to carry out their plans." The support which the Nicaraguan revolution has, he indicated, and the changes brought about in Europe—the socialist governments in France and Greece—are in favor of the anti-interventionist positions.

Lying is their favorite sport, Roa added. "We must remember that the slogan used by fascism was that a lie, repeated a thousand times over, eventually becomes the truth. That is the heritage left to them by Hitler and imperialism continues to use this slogan."

And then he added with sarcasm: "Their blustering is endless; they are addicted to swaggering. They say ha! and we say ha!"

"Every time they stumble, they respond by kicking at somebody, like donkeys that lack in mental agility." That is how he defined the tactics of imperialism.

Sevilla Sacasa, the Blusterer

During his 18 years as Cuban foreign minister, Roa on many occasions had to confront the sadly famous Savilla Sacasa in the UN. Remembering the mendacious "dean," he says: "If I had to describe him for you, I would say that he is the vicious concretion of all human excretions." A fat, big-bellied blustering fellow with little brains, infinitely cowardly.

Then he told us an anecdote.

At one time—he recalls—an admiral representing Pinochet insulted Fidel. He accused him of a series of barbarous acts. I got up—he told us and rose from the sofa to make his story more lively—and I shouted to him that he should keep quiet, that he was like a ... like a ... and then Sacasa who was just a few yards away from my seat began to say "Somebody ought to give that fellow Roa a beating."

"But Sacasa did not realize that I heard him and I approached him and told him that if anybody was to get a beating, it would be him. I did not expect him to move toward me and he ran out of the room."

But who is Raul Roa? It is not easy to describe him so we asked him to do the job for us. That is when his humility took over as he told us: "If I had to describe myself, I would tell you that I am a vanguard fighter for the entire revolutionary process."

This simple answer reminded us of the Thirties when Roa, at the age of 17, joined the fight for liberty and democracy.

"During the time of Machado, many people became rich and wound up as millionaires."

"This was quite a collection of opportunists who fought against Machado for their own interests; I remember that, after the strike in 1935, we went into exile in Miami and from there Carlos Prio (who later on was president of Cuba and who after that was ousted by Batista) said that exile would never change him. He was the same type as Batista."

How many of your generation are still fighting?

"You can count them on the fingers of my two hands."

Finally we asked Roa, who is the current president of the People's Government Assembly in Cuba, about the meaning of the renewal of the people's government during the elections to be held this month.

"The slogan is: The people elect the best," he replied. And he added: "The democratic experience began 5 years ago with respect to a representative government. A triumphant revolution is not the same as a consolidated revolution. First you have to consolidate power, then you can advance broad election mechanisms without in any way jeopardizing the power you have gained after so much blood. It is not easy but it is necessary to provide certain conditions, such as the elevation of awareness, above all, to the effect that the people is a participant in the conduct of its destiny."

HAVANA NOTES SETBACKS IN U.S. SALVADORAN POLICY

FL041400 Havana Domestic Service in Spanish 1100 GMT 4 Dec 81

[Text] The so-called foreign minister of the genocidal Salvadoran junta, Fidel Chavez, was forced last night to acknowledge that he has never been able to prove that one Cuban or Nicaraguan citizen has, or is, participating in the guerrilla war in that country, and he has had to admit that he has no proof that either of those two countries has sent a weapon or a bullet to the guerrilla forces.

This was said by Chavez to journalists who questioned him after he had met with yankee Secretary of State Alexander Haig in Castries, capital of St Lucia, the 12th OAS general assembly is being held on that island.

The Salvadoran foreign minister's remarks coincided with another setback for the U.S. policy of military interference in El Salvador. The UN General Assembly's social commission has approved a resolution that expresses its very deep concern regarding the suffering of the Salvadoran people and which categorically asserts that the main basic causes of the situation in that country are due to internal political, economic and social factors.

And the resolution, which had 75 favorable votes and 21 against--with the United States among the latter, also deplores the killing of civilians by paramilitary groups that have been organized by the regime and the violation of the most elemental human rights, it demands that foreign interference stop and that the supply of weapons and every type of military support must also stop so that Salvadoran political forces can re-establish peace and security.

The resolution reaffirms that it is the Salvadoran people who must exercise their right to freely determine their economic, social and cultural development. They also have the right to create the necessary conditions and begin the necessary changes that will respond to their aspirations, as a people and a nation, without any type of foreign interference.

The resolution of the UN's social commission, which pictures the United States (?as an interfering power), provoked a hysterical reply from the yankee ambassador, Jean Kirpatrick, who, together with Washington's puppet regimes, tried in every way to prevent this political debacle for her government. Venezuela [words indistinct] vote together with the United States and the genocidal Salvador junta, as did other very proud democratic countries, such as Chile, Guatemala, Haiti, Israel, Morocco, Paraguay, Pakistan, Argentina, Boliva, Turkey and Uruguay.

COMMENTARY VIEWS LATIN AMERICAN REBELLION

PA020311 Havana International Service in Spanish 2310 GMT 1 Dec 81

[Our America Commentary]

[Text] The serious situation existing in Latin America, caused mostly by the renewed aggressiveness of North American imperialism, was analyzed during the permanent conference of Latin American Political Parties [COPPPAL] on 26 and 27 November in Panama City.

The COPPPAL expressed, in the first place, its concern over the threats and military intervention preparations by the United States against Cuba, Nicaragua and Grenada. This policy by the imperialists can only produce serious threats to peace in the region and the whole world, and the deterioration of the existing economic and political problems. This is why no organization truly concerned with the fate of humanity can remain indifferent to the great international movement of repudiation of the aggressive attitudes assumed by the present Washington Administration.

The COPPPAL meeting recently held in Panama City gave special attention to the situation existing in Central America and the Caribbean which is today, undoubtedly, one of the main areas of tension in the world.

The region's revolutionary peoples and governments are not responsible for the situation as the U.S. imperialists would like others to believe, in order to conceal their threats and interference in these nations which are continuously victimized by the most ruthless exploitation.

The explosive situation existing in Central America is the direct result of the imperialist policy which exploits these nations, denying them the slightest right to self-determination and independence.

Let there be an end to imperialist looting and there will be an end to unrest and the just rebellion of the Central American people.

The Panama conference said that the best way to find a political solution to El Salvador is to recognize the FMLN and the Revolutionary Democratic Front [FDR] as one of the parts involved in the conflict.

This conflict, it warned, will not be solved by a genocide disguised behind alleged elections in which most of the people cannot participate. A similar solution is proposed by the imperialists and their puppets for Guatemala.

The solidarity with the revolutionary process in Grenada, the rejection of the tyranny oppressing the Haitian people and the support for Panama's rights for full sovereignty were other matters analyzed by the COPPPAL meeting held in Panama City.

The COPPPAL expressed its concern over the repressive policies implemented against the people by regimes in Chile, Uruguay and other southern cone nations with which the North American imperialists maintain the closest links. The Latin American countries demand justice, a justice which has been systematically denied. They demand their right to seek their own destinies and enjoy the wealth created with their sweat and blood. They demand this right by the only means open to them, because all the others have been closed to them by the greed of imperialists and oligarchs.

The peoples cannot be blamed for the existing situation in which they are the only victims. Under the existing circumstances if they did not rebel against so much infamy, they would be blamed for not having done everything possible to free their sons and nations exploited by imperialism during their whole life.

NATIONAL ORGANIZATIONS EXPRESS SUPPORT FOR FIDEL

Military Units

Havana GRANMA in Spanish 31 Oct 81 p 3

[Article by Reynold Rassi: "FAR Military Units Endorse Fidel's Speech"]

[Text] FAR military units throughout the country have been endorsing Commander in Chief Fidel Castro's statements at the closing of the Second CDR [Committees for the Defense of the Revolution] Congress.

One of these meetings was held in a military unit of the Western Army yesterday. Soldiers, sergeants, warrant officers and officers of the FAR expressed their support for the revolution.

Speakers were Sgt Third Class Juan Luis Oramas for the UJC [Union of Young Communists] and First Lt Elfre Perez, secretary general of the party cell. They showed their determination to defend our people and the revolutionary conquests.

They also pointed out that, facing imperialist threats, the people and the FAR are more united to Fidel, the party and the revolution than ever and are ready--as good soldiers of the fatherland--to repel any aggression and destroy the invading enemy.

The soldiers carried signs with revolutionary slogans and denunciations of imperialist threats.

UJC Resolution

Havana GRANMA in Spanish 31 Oct 81 p 1

[Text] With Fidel's profound, suitable, firm and forceful statements at the close of the Second CDR Congress still reverberating, the 12th Plenum of the National Committee of the UJC--representing the feeling of its membership and all youth--proclaims its wholehearted support for this historic and important speech that summarizes the unwavering decision of the Cubans to defend their revolution until victory or death on the battlefield.

We feel complete solidarity with our government's denunciation of Mr Haig's tricks. Caught up in his lies, he spouts new boasts and threats that do not intimidate our people in the least. Let them answer clearly to Cuba's denunciation! Let them stop shamelessly deceiving the people of the United States and the world!

Mankind is threatened by the insane warmongering policy of the fascist nucleus in the U.S. Government. We are living in the most dangerous times that the world has ever known. Under these dramatic circumstances, our country will live up to its history, its revolution and its principles. We youths will remain faithful to them as our glorious ancestors were to each call to arms.

We are ready to relive the feats of the Mambises, the fight for liberation during the difficult first years of the revolution.

If Cuba is attacked, the fatherland will be proud of us. We will run to fight fearlessly!

From the depths of our heart, we state with our commander in chief: Arrogant and powerful imperialists, we have absolutely no fear of you! We live with our revolution and every man and woman is ready to die for it!

Capitalism, the reaction and fascism are irremediably condemned by history. The more savage and impotent their attacks become, the firmer will be the reply of the peoples. When their aggressions were greatest against Cuba, their failure was greatest.

Facing the campaigns, sabotage and economic blockade, we became more revolutionary and anti-imperialist. The mercenary Bay of Pigs invasion turned into the first military defeat of imperialism in America. With the October Crisis, our awareness deepened and our courage and patriotism developed. The propaganda and support for the expatriate scum were answered by the unforgettable days of the March of the Fighting People.

Facing the threats and hysteria of all the fascists, their Marines and their neutron bombs, we are firmer, more communistic and more internationalistic!

Our people, our youths, our children--we are all better soldiers of the fatherland today and we are readier than ever to carry out the commands of the party and our commander in chief.

For this reason, we proclaim that this will be the most fruitful period that our organization has had until now. Our efforts to salute the Fourth UJC Congress with great successes will increase and our youth will be worthy of these significant moments in history.

We will hoist our banner of study, work and rifles higher. We will study harder and better; we will work harder and better; we will train ourselves for defense harder and better. The daily heroism that the Heroic Warrior, Com Ernesto Che Guevara, spoke of will be our guide in each task.

We will continue the work of our two UJC members and internationalist teachers who were cowardly murdered by the counterrevolution in Nicaragua. They and the two Nicaraguan peasants who were also killed will not be forgotten. The youths who carry out tasks under fraternal skies are stronger today. Our determination to go teach, work or fight with other peoples is greater.

With a special vocation, the youth will improve their patriotic, military and internationalist education, develop their political and ideological training and be better prepared to fight the enemy who comes, whenever and however he comes.

The fighting youths of the FAR and MININT [Ministry of the Interior], reservists and militiamen--heirs of the spirit of the machete charges, the Moncada attackers, the Rebel Army, the Bay of Pigs defenders, the internationalist soldiers in Angola and Ethiopia--will increase their operational, combat and political training, will carry out orders and will have the heart of Maceo in the trenches.

We youths have the immense privilege of living during this historic time in Cuba. We do not have to beg for the fatherland that our fathers won by standing up. The revolution and the people devote their greatest efforts to us and place their greatest hopes in us. We have all the honor and all the opportunities. We are free and the future belongs to us as no other generation of Cubans ever had. We also lend our assistance to this marvelous work of all--those who died, those who fight and those who will come. We feel the obligation and the right to be in the vanguard.

In us the fatherland will have staunch and unwavering soldiers. We come from a legendary stock that left us its sacred legacy of courage, unbreakable faith in struggle and the example of fighting the enemy without letup until he eats the dust of defeat. We will never again be slaves for anyone! Steel may buckle but this land will never be occupied! Our flag will always fly free and sovereign!

Marti, our national hero, the teacher of the Cubans who taught us his patriotism and his anti-imperialism, the mastermind of Moncada, wanted a new world molded by the workers. He cast his fate with the poor of the earth. He said: This is the time of the furnaces; you only have to see the light!

In this hour of light, we youths feel prouder than ever of our admirable, heroic and invincible country of communists. We will carry out the orders of our invincible commander in chief and we will be faithful to the revolution until the last drop of blood!

Long live free, socialist and internationalist Cuba!

Long live Fidel!

Anywhere, anyway and for anything, commander in chief, command us!

Fatherland or death!

ANAP Statement

Havana GRANMA in Spanish 2 Nov 81 p 3

[Text] ANAP [National Association of Small Farmers] expresses its complete endorsement of Commander in Chief Fidel Castro's statements at the close of the Second CDR Congress.

Our peasantry, loyal heir of the most heroic traditions of fighting for independence and sovereignty, shows that it is ready to trade work implements for rifles facing the threats of aggression by Yankee imperialism, to fight to the death those who dare step on the sacred land of the fatherland.

In particular reference to our country, we are aware that it is necessary to be prepared to face the problems caused by the grave international economic situation and its repercussions on our fatherland.

Interpreting the feeling of our peasants and their families, ANAP also expresses its willingness to do whatever is necessary to convert the commander in chief's statements into reality.

The peasants will not stint efforts to achieve more efficiency in their work, to fulfill and overfulfill the assigned production plans, to continue the victorious march of the cooperative movement toward socialist forms of production and to achieve greater successes in production.

ANAP exhorts all the base organizations—agricultural-livestock production cooperatives, credit and service cooperatives and peasant associations—to continue their demonstrations of support to our commander in chief's statements by holding impromptu meetings and other demonstrations of support that have emanated from the enthusiasm and revolutionary fervor characteristic of the peasant masses.

The Cuban peasantry will continue to be an invincible bulwark of the revolution. From its trenches, it will continue strengthening the work of production and defense with the mottoes to be more efficient, more thrifty and more internationalist than ever. Every man and woman in our fields will follow the example and the teachings of Fidel. We will not make concessions to imperialism and we will be more faithful to the principles of Marxism-Leninism each day with the staunch determination to continue working on the construction of socialism in our fatherland.

We will continue to redouble our efforts in creative work with the slogans:

More efficient and thrifty than ever!

We are not afraid of imperialism!

Production for defense and work for victory!

Commander in chief, command us!

Fatherland or death! We will win!

Metallurgical Workers

Havana GRANMA in Spanish 4 Nov 81 p 2

[Article by Nancy Robinson Calvet: "Reaffirm Position Supporting Socialist Fatherland, Fidel"]

[Text] The national ceremony for Metallurgical Worker's Day served as an occasion to reaffirm the support of the workers of that important sector for the socialist fatherland and Fidel.

Pedro Miret, member of the Political Bureau and vice president of the Councils of State and Ministers, and Luis Alvarez de la Nuez, member of the Central Committee of the party and first secretary of the party in Havana, presided over the ceremony held at the Conrado Benitez Electric and Telephone Cable Production Enterprise in San Jose de las Lajas.

That enterprise was selected because it had the following indices at a recent review by the provincial union: mercantile production plan, 108 percent; productivity, 119 percent; average wage, 101 percent; and cost per peso produced, 4 centavos less than the plan.

Angel Villarreal, secretary general of the SNTM [National Union of Metalworkers], saluted the efforts made by the workers in that sector in the province, especially the Conrado Benitez collective.

During the ceremony awards were presented to the winners of the spare parts competition chosen among 50 participants. The winners were Jose Hernandez Paz, Juan Rodriguez Valdes, Ruben Iznaga, Sergio Garcia Garcia and Jose Vega. The winners of the Capitan Alberto Fernandez Montes de Oca SNTM literary competition were also announced.

There was a very emotional moment when octogenarian Emilio Alvarez presented the logotype of the union to Agapito Figueroa, second secretary of the CTC [Central Organization of Cuban Trade Unions], who closed the meeting. Alvarez had just received a certificate for over 25 years of work in the sector along with comrades Argelio Rivera, Antonio Torres, Alfredo Garcia and Silvano Dominguez who represented 40 workers.

CTC Declaration

Havana GRANMA in Spanish 5 Nov 81 p 3

[Final Declaration of 43rd National Council of CTC issued on 3 November 1981 at Palacio de los Trabajadores in Havana]

[Text] Today we repeat once more:

Fidel,

Your workers, your CTC, your unions will share all the battles with you and--as always--will march with you toward new victories.

Commander in Chief!

Command us!

The 43rd Meeting of the National Council of the CTC, completely agreeing with Fidel's statements and the position of the revolutionary government facing the new outbreak of imperialist threats and aggression, reaffirms its determination to be worthy of the tasks that the moment demands and that the urgent defense of the socialist fatherland imposes.

The escalation of hostility by the fascist clique in power in the United States is a dangerous and suicidal path. Our people know the consequences of that insane position. They see people in the international political scene imitate Hitler, Goebbels and other fascist extremists. They see how (lie after lie) the farce is plotted with the complicity of lackeys.

Our people know the workings of the monster. They know its hysterical power, its scorn for international opinion and its total rejection of the most basic norms of respect for the dignity and sovereignty of people. Therefore, it does not surprise us when it again invents ridiculous accusations against Cuba, designed to create a favorable climate for aggression.

As a sign of the adherence to the path chosen, we once more clean our weapons and occupy the trenches of defense and production, convinced that our land, our mills, fields, mines, hospitals, schools, work centers and our conquests will not be trampled on by the imperialist boot.

The 43rd meeting, expressing the feeling of millions of workers who have unanimously raised their voices to condemn imperialism, totally endorses the declaration of the revolutionary government announcing to the world that "we will resist the powerful, arrogant and fascist policy of the Yankee government at any price." It supports comrade Fidel's denunciations of the present Yankee administration.

The representation of the Cuban union movement, meeting at the time of such singular events, feels the urgent duty to reaffirm to our people, to the leadership of our communist party and to our beloved and invincible commander in chief our determination to be worthy continuers of the traditions of the working class and--as at the Bay of Pigs--to hold high the victorious flags of socialism and give an unforgettable moral lesson to the enemy.

Facing the aggression, we validate our right to life and to creative work. The Yankee advisers, Pentagon computers and CIA superspies should reflect before taking any false step against our people. This is a people with strong political roots. They are united morally, politically and ideologically and advance confidently on the socialist path. We warn: "This is a hard bone to chew." We are not afraid. There will be a beginning but no one can be sure how it will end.

The imperialists must not deceive themselves with the idea of exporting the nuclear war, the cold war and their policy of aggression as they do their economic crises. If they stupidly and criminally attack us, they will immediately clash with the defensive strength and the devastating response capability that the revolution has prepared.

We are sure that, in addition to moral superiority, our weapons, our experience as soldiers and our adherence to principles will support us in the confrontation. They make us invincible.

We are part of a people who stick to their ideals, their deep-rooted revolutionary awareness which has forged this union movement whose "commitment to socialism and proletarian internationalism is a living monument to the immortal ideas of Marx and Engels," as Fidel stated at the Second Party Congress.

We are filled with righteous pride to be part of a people like ours who, forcefully but calmly, prepare themselves to face any confrontation with a spirit of victory. We are a people with thousands of internationalist men and women capable of taking the places of the heroic Cuban teachers murdered, along with Nicaraguan militiamen, by gangs in the service of the CIA. Those who try in vain to destabilize Nicaragua are the same ones who aim their guns at Cuba.

The imperialists should also know that we will carry out the order that there will be no cease-fire; we will fight until the final victory.

We will continue working with the same daily and quiet heroism that grew in the fertile soil of the revolution. In all the work centers, we will fight to increase efforts with the firm determination to make up for the work of those comrades who are carrying out defense tasks for the threatened fatherland. Each day we will do our utmost to maintain production, living up to the heroism of our glorious and invincible FAR.

We will not hesitate to convert our shops and factories into impregnable trenches. Towns, cities, fields and mountains will be battlefields where the devastating defeat of the aggressor will be inscribed. The happy faces that today create wealth with their calloused hands and intelligence will march to battle as the Mambises, our rebels, the heroic soldiers at Bay of Pigs, Escambray, Angola and Ethiopia did in the past.

Men of the stature of Cespedes and Agramonte, Marti, Maceo and Gomez, Mella, Villena and Guiteras, Jesus Menendez, Frank, Camilo, Che and Lazaro gave their intelligence and their lives for the fatherland. Our glorious legion of soldiers will lead us in the final combat. Like them, we will use courage and resoluteness to reach victory. The fatherland that they forged will not fall. The fatherland will live in spite of all; it will live as an example. History will tell of a people that honors its heroes and martyrs, that fights without letup for happiness, progress and socialism and that fights heroically next to Fidel.

At its 43rd National Council, the CTC can see thousands of workers march in close ranks. Dressed as militiamen, they carry the anthem of the fatherland on their lips and the weapons ready to defend it in their arms.

The CTC can already feel the energetic deployment of the labor force carrying rifles as on that unforgettable day in April when we went to bury our dead, to denounce to the world the crimes that preluded the invasion and to swear to fight and win for the socialist fatherland.

The revolution is the daughter of the working class. All parents usually make as many sacrifices as necessary for their children.

Our front ranks are in place. The banners are hoisted and all the Cuban workers and their glorious union movement answer /present/ [in boldface] on all fronts the battle demands.

Today we repeat once more:

Fidel,

Your workers, your CTC, your unions will share all the battles with you and--as always--will march with you toward new victories.

Commander in chief, command us!

VALDES FAR COMMEMORATION SPEECH

FL021923 Havana Domestic Service in Spanish 1523 GMT 2 Dec 81

[Speech given by Interior Minister Ramiro Valdes at the main ceremony commemorating the 25th anniversary of the revolutionary armed forces and the landing of the Granma yacht at Playa Las Coloradas--live]

[Text] Dear comrades: During the past few days the people have, throughout the country, commemorated with extraordinary warmth and combative spirit the 25th anniversary of the Granma landing and of the creation of the glorious and exemplary Revolutionary Armed Forces [FAR]. It is proper that on this day, 2 December, we should celebrate this event here: at Las Coloradas, at the scene of that event, with the faithful and unselfish peasants, who were the first to give a helping hand to our fighters; with the young people who are emerging as the guaranteed relief of the current revolutionary generation; and with the people of Granma Province, a people who have written, and continue to write, heroic pages in the history of our fatherland ever since 10 October 1868.

We are here to render homage to our dear brothers who, 25 years ago, arrived on this coast full of hope and with a fighting spirit and who, with their blood, made a reality of the decision that Fidel announced to the Cuban people to the effect that we would either be free or martyrs in 1956.

We are here to recall what Granma means in our revolutionary process. The importance of that event, together with the insurrection of the people on 30 November in Santiago de Cuba--led by the unforgettable Frank Pais--lies in the fact that it was the starting point for continuing the Moncada battle; in the spark that started the armed struggle against the tyranny; in the dawn for a valiant rebel army; and that it certainly opened up the hard and heroic path for our people, the path that would lead us to 1 January, to the socialist revolution and to the high pedestal from which today celebrate this 25th anniversary with dignity. [Applause]

The greatness of the event that we are commemorating here cannot be envisaged through the size of the expedition, the number of men involved or through the amount of weapons that was landed here. Its most legitimate and thrilling significance lies in the humbleness of the resources with which the war was taken on against the despotic regime that was drowning our soil in blood. It must be recalled that the tyranny, even at that time, considered itself ot be all-powerful and invincible. It counted on a large and well armed army. It had at its disposal an apparatus that imposed terror and that dominated the political scene. And, above all, it had the absolute support of yankee imperialism.

The fighters of the Granma had nothing else behind them besides the spray of the very small wake that our small yacht was leaving in the agitated waters of the Gulf. And they had no other support than the justice of the ideals that give them encouragement and the conviction that the people would support Fidel and his call for a struggle, rebellion and sacrifice. What gives Granma historical importance is precisely that action, because it represents the persistence of a just position, the will to fight and the tenacity and confidence in the moral and patriotic reserves of our people.

Granma demonstrated many things. In the first place it demonstrated the value of concrete events and the example of what a vanguard can undertake in a revolutionary process. At that time Cubans were asking for action, not words. Our people, who were tricked so many times, frustrated and tricked by political chicanery and false leaders, needed action that would show them the path they had to follow and which would give them back their faith in themselves, their strength and their right to a different future.

It was not a question of starting a public debate about the channel and conditions for the revolution. History has demonstrated that fighting is the best method for developing revolutionary conditions; to clarify confusion; to be made aware and to get a people out of their lethargy and the enervating atmosphere in which their oppressors sink them.

Many will recall the frequent comments at that time attemption to identify Cubans with vice, corruption, imperialism and the lack of ideals and patriotism. The neocolonial regime tried to instill in the people the idea that they should denigrate and despise themselves. But, the revolution smashed that pack of lies, prejudice and ideological backwardness.

The people--with the path that was pointed out by Moncada, which was then hewed out by the Granma and with the later evolution of the fighting in the rural areas and the cities--relived the times of the Mambises at Yara, Baragua and Baire, the banners of Cespedes, Agramontes, Gomes, Marti and so many other heroes once again flew over a free Cuba.

A new awareness came over our humble and working masses. They first became aware of modesty, decorum and the spirit of justice; the strength of national sentiment, which is rooted in our people, and the force of its revolutionary traditions were demonstrated.

Thus, during these past 23 years of struggle, learning from the experience gained in the countinuing confrontation against yankee imperialism, our people united forever their culture and that feeling, the more progressive part of their patriotic inheritance and the universal doctrine of the working class and socialism. In the struggle against their enemies, the Cuban people emerged from the McCarthyist and anticommunist abysm in which they had been for 25 years and massively embraced the beautiful ideas of communism and internationalism. [Applause]

The leadership of our revolutionary movement played an extraordinary role in this phase. The peoples make history, but the leaders and vanguard political organizations also have an irreplaceable and decisive function to fulfill. Marti said that it was not a matter of men making the peoples, instead the peoples, in their crucial moments, usually followed with great determination one man. With the most profound and sincere conviction, we can say we had the good fortune and privilege of having Fidel at the time, and today that fortune and privilege are not ours alone, he also belongs to all the revolutionary and progressive peoples in this continent and the world. [Applause]

No one could have imagined Fidel's political vision, organizational ability, agglutinating power, intelligence and personal audacity at the time of the Moncada assault and the Granma landing. Something that moved us to make an irrevocable decision were these words by the chief of our revolution, which we would like to recall today here. The statement was made during the days in exile in Mexico, on 10 October 1955 before Jose Marti's monument. At the time Fidel said: He who feels an ideal does not stop to think about the obstacles in front of him. There is something above all reason of the heart, the reason of the faith. It is the conviction that right and justice are on one's side. All those ideals ignite the rebellion in the people. I make known my faith in America and make it with the faith we feel in ourselves. I make it in the certainty that America is tired of, that America is disgusted with all that political jobbery, traitors and oppressors it has to endure. Marti's thought and Bolivar's sword will sparkle in America again. I have faith in America. [Applause]

With Fidel leading them, our poeple learned how to transform setbacks into victories and learned that what describes a revolutionary is his attitude of not surrendering and not tiring ever. If our combatants had become tired at the Moncada barracks, today that episode would barely be an anecdote lost in the past and the sacrifice of those who fell in that action would still be waiting for the tree to bear fruit. The revolution did not frighten in the face of the gigantic effort that reorganizing the struggle implied after the 26 July setback. It maintained alive and vigorous the flame of the rebellion behind the prison bars. There were no vacillations in the face of the immense task of recruiting, training, arming and bringing to Cuba the expedition that would set in motion the insurrectional struggle.

The fraternal Mexican people gave encouragement and aided to overcome the obstacles. In times of adversity, Cuba's cause had such friends as Gen Lazaro Cardenas. Once more Mexico's extraordinary role as a land of Latin American liberty and solidarity was demonstrated. [Applause]

A small yacht, overloaded and lacking the conditions for such a cruise, enthusiastically became the hope for fulfilling the duty and commitment made to the people. The struggle did not stop despite the new difficulties which interfered in the fulfillment of the landing plan. As is known, the fact that the Santiago uprising did not take place simultaneously with the Granma arrival, but instead 2 days before because the yacht's delay, provoked the opposite of what the organizers of that heroic action had planned. Instead of eliminating the pressure of the enemy troops on the members of the expedition, it brought about the concentration in Oriente Province of some of the best trained troops the tyranny had. In addition to that, the forced landing in this low area covered with mangrove physically affected the combatants and left many of them in such conditions that they could barely walk.

The original plan was not met. It was also impossible to contact the comrades that were waiting for the Granma. The tyranny's army detected the presence of the expedition in this area and launched its troops in pursuit of the revolutionaries. When it looked as if the worst was behind, just a short distance from the mountains, the bitter setback of Alegria del Pio occurred. The rebel column was surprised and dispersed, and our enemies' criminal brutality was unloaded on its battered remains. However, what in those difficult moments saved the Granma's revolutionary mission and projected its example into history was the fact that, even though dispersed, still surrounded, still tired and hungry as a result of deprivations, it remained determined to open the way toward land and fulfill the orders of the chief of the revolution with Fidel, Raul and Almeida commanding it.

Without that indomitable resolve, eight men and seven rifles would not have come together one day, the eight men who made Fidel shout with extraordinary optimism and absolute confidence in the future? Now, we will win the war. [Applause]

In that difficult school, our rebel army learned how to get the strength and experience from each blow. It learned how not to let difficulties beat them and to show a spirit of determined combativeness. First it was a small vanguard, but then that spirit of struggle became part of an entire people. In that manner we have been able to resist and win all these years. That is how we have been able to face up to the blockades, aggressions, threats and pressures of all types being conducted against our country by yankee imperialism. That is the way we face and will face all the risks rising in front of us as a result of the firm position of principles of the revolution in its foreign policy and the difficult economic situation being endured by the world today.

Since the assault on the Moncada barracks to date and on into the future, the strength of our revolution has depended and will depend on the people. When death and adversity decimated the ranks of the combatants, out of the entrails of our humble and working people emerged new contingents of fighters. They made up the columns of our rebel army and of the clandestine forces and became makers of the 1 January victory. They gave their blood in the Escambray mountains, at Giron and in all battles they were forced to fight to defend and consolidate our revolutionary state. Years later, they led the people beyond the seas and offered in Ethiopia and Angola one of the most emotional demonstrations of our ideals and practice of proletarian internationalism. [Applause]

On the path that the Moncada and Granma opened, which is the same path of the wars 1868 and 1895 and the people's struggle in the decade of the 30's, our people began to write their true and definitive history. Each hero that fell multiplied his example in thousands of compatriots, and our strength, unity, consciousness and spirit of sacrifice grew infinitely. From the bodies of millions of humble Cubans have emerged today's victories. With selflessness and enthusiasm, they have made a reality the tasks of production, defense, health, education and many other activities. Tens of thousands of workers and technicians of our fatherland have lent and continue to lend their valuable and unselfish contribution to the material and social development of countries in three continents.

Out of the ranks of our people and based on the most rigorous selection, our Communist Party and its hardened vanguard youth organization have been formed.

Out of the midst of the people, our powerful mass, student and social organizations have been integrated, organizations which are true bulwarks of the revolutionary feeling, combativeness and vigor of the entire nation. The working people today have the responsibility in all representative and administrative bodies of our soicalist state. The people in uniform, as our unforgettable Camilo Cienfuegos called them in a historic phrase [applause], the combatants who make up the ranks of our glorious revolutionary armed forces and interior ministry, are an historic extension of our guerrilla army and inexpugnable bastions in defense of the revolution and socialism.

The people have been and continue to be the doers and supporters of all advances and gains that today make us proud. To them, the anonymous heroes of all times, to the heroes of the battle and daily work, we owe the immense pride of having arrived at with honor and hope the emotional commemoration of this 25th anniversary.

The yankee imperialists at times speak as if the existence of a revolutionary, socialist and internationalist Cuba could depend on their policy, or on the decisions of their government, or on what they, when all is said and done, could plot against us. Our revolution, with only 23 years of existence, is already a social phenomenon, absolutely solid, stable and unyielding. Even though it would not be an easy task, we could perhaps be erased from the face of the earth. What would never be possible is that we would not yield to any type of threats, pressures, blockades, aggressions or yankee ideological campaigns. This is well known.

Today we are stronger and surer than ever. Our people have demonstrated with impressive eloquence that they cannot be frightened. Our young people show that the revolution's care and attention have not been useless efforts. We can look to the future with joy. It is true that we are still struggling and will have to struggle for many years to come against underdevelopment, backwardness and poverty. It is true that our living conditions are modest and austere. But this profound sense of justice, truly humane moral values, a life without boundaries and a superior dimension of man's freedom and rights place us at an incomparable distance from the yankee imperialist society.

The revolution has forged a nation profoundly patriotic that seeks and struggles with determination to become profoundly communist and internationalist. In our life there is no room for concessions, liberalism or opportunism. The consistent application of the principles of Marxism-Leninism, the strongest and most exemplary unity in the midst of the revolution and between the party and the masses make us invulnerable and invincible and constitute the solid guarantee of our future.

In addition, we live in a world in which no country is isolated. The experience of recent weeks has precisely demonstrated the strength of this gigantic and powerful universal movement of solidarity with Cuba. Our incorruptible policy of principles and our loyalty to international revolutionary movements explain the reason for this determined support. We will continue our direction in history practicing internationalism and at the same time receiving it. With the close brotherhood of the progressive and communist movement of socialist countries and, very especially, the Soviet Union, to which we are fraternally tied [applause]. We will continue to build and defend this advanced trench of socialism on the American continent.

We carry with us the unalterable optimism of people who know they are the absolute owners of their fatherland and future. The revolution is the dearest accomplishment of the Cuban people. They dreamed about its triumph when it was only a remote hope. They cared for it when it was just a small child taking its first steps in the midst of mortal danger. They have seen it grow and develop throughout these years, and they are ready to make for it as many sacrifices and efforts as necessary. To defend the revolution is not only to be ready to fight for it, it is also very principally the decision to work harder and better each day. It is the will to be increasingly more productive, more efficient and to save more.

That is the reason for the watchword given by Fidel to our people, which is: production and defense. Our fatherland today not only has to face up to the risks of the yankee administration's adventurous and reactionary policy, we also have to undertake the task of confronting the negative effects of the low price of sugar in the world market and the economic situation created in the world by the crisis, inflation and chaos shaking the system of capitalist exploitation. With the same serenity and spirit of victory with which we prepare for the defense of the fatherland, we have to prepare ourselves and adopt the measures needed to tackle these problems and get ahead.

Doubtlessly, that will be the most worthy, realistic and consistent tribute that we can play to the comrades who fell at Granma and other phases of the revolution. [Applause] Today's ceremony arouses emotions in all of us, towards the 82 who made the symbolic landing, to the outstanding students and workers who brought the torch of freedom to this place, to the residents of this place and historic province, to the veteran combatants of the rebel army and clandestine movement who received their medals and, in particular--I am sure of that as long as there is a need for living specially intense moments--to the comrades who made up the expeditionary force of the Granma, whose participation in this commemoration fills us with joy. [Applause]

The years elapsed teach us to reflect more profoundly on the successes of the past. On this 25th anniversary, we experience the condition of having participated in the most fruitful and extraordinary era in the history of the Cuban people. It has been a beautiful privilege to live the victories of Fidel and the socialist revolution and the gallant battle of our fatherland vis-a-vis the attacks of yankee imperialism.

That is why on this 2 December we have present in our minds more than ever the beloved brothers who fell without living this phase. Today we observe the combatants of the insurrectional struggle who received their medals and next to them the vanguard youths who relived the Granma landing and those who brought to this podium the torch of freedom. It was like a relay symbol of the revolutionary generations. It was as if Nico Lopez, Juan Manuel Marquez, Candido Gonzalez, Armando Mestre and many other comrades were embodied in the new fighters. [Applause]

If we feel the profound certainty that our revolution is indestructible and that our cause, as represented by this torch, we know it will continue to move forward eternally alive held in the strong and firm hands of our youth. May the heroic founders of our rebel army live forever! Long live our glorious and invincible revolutionary armed forces! Long live Fidel! Fatherland or death, we shall win! [Shouts of viva and prolonged applause]

SHORTAGES IN COUNTRY NOTED IN 'OPINA' MAGAZINE

Santo Domingo LISTIN DIARO in Spanish 4 Nov 81 p 23

[Article by Pierre Cayrol: "Cubans Protest over Poor Condition of Houses of Assignation"]

[Text] Havana, 3 November (AFP [French Press Agency])--The more or less clandestine Cuban couples are frankly annoyed: The "houses," as the houses of assignation are called here, are no longer what they used to be.

It seems that the service leaves much to be desired and the hygienic conditions are extremely bad. Even the press has taken up the matter and in its latest issue the very serious monthly magazine OPINA did not hesitate to report the discontent of many lovers.

The "houses" are nothing new. For many decades, many years before the triumph of the revolution (1959), unfaithful husbands and wives and couples with housing difficulties had found themselves obligated--as elsewhere in the world--to seek a love nest in those establishments which are authorized, which are legal, and which are even government property.

There are many such "houses" in Havana. The only thing is that for the long-suffering average citizen, the prices are too high. If there is never a shortage of customers, it is because not even the richest person can find a room in a hotel because they do not rent rooms "by the hour." Besides, in the hotels, you do not have the same discretion as you do in those "houses."

So, what better way to solve the problem than to go to the traditional houses of assignation? They can be found in almost all sections of Havana. They are downtown, they are out in the rural areas, they are on the beach. The price ranges from 5 to 7 pesos (between almost $7 and $10) and some guarantee anonymity and many advantages.

For example, there is talk about a big "house" where you are taken by car. The customers enter through the underground garage, they pay for the room, and they go up directly, without anybody seeing them. What happens is that things have been getting worse for several months now. Some customers behave badly; they act very egotistical, without realizing that, when they go, other couples will follow them in the "love nest."

"There are people who spray-paint and burn the furniture and even the ceiling," deplored the magazine OPINA. "Others rip and burn the pillows, they smash the knicknacks, they damage electrical and sanitary equipment, and in the end they leave the room looking like a pigsty."

In most of the "houses," there is absolutely no cleanliness; even the prices of the beverages have gone up and the management favors certain 'special' customers who do not have to wait in line and who can reserve the best rooms," OPINA continues.

Even worse, the "lookers" are beginning to frequent those "houses." "There are little peepholes in the doors and walls," the magazine reported, especially alerting its readers against room no 14 in the "El Recreo" house, an establishment located opposite the old Havana market.

The time has come to take severe measures, OPINA emphasized. The time has come for the houses of assignation in Havana to be "clean and pleasant" places.

"We ask that the houses be beautified, that they be cleaned up as they should be, and that food and even flowers be sold in them.

"After all, the very meaning of life is love. To make love is something as normal as it is correct to beautify the places in which love is sheltered," the magazine continued.

Finally, on top of everything, it reported that the employees who work in these houses are looked down upon and treated badly, as if they were performing some kind of denigrating job.

In this connection, the magazine mentioned a story printed by another Cuban periodical to the effect that these employees are "punished" workers who must do this job because they committed "professional violations" in other enterprises. "How long will this bad policy go on," OPINA asked. "Could it be that there are still bad jobs for individuals in our society ?"

RESULTS OF CORTEX EXPERIMENT DESCRIBED

Havana JUVENTUD TECNICA in Spanish Aug 81 pp 14-15

[Article by Manual Hung: "'CORTEX'—A Cosmic Success"]

> [Text] The components of this equipment, put together in a short time, were designed to meet the requirements of exceptional rigidity and reliable operation under conditions of severe vibration, great acceleration, and possible problems of excessive heating due to the absence of gravity.

The "CORTEX" designed by Soviets and Cubans, made it possible to accomplish the electrophysiological exploration of the human brain during the joint space flight between the USSR and Cuba on 18 September 1980.

The objective was to determine the changes in the electric cerebral activity of the cosmonaut resulting from the accomplishment of his mission in order to judge the degree of affection [impairment] of his handling capacity during flight and his recovery after return to earth. It consists of a very light, natural-rubber helmet; the electrodes and earphones, a light and sound stimulator; cerebral electrical activity amplifiers, and a magnetic tape recorder.

The high-quality electrodes—superior to those used on the ground—were designed and made in Cuba.

The helmet was also designed and made in Cuba, specially for each cosmonaut, with fixed electrodes, always located at the same point on the skull. Here, the participation of skilled workers in the use of rubber, from the Ministry of the Light Industry, was extremely important.

The other part made in Cuba was the flashing and clicking circuit, in other words, the light-sound stimulator; the Soviets developed the control panel for the whole assembly.

The condition of weightlessness was considered in all of these equipment units.

A paste was used for the electrode contacts. Its applicator was made in such a manner that no portion of it could remain suspended within the space ship.

As for the telemetry channels, it was decided that the registrations would be recorded on magnetic tape. The cassette was sent to earth for computer processing. The fidelity of the recordings is the same as if the potential produced had materialized in a laboratory on the ground—something which is not easy in telemetry.

Electroencephalogram

As we know, the brain's activity generates currents capable of being recorded and the oscillations can be illustrated in the form of graphs. That is the essence of EEG which has made it possible to study brain functions. It is administered at rest, since any movement, even so slight a movement as blinking an eyelid causes false currents to show up in the graph illustrating the process.

It had been found that both the flashing and the clicking sounds cause a weak electrical response in the brain. It was a step forward to discover, through the EEG, that the weak potential of that current, accumulated through hundreds of stimuli, makes it possible to achieve significant values not only to establish a diagnosis regarding possible diseases but also to determine the level of human efficiency in performing certain tasks. This method is called PE (potential evoked).

CORTEX Experiment

In the Intercosmos Program, the Cuban side proposed the CORTEX Experiment which consists in seeking a practical form of performing the EEG using the PE method, something which had never been done before—out of the conviction that, if there were any results, this could be turned into a routine test during all the flights. The Soviet side liked the suggestion and their specialists and the Cuban specialists divided up the task of designing and building the equipment.

The PE method is performed on the ground, prior to the flight, during the flight in outer space, and once again upon return to the earth. In all cases, the cosmonaut make the EEG for himself in the resting state and while working. The work thus is not physical but mental and very basic in these first few tests since it consists in counting flashing lights and clicking sounds.

In spite of its simplicity, the method involves elements of major complexity.

What is the Future Application?

It may be used in the future selection of cosmonauts, for checking on the medical and psychological condition of the cosmonauts, for checking on their indirect capacity as system operators, and it could even be used to determine the influence of the medium since the latter incorporates new elements, such as weightlessness and isolation—conditions which have an effect on the cerebrum.

The PE makes it possible to judge whether the individual is in a good condition; whether training is good; whether preventive measures on board are adequate. Upon return, it makes it possible to establish the time at which the individual has recovered his full capacity.

Subjection to Resistance Test

All the equipment to be used in outer space is subjected to tests and must withstand some conditions not encountered during use on the ground. The light-sound stimulator was taken to Leningrad, along with the helmet, to a specialized center, as is done with almost all instruments that are taken into outer space.

There, the equipment was subjected to vibration tests to check its disintegration resistance. It remained intact and functioned normally.

Then the equipment was taken to a special heating chamber where it had to withstand a temperature of 50° C, to find out whether there were any toxic or irritating emanations. There were no difficulties. Moisture, cold, and other tests were also conducted. The results were satisfactory.

Seven Cuban central government agencies, more than 50 research institutions and production enterprises and some 500 technicians and workers were directly involved in the preparation of the experiments.

SUCCESSES AT NICARO NICKEL MINING ENTERPRISE NOTED

Havana GRANMA in Spanish 31 Oct 81 p 4

[Article by Alexis Rojas Aguilera: "Nicaro Nickel Workers Show That One Can Always Advance and Win"]

[Text] Nicaro--"On 24 October we celebrated the 21st anniversary of the nationalization of our enterprise which bears the name of the valiant Maj Rene Ramos Latour and which quite appropriately and through the efforts of its workers has become a symbol and bulwark of the Cuban mining and metallurgical industry; we have come to this date with all of our tasks accomplished and over fulfilled at a moment in our production effort which is qualitatively superior and with the satisfaction of having turned over to the state the additional tonnage of nickel concentrate plus cobalt requested of us."

The above words were spoken by Diosdado Aguilera, an "A" coiler in the electric power plant of this establishment, a national vanguard member of the Chemical-Mining-Energy Union and an outstanding innovator, a miner with 32 years of experience. These words summarize the feelings and fundamental achievements of the entire work force at the Nicaro nickel plant which, with almost 5,000 workers, is achieving noteworthy successes in production and in many other areas, demonstrating for everyone to see that one can always make progress and win.

The Maj Rene Ramos Latour enterprise--the best in the Ministry of the Basic Industry and the Chemical-Mining-Energy Union in 1980--starting in 1975 has been compiling an outstanding record through the sustained over fulfillment of the production plans for nickel concentrates which last year broke the long-term output record for the revolutionary period and which at this time signifies the breaking of all production records in this industry since 1942.

Engineer Humberto Peguero Montoya, manager of the powerful mining and metallurgical industry in the township of Mayari, expressed the certainty of the entire work force he directs in hailing, by 31 December, the 23rd anniversary of the triumph of the revolution by accomplishing the annual plan to be extent of 101.5 percent, "in a year in which we grew 4 percent over the prior year and in which we also prepared ourselves to increase our 1982 output by 2.5 percent.

"We have confidence in the mass of workers at the enterprise, in their seasoned and forceful Communist militancy which comes to 33 percent of all of the workers, in the innovators who have done extraordinary things to maintain production and improve technical-operational efficiency, and in the young workers who are their reliable relief force. We are entirely convinced and determined to carry out any plans that may be assigned to us, no matter how difficult they may turn out to be," he said.

Drawing a comparison between what was accomplished until September 1980 and what was done this year, the manager of the "Maj Rene Ramos Latour" factory pointed out that it had been possible to increase the output by 5.86 percent, noting that this increase came about in spite of the energy and mechanical damage in some technological areas; this called for additional efforts to make repairs so as to correct the damage quickly and efficiently. It must also be pointed out that the metallurgical plants were well supplied with minerals coming from the mines at Marti and Pinares de Mayari, essentially regarding their grade or content of nickel and iron per ton of minerals.

Taking up aspects dealing with the enterprise's economic management, engineer Peguero Montoya said that "there is no question that the implementation of the system for the management and planning of the economy has yielded noticeable advances for the enterprise in the fields of economic efficiency and enterprise organization, in material incentives for the workers, and in other areas which, for example, are expressed in the over fulfillment of the gross output quota by September to the extent of 4 percent, the business quota by 3 percent, and the earnings by 1 percent. This is also indicated by the 103 percent of productivity obtained and 100 percent for average wages, with a favorable ratio between the average wage and the productivity, among other indicators.

The production successes of the "Maj Rene Ramos Latour" plant were also influenced by the progress made in undertakings included in the investment program for overall rehabilitation and modernization currently in its peak phase involving construction, finishing work, and stations in operation; this assures the establishment of an improvement in the technical condition of equipment, operational flexibility, and in some cases an increase in the design capacity to increase the output.

Right now there are under exploitation the slopes of the Pinares de Mayari mine, no. 22 reduction furnace of the reduction furnace plant, a new 6,000kv turbogenerator, a seventh milling unit in the drying plant, a new boiler for steam generation, and an electric filter in the driers and mills; the lengthening of the mineral conveyor belt at the Marti mine by 1 kilometer has also been completed.

At the same time progress is being made in the effort to assemble a new electrostatic precipitator for the reduction furnaces which will eliminate industrial dust escaping into the atmosphere, the construction of a new ammonia recovery plant, the assembly of new industrial cranes for the supply system for the drier plant; work is being done to start, by the end of the year, two settling tanks for leaching and washing, with a capacity of 42 meters per day; working is being continued on the completion of another two for the next year with a capacity of 31 meters per day.

Work was also done on other, no less important projects, such as the new port jetty, a modern computer center, a powerful central laboratory, a mining camp at the Marti mine, and new storage facilities.

Another aspect to be stress is the work of the more than 600 innovators at Nicaro who, during the past 5 years, contributed some 20 million pesos to the economy and who have almost equalled this figure so far this year. Outstanding in this effort is the work done by Jose Periche on the louvers of the valves in the reduction furnaces and the work done by Francisco Jimenez who developed the design for the molds and technology for the manufacture of glass container molds in the new bottle factory at Las Tunas, representing a saving of 16 million pesos for the country since the investment did not have to be made on the international market.

Outstanding in the work of the ANIR [National Association of Innovators and Efficiency Experts] are also the innovators Benjamin Velazquez, Pablo Burley, the youngsters Eulalia Lopez and Rosenda Segura, Arnaldo Alvarez, Victor Barthelemy, Allan Machado, Angel Capdesuner, Jesus Padua, Abelardo Arrebola, Armando Hernandez, Alfonso Martinez, Luis Fuentes, Juan Leal, Miguel Rodriguez, Angel Motte, Jose Lima, Alcibiades Legra and Guillermo Proenza, among others.

As an example of the work quality of the innovators at the "Maj Rene Ramos Latour" factory it suffices to mention the fact that out of 24 workers rewarded during the national competition of the ANIR in the province of Holguin, 18 came from this work force and they include some who have the highest qualifications.

After 21 years of revolutionary operation, the lawful owners of the "Maj Rene Ramos Latour" nickel plant are sure of their strength and confident of victory.

HAVANA FISHING PORT FULFILLS 1981 PLAN AHEAD OF SCHEDULE

Havana GRANMA in Spanish 4 Nov 81 p 2

[Article by Fernando Davalos: "Fishing Port of Havana Finished 73 Days Ahead"]

[Text] The workers in the fishing port of Havana managed to attain the main goals planned for 1981 73 days ahead of the end of the year, totalling 11,752,000 pesos in repairs on ships, port operations, and other related activities.

On 19 October, the PPH [Fishing Port of Havana] reported an actual total figure of 11,762,000 pesos, basically made up of ship repairs (6,723,000 pesos for 101 percent of the annual plan), port operations (4,019,000 pesos for 105 percent), technical services (943,000 pesos for 78 percent of the annual plan which nevertheless represents 101 percent of the plan to date), and activities relating to standardization, measurement, and quality control (75,000 pesos for 123 percent annual plan accomplishment).

The accomplishment of the plan, ahead of schedule, by the PPH, in terms of physical units, regarding port operations, indicates a loading and unloading volume of 162,700 tons, coming mainly from Mambisas (182 percent of the plan).

PPH has piers and equipment capable of handling up to 300,000 tons per year; this is why it would be good to promote a larger number of operations with freight from other users, as happened this year, in order to reduce the underutilization of these facilities in the Havana roads.

The early completion of the plan was helped along by the shipping companies who are using the repair services of the fishing port, which involved delivering vessels on time along with work not previously planned, such as the quadrennial overhaul of a Soviet fishing vessel which for the first time in Cuba was repaired in a record time of 3 months.

It is significant that, for the first time in Cuba likewise, PPH started the repair of the nozzles of the Cuban fishing vessels of the "Rio" type (factory supertrawlers) which resulted in a major saving in foreign exchange since this work had always been done abroad in the past.

The floating docks also report very much improved operations, as evidenced by an 8-day reduction in the maintenance, cleaning, and painting of hulls.

Following better organization and higher requirements, these workshops managed to reduce work interruptions to about 38,000 man-hours, apart from other progress in material savings.

The technical services of the PPH, involved in equipment maintenance and repair, in spite of difficulties with spare parts, are accomplishing the plan as of now and it is predicted that they will close the year out properly.

All of the enterprise's economic indicators look favorable regarding the accomplishment of this annual plan, with special emphasis on the 33-percent increase in productivity compared to the plan and a cost reduction of 23 centavos per peso produced.

The ratio between productivity and average wage also reveals a favorable coefficient of 0.83 with reductions in the average number of workers and the wage fund.

PORT, TRANSPORTATION WORK EFFICIENCY IMPROVES

Havana GRANMA in Spanish 4 Nov 81 p 2

[Article by Emilio del Barrio Menendez: "Port Handled 700,000 Tons of Goods"]

[Text] The port workers, as well as the workers handling the transportation of freight ashore, and the warehouse workers of the domestic economy, firmly pursuing the slogan "production and defense," turned the month of October into the most efficient month of all in the chain consisting of the port, transportation, and the domestic economy; they unloaded 700,000 metric tons of goods, they moved out 698,000 tons, and they loaded and unloaded 160,000 railroad cars and trucks, reducing the minimum time required for handling by 7.57 percent as compared to the standard time required.

The percentage for the net handling time is even less when we deduct from the gross time of 7.57 percent the time gained in the unloading of scores of thousands of railroad cars. In most provinces of the country, the ratio between extra lay days and prompt dispatching is favorable to the national economy.

The work of transporting freight, which constitutes the circulatory system of the economy, month after month reveals a tendency toward optimization whose broader objective is to achieve a positive balance in the ratio between extra lay days and prompt dispatching, in loading and unloading, both regarding vessels and land transportation means.

One eloquent figure is represented by the fact that 101,000 freight units were handled in October of last year. The 58-percent increase achieved during 12 months, with a similar rolling stock and equipment pool, is explained by the substantial reduction in the loading and unloading time which, during the same month in 1980, came to 58.76 percent.

Efficient unloading in ports, rapid transportation of goods, supplies, and equipment of all kinds, and immediate unloading at the warehouses of the domestic economy and other installations—all this has an appreciably beneficial effect to the progress of the national economy and to the strengthening of our defense against the bare threats of Yankee imperialism and the fascist clique headed by Reagan.

BRIEFS

MISSING RELATIVES--Caracas--Relatives of political prisoners who have disappeared in Uruguay, Guatemala, Argentina and other countries in the region have reiterated, in the Venezuelan capital, their charges regarding the practices carried out by the Latin American military regimes. Delegations of the relatives of the missing are participating in Caracas in the second Latin American congress in order to seek new ways in which to organize so that they can implement a more efficient action throughout the continent and the rest of the world. U.S. MEDDLING IN EL SALVADOR--Cuba has expressed its deep concern regarding the serious violations of human rights in El Salvador and especially regarding the death of thousands of Salvadorans due to the repressive measures that exist in that country. In an address he gave to the social, cultural and humanitarian affairs commission of the UN General Assembly, Raul Roa, our permanent representative, stated that he opposed any type of military intervention in Central Africa. He stressed that on studying the situation in El Salvador, the support that the Washington Government is giving to the genocidal Salvadoran military junta stands out clearly. Roa accused the U.S. Government of trying to deny what is really happening in El Salvador through a ridiculous propaganda campaign against several socialist and progressive nations. The United States is public enemy No 1. The Cuban ambassador to the United Nations also stated that the U.S. Government is the main violator of human rights throughout the world. He then asserted that the mantle of responsibility for the conditions in which thousands of Latin Americans, Africans and Asians live must fall upon Washington's shoulders. Roa stressed his concern regarding the constant deterioration of the human rights situation in Chile and the lack of information regarding the thousands of persons who have disappeared due to political reasons. AIM TO LINK REGIMES--Raul Roa Kouri, Cuban ambassador to the United Nations, has denounced the aims of the United States to link South Africa with some of the most reactionary regimes of South America in an aggressive military alliance. Appearing military alliance. Appearing before the general assembly, he stated that that maneuver is aimed against the people's national liberation struggle in both continents and at strengthening yankee positions in the South Atlantic. Cuban Ambassador Luis Sola Vila, speaking before the UN Security and Political Commission, denounced the imperialist policy of threats and the U.S. aim to return to the cold-war years. He said that Washington's threats against Nicaragua, Grenada and

Cuba and its interference in El Salvador, are acts that go against international peace and security. [Text] [FL021937 Havana Domestic Service in Spanish 1526 GMT 2 Dec 81]

HAIG-RODRIGUEZ MEETING REPORTED--Madrid, 5 Dec (Latin-Reuter)--U.S. Secretary of State Alexander Haig met with Carlos Rafael Rodriguez, vice president of the Cuban council of state and ministers, on 23 November in Mexico, the Madrid newspaper EL PAIS reported today. Citing diplomatic sources, the paper said that at the meeting, the first at the ministerial level between the two countries since the 1962 missile crisis, Mexican Foreign Affairs Secretary Jorge Castaneda acted as intermediary. Questioned by EL PAIS on the report of the meeting, U.S. State Department spokesman Dean Fischer refused to comment. A Cuban diplomat confirmed that Rodriguez was in Mexico on 23 November, as was Haig, but denied that the two had met, according to the report. The paper said that the diplomatic sources could not give details of the meeting. Mexico has repeatedly said that it wished to act as intermediary between Cuba and the United States, which do not maintain diplomatic relations. Cuban-U.S. tensions have increased considerably since Ronald Reagan took office 11 months ago. [Text] [PA051754 Buenos Aires Latin in Spanish 1726 GMT 5 Dec 81]

RODRIGUEZ DECORATES ISIDORO MALMIERCA--Carlos Rafael Rodriguez, member of Cuba's Communist Party Politburo and vice president of the councils of state and ministers, today presented the "combatant of the clandestine struggle" medal to Isidoro Malmierca, member of the central committee and Cuba's foreign minister. Also present at the ceremony held at the main offices of the foreign ministry [MINREX] were Jesus Montaine Oropesa, alternate member of the Politburo and chief of the Central Committee members and alternate members and MINREX officials. CASTRO DECORATES PERSONALITIES IN SCIENCES--Commander in Chief Fidel Castro, first secretary of Cuba's Communist Party [PCC] Central Committee and president of the councils of state and ministers, has decorated with the Carlos J. Finlay order a group of personalities who have made valuable contributions to the development of the natural and social sciences. The ceremony took place on the centennial of the discovery of the yellow fever vector by Carlos J. Finlay at a ceremony held at Havana City's Palace of conventions. Among the intellectuals receiving the order are Angel Luis Alvarez, Abelardo Buh, Jose A. Bustamante, Pedro Canas, Francisco Fernandez, Jose Luciano Franco and Calixta Guiteras. Others receiving the award were Francisco Lancis, Julio Lopez, Julio Martinez Baez, Jose Lopez, Abelardo Moreno, Rafael Pedraza and Ciro Perez Troncoso. Others decorated were Hortensia Pichardo, Jose Antonio Portuondo, Federico Sotolongo, Ernesto Tabio, Salvador de la Torre, Eugenio Torrella and Sara (Isalgue). The agreement of the council of state, which was read by Wilfredo Torres, president of the academy of sciences, notes the significance of presenting the order during a ceremony which marks the end of 1 year of activities in honor of the centennial of Carlos J. Finlay's discovery. In his closing remarks, Sergio del Valle, member of the PCC Politburo and minister of public health, stated that every year on this date the Cuban people pay homage to all those who day after day silently struggle for everybody's health. DEVELOPMENT BANK EXHAUSTS LINES OF CREDIT

Quito EL COMERCIO in Spanish 27 Oct 81 p A1

[Text] The Development Bank has no more money available; instead, there is a deficit and at present, there are no lines of credit that have not been used, said the general manager of the National Development Bank, Marcelo Quevedo.

He stated that in recent years there has been a greater demand for credit and therefore it has been unlikely that funds of the Development Bank would remain idle. In 1980, the bank lent 4.095 billion sucres, whereas on 30 September 1981, it had awarded funds totalling 4.990 billion.

Marketing credits allocated during 1980 amounted to 188 million sucres and by 30 September of this year these credits had exceeded 185 million. The funds allocated to ENAC [National Storage and Marketing Enterprise] should also be added to the above mentioned credits. In 1980 the ENAC credits came to 900 million, and by 30 September 1981, they had amounted to 1.150 billion.

The plans for 1982 come to 6.640 billion sucres, a larger amount than in 1980 and 1981.

He emphasized that the Development Bank has no money left and that, on the contrary, there is a shortage of funds. Therefore, he reported, we proposed to the government a recapitalization of 1.2 billion sucres. Unfortunately, for reasons that are public knowledge, the government was only able to grant us 200 million. So now we have a shortage of funds especially for the mid and long-term periods.

He mentioned that the Central Bank is now awarding payments to the BNF [National Development Bank] every 2 or 3 months. In this way, he said, we do not have a definite figure for the entire year; they make payments to us every 2 or 3 months, which we then allocate to our branches. I want to repeat, he said, that we have no surplus;

I would say that we actually have a shortfall in relation to our demand for credit.

Quevedo explained that the Development Bank's lines of credits consist of financing funds; these are used to finance short-term cultivation; these funds come from the Central Bank. Then, for the mid and long-term periods, there are development bonds, which also come from the Central Bank. To date we have issued almost 800 million sucres in development bonds, he assured, while all the private banks combined have not lent the sum of 400 million sucres. Therefore, we have been fairly aggressive in terms of development bonds.

We also have international lines, for example, a line from the IDB [Inter-American Development Bank] which we have practically completed disbursing, and for smaller industries we have the German line which has now been exhausted. The bank acted quite rapidly in placing that line of credit. About 170 million sucres were placed in approximately 6 months with 500 borrowers.

Denying an account published in the journal VISTAZO, he assured that the overdue accounts in the 1970-1980 decade were not 11.037 billion sucres, as the VISTAZO account stated, but barely 1.781 billion as of 31 December 1980. He added that the accounts written off came to only 1.043 billion sucres, not 3.883, as was reported.

He said that the VISTAZO reporter had made a serious mistake by adding up the balances (which were not cumulative) remaining at the close of business for each year, both of the overdue accounts and of accounts that have been written off. This mistake produced these erroneous figures.

He added that this reporter had made the same mistake in adding together the balances of all accounts. This mistake made it seem as if this total came to 65.835 sucres, when in reality it was 12.098 billion sucres at the end of 1980.

He pointed out that this mistake in interpretation produced erroneous conclusions that led to the title displayed on the magazine cover: "Millions Lost at the Development Bank," which is not at all an accurate portrayal of the situation of our institution. This mistake, then, is not only regrettable but unforgiveable, because it uses false data to damage the image and prestige of our bank both in our country and also with the international financial institutions it deals with abroad.

Quevedo denied that there has been any leniency on the part of the Develcpment BAnk in recovering its debts.

In everyday language, he said, the word "leniency" is interpreted as meaning negligence or irresponsibility. This administration can not accept such a charge, especially as the very figures published in VISTAZO show the contrary to be true. The figures show that in 1970 the overdue accounts came to 29.2 percent, and in 1980 such accounts had declined to 14.7 percent of the total, declining even further, to 14.1 percent, at the end of September 1981.

He made it clear that having overdue accounts of 14.1 percent of the total is perfectly normal in a development bank which lends money for high-risk activities such as agriculture. And despite this, the overdue accounts at the Development Bank are less than in many private banks which require stricter loan guarantees.

Another mistake made in this article, he said, was confusing the loans that are considered to be written off with "losses of the Development Bank." The written off loans consist of loans that are over 3 years in arrears and which have been turned over to the court for collection. In fact, every day the bank receives money from these accounts, claimed the bank manager.

He said that as these accounts consist of loans that have been due for over 3 years, in 1980 these accounts represent credits issued in 1974, 1975, or 1976, which were due in 1977.

Furthermore, as the Development Bank is not legally capable of invalidating obligations from its written off accounts, the 1980 balance actually includes credits that have been in arrears since 1928.

He noted that every day a good part of the overdue accounts are recovered, but still, there are some loans that will never be recovered, either because the borrowers have disappeared, or because they are no longer involved in agriculture.

He remarked that a policy to recover accounts is closely tied to the production process. Repayments have to be based on production. If not, there is no way people could manage to pay off this credit in 15 or 20 years. But if the credit is linked to a sound production program, then we can recover these credits in a period of 5 or 6 years.

LOCAL ELECTION RESULTS INDICATE LEFT-CENTER STRENGTH

Quito EL COMERCIO in Spanish 27 Oct 81 p A1

[Article by Cristobal Zambrano]

[Text] The voting preferences of the Ecuadorean people are holding firm with the left-center. This seems to imply a rejection of both political traditionalism and the radicals on both the left and the right. This analysis is based on the results of the elections in Pimampiro, Yanzatza, Catamayo, and Archidona. These districts were only recently established and needed to organize their local government councils.

This left-center trend, which also claims to be a populist movement, arose with the victory of the Roldos-Hurtado slate in 1978, and was then reaffirmed in 1979. Then in 1980--the year of the harvest of the struggle for power and the divisions within the CFP [Concentration of Popular Forces], until then the nation's leading political force--the FRA [Alfarist Radical Front] moved spectacularly into the lead in the nation's elections.

The earlier victory of the FRA was termed an "emotional" victory by some circles. This idea was rejected by the leaders of the FRA, who claimed to be the nation's leading political force.

At the same time, against the "logical" forecasts which were made before the 7 December elections, DP [Popular Democracy Party] came in second, ID [Democratic Left] was third, and the CFP was relegated to fourth place, by a large margin of votes.

In last Sunday's elections, which though small, were important as indicators of democratic trends in the country, Popular Democracy was first, Democratic Left was second, and CFP moved up to third.

The FRA fell back to sixth place, the conservatives were fourth, and the Democratic Party--in its first election contest--was in fifth place.

The elections in the four new districts, while they may not serve as accurate political thermometers for the entire nation, still do reflect the same political trend which has prevailed in recent years.

The ballot boxes--all over the republic--are confirming the voters' rejection of traditional political forces such as conservatism and liberalism and the extremists on the left, in this case the MPD [expansion unknown]. The voters' preferences are going toward the left center or to coalitions in which the left center predominates.

The outstanding feature of all this has always been the enthusiastic participation of the citizens in the elections. This also implies a confirmation of faith in democracy and therefore a rejection of regimes based on force.

The shift of the FRA out of first place by the voters' decision may confirm the judgment of its "emotional victory" in 1980. The fact that the first and second positions are held by Popular Democracy and by Democratic Left may indicate a strengthening of these two parties, which should now be the nation's leading political forces.

The third spot for the CFP suggests this party has recovered from its lengthy illness with its splits, divisions, and internal power struggles.

But not everyone agrees with this assessment. Yesterday Cecilia Calderon of the FRA and Francisco Huerta of the Democratic Party attributed Popular Democracy's victory to "government pressures on the voters."

"We had to fight the government party's election machine," said the economist Calderon.

Huerta also claimed that the victory of the DP was brought about by various types of pressure from the government.

But Julio Cesar Trujillo, the leader of the DP, said that his opponents have always tried to underestimate his party's successes. He denied the existence of any government pressure.

"The victory of our slate shows the people's support for the organization of Popular Democracy and at the same time for the government's good work," said Trujillo.

"Our opponents say that the people are against the government; consequently, the government's endorsement should be a handicap. But the election results have shown that the people do not oppose the government," he emphasized.

Rodrigo Boria of Democratic Left said that he is not surprised that his party is second, because the government party--Popular Democracy--has a strong election machine working for it.

He emphasized that ID is growing and that it has the merit of having been made a party from the grassroots up, and not from the leadership down.

"These elections," he said, "had great political symbolism because there was a struggle for power among the political parties to determine their relative positions. I have not the slightest doubt that these elections have helped to measure the strength of the political parties," he concluded.

HURTADO LAUDS PROFESSIONALISM IN ARMED FORCES

Quito EL COMERCIO in Spanish 28 Oct 81 pp A1, A2

[Text] President Osvaldo Hurtado told Ecuador's civilian political leaders not to distract the armed forces from their duties in a conspiratorial quest for power. He emphasized that democracy, with all its defects and weaknesses, is still the system of government which best ensures social progress and the economic development of the nation.

In the speech he gave at the military ceremony held yesterday at the air force base on the occasion of the 60th anniversary of the founding of the FAE [Ecuadorean Air Force], the president gave a political analysis of the attitude of the military toward the return of the constitutional regime that has been functioning for 26 months.

Democracy, which was reborn in our country on 10 August 1979, said the president, was brought about not only by the struggle of the Ecuadorean people against a dictatorship that attempted to maintain its personal rule with the backing of the military, but also by the actions of the armed forces, which formed a new government responsible for reestablishing the constitutional order of the republic.

With this purpose in mind, he said, and in order to open up new channels in Ecuador's political history, they rejected traditional procedures which prevented the democratic participation of the citizens, and they called on the people to approve by plebiscite the state political constitution and to elect their leaders freely by means of a direct ballot.

He pointed out that the clearsighted way in which the military proceeded will some day be recognized by history, which will accord the military the merit of promoting a civilian-military accord preventing the politicization of the armed forces and their consequent destruction in internal fratricidal clashes. This accord also avoided the intervention of the "committee of notables" which on previous occasions had taken upon itself to represent the people. This agreement led to the formation of new political institutions which, despite their faults, can now provide the basis for a modern democratic system, a stable and progressive system, which will meet the needs of contemporary Ecuador.

He mentioned that in both military and civilian groups, some voices were raised in an attempt to discredit this innovative method of returning to a system of law, and to prevent the referendum of 15 January 1978 from taking place, along with the first and second election rounds on 16 July 1978 and 29 April 1979, and then finally, the transfer of authority to President Jaime Roldos Aguilera, who was legitimately elected by the Ecuadorean people.

With that purpose in mind, said Hurtado, all sorts of schemes were tried; nothing, not even illegitimate tricks, was ruled out. For the good of the country, the military always remained steadfast in their defense of the democratic process, and they thwarted all the conspiracies that arose within the armed forces, or which were instigated from outside. In this internal campaign, said the president, the Ecuadorean soldiers relied on the invaluable collaboration of the people, who went to the polls in massive numbers, proudly displaying their patience and tenacity, and overcoming all the obstacles placed in their path.

Hurtado pointed out that 26 months have elapsed since the date when the armed forces turned power over to the civilians, represented by their constitutional president. Since then the government has had to overcome innumerable obstacles in order to consolidate little by little our democratic institutions, especially in this fateful year of 1981.

It is true, he said, that Ecuadorean democracy is among the oldest in the world, for over 150 years have elapsed since our first political constitution was drafted. But it is also true that the course of Ecuadorean democracy has been interrupted on many occasions, and that the economic, social, and cultural structures of the nation do not favor its full flowering here.

Furthermore, our national political life is strongly impregnated with contentious and sectarian attitudes which prevent us from reaching agreements and consensus positions, which are essential in a constitutional government.

President Hurtado took the occasion of his appearance in a favorable military environment to repeat that the future of the democratic regime also depends, and perhaps primarily depends, on what we, the civilians do in exercising government authority, and on the proper use which the opposition makes of its rights. In a democratic system, disagreements are legitimate, but they should never be allowed to exceed constitutional and legal limits, especially when the nation is facing its current economic and political problems, which, because of their magnitude, require everyone's support.

He mentioned the inspiring commitment of our soldiers to the democratic regime, saying that if the armed forces helped to bring about the establishment of the constitutional regime, why should they now abandon it when it has so many problems to overcome and so many difficulties to resolve?

The minister of defense and top officials of the armed forces were correct, added the president, when they indignantly rejected a treacherous campaign promoted from outside the armed forces, which was designed to damage military unity and to discredit the military in the eyes of the constitutional government.

He added that civilians who seek to exercise power must do so by means of the open and honest course of free elections, and not through the devious means of conspiracies. Let us respect, he urged, the non-deliberative nature of the armed forces, and let us not distract them from their noble duties toward our nation, our constitution, and our laws.

Democracy, with all its defects and weaknesses, is still the system of government which best ensures for civilian society its social progress and economic development, along with respect for the fundamental rights and freedoms of humanity.

He said that for military society, too, democracy is the best guarantee it has that military laws and standards will be scrupulously respected. Dictatorships, he said, alter procedures and discard the legal safeguards that govern the career of arms. When a de facto government lacks legitimacy, its survival depends on the exercise of an absolute and arbitrary power. For this reason, the dictator resorts to the establishment of a personal clientele which he attempts to infiltrate with his submissive servants. As a result, this inevitably brings about the formation of factions which convert the armed forces into a camp of political wrangling with the consequent loss of command discipline and unity, so essential for military life.

But democracy, on the contrary, through its strict respect for military laws and regulations, guarantees that promotions are based on merit, demonstrated by a good service record, and that army commands are composed of the best officers.

We can take pride, he said, in the fact that even in our most remote garrisons, there are resources available to provide a decent human life for our soldiers; this is essential to maintain good morale in those who have the sacred duty of defending our nation's borders.

We must, he continued, appreciate the awareness that the armed forces have of the problems that affect our national economy, and their decision to take part in the austerity program proposed by the government. But above all, it has been a source of immense satisfaction for me, the president said, to observe the organization, discipline, and high technical qualifications of our officers and soldiers.

A small but highly professional army is probably the best solution for our nation's limited economic resources and for the new character of warfare. We saw the truth of this in the Cordillera del Condor, where numerically superior forces were unable to carry out their mission. It is true that courage still counts in battle, but we can not lose sight of the fact that in modern warfare, technology, military resources, and the scientific training of soldiers and officers are what carry more weight now. Without these, daring and valor, which were once of overwhelming importance, could do little. With this prospect in mind, he said, we must be aware of the imperious need for military service to be carried out by well prepared and highly competent citizens.

He said that the air force has probably been the branch of the armed forces that has been most affected by this process of technification and military professionalization. There is a world of difference between Telegrafo I, the rudimentary airship that Elia Liut used to cross the Andes, landing at Inaquito 61 years ago, and today's sophisticated supersonic aircraft. In the early days of aviation, aviators trusted to luck, their own courage, and to destiny, but now complex electronic ground and air instrumentation provide the pilot with all the data needed for his mission's success.

Mastering this technology, observed the president, demands many years of methodical study, daily practice, and a high level of responsibility. Pilots and aircraft technicians must be trained for this complex activity. This is the challenge that technology holds out to our Ecuadorean Air Force officers.

Not only has the air force carried out its specific mission--the defense of the nation and its borders--it also takes an active part in our socio-economic development, said the president.

He observed that the Ecuadorean Air Force has established an aviation enterprise, TAME [Ecuadorean Military Air Transport], which maintains communications with all the regions and villages of Ecuador, providing an invaluable service to our national community. It administers the Ecuadorean Aviation Enterprise, which has enabled our country to increase its participation in international air traffic. And countless flights have been made by the FAE as part of its "Wings for Health" and "Wings for Culture" programs to bring these essential services to our most remote villages.

SERIOUS PROBLEMS FACE SUGAR, CACAO INDUSTRIES

Guayaquil VISTAZO in Spanish 23 Oct 81 pp 12-17

[Article by Mauricio Soriano S.]

[Text] The cacao products industry (cocoa butter, chocolate, and powdered cocoa), and the sugar industry, both sources of jobs of incalculable social benefit, are going through serious difficulties because of the government's economic policies; these industries are now facing the imminent risk of having to halt their activities for lack of economic backing and profits. Socially, this would mean layoffs for thousands of workers and poverty for their families.

Profiles of the Crisis

We spoke with Dr Carlos Julio Emanuel Moran, one of the most knowledgeable experts in this field, about the economic and social implications of the crisis in the sugar and cacao industries, whose greatest and most serious repercussions are in the industrial sector.

The problems facing the sugar and cacao industries are similar, though they do differ. Sugar is a product used for domestic consumption, but the cacao products industry produces export items. The crisis here is the result of a lack of suitable planning by the government. What has happened in the cacao industry is that the government has allowed a large number of cacao products industries to be established. Their installed capacity is now very, and I do mean, very, much above our national production of the raw materials used. This decline in production in relation to our installed capacity is related not only to our low agricultural production, but also to the agricultural crisis that we have experienced for quite a long time.

Now, as the industry has to produce at a level below its optimum capacity, this forces it to produce at higher costs than would be necessary if the industry were operating at a higher efficiency level. As the industry is producing at such high costs, the only way it can compete abroad is through subsidies, such as the CAT [Tax Credit Certificate], and this is the government's responsibility. We are well aware that countries which have this type of industry give them financial resources and adequate subsidies so that their industries can compete internationally. And we, as a developing country, lacking the currency generated by exports, must stimulate these exports by properly dealing with this important item in our economy.

In the case of sugar, the problem also lies in the agroindustrial sector, whose product is primarily consumed at home, and would have to be imported if these industries were closed for lack of production and profits. In this case, the consumer would have to pay very high prices for this product. The problem with sugar lies in what we call "political prices." These are fixed, rigid, inflexible prices that have no relation to reality or to any other political prices set by the government, such as wages, a very important item, the price of gasoline, or the increase in inflation.

The government has the great advantage of having a sugar industry, AZTRA [American Tropical Sugar Mill, Inc], and in this firm it has a model, the best example, of the industrial sugar crisis insofar as costs and prices are concerned.

The crisis can be summarized briefly as follows. In the case of the cacao products industry, if the government fails to take steps to solve the problem, we will soon cease to be exporters of a product which has been expanding its market, thus reducing our total exports. And if we do not solve the sugar problem, we will very soon become importers of a product which we have been exporting, at least marginally. We would then have a decline in exports, an increase in imports, and the consequent damage to our balance of payments. And added to this we have the effects of an eventual shutdown of the sugar and cacao industries on the domestic economy of thousands of Ecuadorean families.

The Sugar Industry

In Ecuador over 30,000 families are directly dependent on the sugar industry, and over 100,000 families are indirectly dependent on this industry. From this point of view, and considering this item as one of vital importance to our domestic market, a possible shutdown of this industry would affect all the Ecuadorean people and the Ecuadorean state itself.

Xavier Marcos Stagg, a businessman who is well known in the sugar industry, said that attempts have been made to resolve this crisis, which has been brewing for some time, by means of tax rebates or reductions, by granting export tax credit certificates, and most recently by price increases. As sugar has always been considered a "political" product in this country, said Xavier Marcos, its price revisions have been too little and too late. The companies have managed to survive until now by savagely increasing their debt; we can say that all the sugar companies in Ecuador are now heavily mortgaged. They have up to four mortgages and loans of all sorts. The National Securities Commission holds long-term loans for AZTRA amounting to over 750 million sucres, in addition to the capital investments that have been made, so the Commission has a financial involvement with AZTRA amounting to over 1 billion sucres. The crisis has been provoked by the increase in costs. If a businessman can not transfer the impact of his costs to a third party, that is, to the consumer, the business has no administrative, economic, or financial way of absorbing these costs. Costs which are "frozen" to the consumer are then combined with other factors, such as: the increase in production costs because of the increase in the minimum wage, along with the reduction in the workweek to 40 hours, the impact of the very just regulation on insurance for farm workers (this entails over 20 million sucres in employer payments a year just for the San Carlos sugar mill alone), the increase in the price of fuels (both residual fuels and diesel), which at San CArlos amount to an expenditure of over 25 million sucres a year, etc. When we add to this the impact of the latest minimum wage scale issued by the commission of the ministry of social welfare and labor for workers in the sugar industry, we are speaking of another expenditure of about 5 or 6 million sucres, just in that one sugar mill alone. This confirms a rather bleak and dismal outlook for the industrial sector as a whole.

To cope with this situation, explained Mr Marcos Stagg, we have been forced to borrow money. The government, looking for the alternative that would do it the least political harm, has given us special loans, lines of credit granted by the monetary board of about 50 million for each industry, which we have all used, using cane in the field as security for the loans, and advances on the export account, up to 60 percent for each mill. But all these are only palliative measures. We have a subsidy that is based on last year's costs; this is 50 or 60 sucres lower than the real cost! Therefore, even though we are exporting, we are still losing huge amounts of money. If the right political decisions are not made soon, decisions that will establish mechanisms such as annual readjustments, the sugar industry can never be saved.

San Carlos, S.A. Balance Sheet: Profits Remaining after 15 Percent Distribution to Workers and Payment of Income Taxes

In order to evaluate in economic terms the impact of the crisis in the sugar industry, we are using this model, which clearly reflects the dramatic balance of losses of over 140 million sucres.

Year	Profits	Losses
1974	52,953,903.78
1975	11,816,851.37
1976	3,552.257.10
1977		89,451,961.21
1978		26,754,678.40
1979		20,742,692.63
1980	66,392,912.30
1981 (estimated)		141,722,000.00
Totals	134,715,924.55	278,671,332.24

Summary

Profits in 1974, 1975, 1976, 1980		134,715,924.55
Losses in 1977, 1978, 1979, 1981		278,671,332.24
Difference	Deficit of	143,955,407.69

The situation we are facing now is one of absolute bankruptcy. We owe the banks billions of sucres (San Carlos alone owes over 1 million, and Valdez can say the same, as can AZTRA]. We have no ability to repay these loans because of our lack of profits. The solution lies in increasing the price of sugar, and in opening up "soft" lines of credit for the sugar industry of about 100 or 150 million sucres for each mill, in order to improve production capacity, which has not been optimized, precisely because of this lack of resources. And there is something even more serious. We have to persuade our cane growers to plant cane, because for the past 4 years they have not been planting cane, but have turned their cane fields over to other, more profitable crops. Therefore, we have to begin by offering new cane growers a fair price for their cane crops, and to do this, both the cane growers and the sugar industry need a financing fund so that they cane work under better conditions.

Because of the possibility of a virtual collapse of the sugar industry, we must turn to the alternate solution of a price increase for the product to avert such a collapse, which would have a very high social cost in terms of unemployment and its snowballing effects. This would have a much worse impact than the increase in the cost of living given in price indices for an increase in the price of sugar.

The Cacao Industry

It is very difficult to calculate the crisis which the cacao products industry is going through. Of the 13 companies located in Ecuador, some are paralyzed and others are semi-paralyzed; they owe banks and other financial institutions about 2 billion sucres. From this we can deduce that their level of production has declined almost 70 percent, causing a strong increase in the cost of the products made, and leaving the industry with significant losses.

According to the industrialist Jorge Salcedo Salcedo, the factors which have affected the present crisis are: the decline in the international price of cacao, which began at the end of last year; the elimination of tax credits, which also happened last year; the increase in cacao bean exports, leaving the industry practically without any raw materials; and the loss of cacao toward Peru.

"Practically all the countries in the world strongly subsidize their industries which process their national raw materials," said Jorge Salcedo, "but Ecuador, whose industry processes and exports a raw material that is 100 percent of national origin, has to compete internationally on very unfavorable terms, because we do not have this state support. Peru, which has a small cacao production, is reportedly giving a subsidy between 25 and 35 percent to its industries that export products made from cacao beans. This has encouraged cacao bean smuggling from El Oro to Peru."

It is expected that by the end of this year, the cacao processing industries will show losses estimated between 400 and 600 million sucres. "I feel that given the magnitude of the damage to the industry, if the government takes immediate corrective measures, the financial situation could be turned around in not less than 2 years. You also have to realize that the industries have been an undeniable source of price supports for farmers, who are now left to the mercy of grain exporters." If perhaps our industrial capacity is too large, as is admitted by one of the newest and youngest businessmen in this industry (Gaston Cotto Baquerizo, general manager of Cacao Products of El Oro, has been involved in exporting chocolate liquor since March of this year), this was caused by the fact that about 5 or 6 years ago, the ministry of industry allowed five or six additional industries to be established here, even though their supplies of raw materials were not properly ensured.

In fact, not only was the crisis originated and worsened by government indifference, which was demonstrated in the lack of stimuli and incentives, such as export tax credits, for this sector of our national industry, but its roots also lie in agricultural production, one of the most critical aspects of the cacao agro-industry.

Cacao Bean Production Per Hectare (Average)

Brazil	between 18 and 22 quintals [hundredweight measure]
Colombia	between 15 and 17 quintals
Ecuador	between 6 and 7 quintals

"It would be good for the executive," said Gaston Cotto, "to send to parliament a new bill which, like the earlier one that was treated so casually by the legislators, would consider the situation of the cacao-processing industry and would again propose, as a solution, the granting of tax concessions for exports, so that we could compete on equal or better terms internationally. I believe it is up to the legislative branch to offer alternative solutions, if it is unwilling to approve ours, since it was parliament which rejected the bill that considered the tax credit certificate as a definite possibility for a solution."

The "13 Families Bill"

The bill mentioned by the cacao industrialists was sent by the executive to the legislature. Because of the tax credit featured in the bill, it was unanimously rejected by the legislators, led by the Democratic Left bloc, which questioned the alternative designed to solve or at least alleviate the crisis, "denouncing" the fact that the tax credit proposed in the bill would only benefit 13 Ecuadorean families, which in its opinion, represent the 13 cacao-processing companies in Ecuador. We interviewed the deputy Xavier Ledesma Ginatta of Democratic Left, who led the parliamentary opposition to this bill.

"I want to make it clear that Democratic Left, at my initiative, opposed the bill which in one of its articles granted a tax credit to our cacao-processing industries. Our opposition was necessary, based on the analysis made by the Interinstitutional Commission, which consisted of representatives of the Central Bank and the ministries of finance, industry, and agriculture. This was an extensive and detailed study of the status of these businesses. The matter is quite simple! These businesses, which in their vast majority are composed of family groups, invested about 2 billion sucres in an industry, and in exchange for this, they received from the state between 1974 and 1980 the astronomical sum of 6 billion sucres. But not content with that, they still want congress to allocate additional aid to them of 1.2 billion sucres a year. In 5 years, that would amount to another 6 billion sucres, as a gift from the people and state to these 13 families, in addition to the other benefits they have already received!"

"On the other hand, this industry has been receiving a tax credit, which between 1974 and 1979 came to exactly 1.3 billion sucres; in addition to this, the industry was exempt from paying the export tax, and though they should for that reason have paid the producers a better price, what they actually did was deduct from the farmers what the exporters were paying in export taxes--which in reality they were not paying--and this amounted to an additional profit of 4.622 billion sucres up to 1980, and over 5 billion sucres up to 1981. When congress, aware of the situation that the producers--not the industrialists, who are multimillionaires!--were going through, decided to eliminate the taxes, the cacao industrialists decided to ask congress, since they couldn't take away from the producers the 25 percent tax, to restore this 25 percent to industry through the tax credit."

The statements made by the legislator Ledesma Ginatta certainly do not agree at all with those made by the representatives of the industrial sector. But no matter where the truth may lie, since this is a crisis which threatens the economic stability of the nation, the problem should be discussed with the greatest possible objectivity, far removed from the obstructive factors of political interests and motivations. For both the cacao and sugar industries, this situation is one of vital social and economic significance, and immediate solutions must be found for the problems facing these industries.

DRAFT BUDGET FOR 1982 PRESENTED TO CONGRESS

Guatemala PRENSA LIBRE in Spanish 30 Oct 81 p 12

[Text] The draft budget for the general revenues and outlays of the government for 1982 totals 1,481,431,057 quetzales, and is Q185 million less than the current budget.

The budget was delivered by Public Finance Minister Arnoldo Belteton to the president of the congress, Deputy Jorge Bonilla Lopez, in his office.

The minister was accompanied by Manuel Maza, technical budget director; Nery Paniagua, first assistant director; Edgar Ramirez, second assistant director; Francisco Velasquez, director of accounting of the state; and Milton Aguirre, chief of the department of budget programs.

Also present at the delivery were Deputies Rafael Spennemann, first vice-president, and David Vega Villela, third secretary.

Belteton stated that the government is making a great effort to maintain the budget allocations of this year, and that there will be no increase for next year.

"An effort has been made" he repeated, "to maintain wages and salaries of public employees, but next year there will be no increase in the number of jobs, because fiscal revenues are being cut."

"The budget," the minister went on, "does not have new positions for teachers and doctors as in years past. There are only overall allotments. But when schools and health centers are opened the allotments will be made for expenses, unlike what is usually done.

"Positions have not been calculated in advance. It is a policy of rationalizing spending, but the ministries should not fear that they will lack personnel, because as soon as a school opens the personnel will be appointed and the maintenance costs will be determined.

"This is how we will reduce the budget by Q185 million, in order to curb inflation."

Statement of Expenses

The finance minister also delivered to the president of the legislative body the nation's statement for fiscal year 1980.

Draft To Be Studied

Bonilla Lopez welcomed the minister of finance and his companions when he accepted the budget, and expressed his awareness of how serious a problem it is for Guatemala to keep positions. He said the minister had already stated that employees would continue in their jobs, which was something positive.

"Congress will analyze the draft budget in great detail," he stated. "We have the time to do it, until next 15 December."

"Moreover," said the minister, "if the deputies need any additional information we invite them to come explain the case to us."

Draft Budget

The operational programs have been cut by Q11.6 million as a result of the readjustment of budgetary allocations, to allow for the appropriate financing of all the programs involved in the social and economic sectors.

"Investment programs," he continued, "have been cut by Q243.9 million, derived from the termination of projects in 1981 and the fact that in 1982 there will be a minimum of new projects."

The public debt was increased to Q70.3 million in the budget, to be financed by the estimated increase in current income, since the government intends to implement administrative measures that will result in the collection of more revenues without having to change the tax law.

There will be new jobs only in the health and education sectors, due to the need to implement the infrastructure projects that are being initiated in various departments of the country.

Revenues

The amount of revenues budgeted for 1982 is Q890.9 million in current income and Q590.5 million in capital income.

Current income is based on technical calculations and statistical computations, according to the performance of the national economy. Tax revenues continue to be the principal financial source of current income.

Capital income will come from external loans, which do not entail any new indebtedness for 1982 because the loans have already been approved by the congress. Those whose approval is pending were contracted under favorable conditions to be used in covering a major portion of significant investment projects, such as electrification.

Outlays

Capital outlays for 1982 are intended for implementing programs and investment projects as part of the 1979-1982 Investment Plan, amounting to Q589,828,180.

This represents 29.81 percent of the total budgeted expenditures. It is Q43.9 million less than its counterpart in the 1981 budget.

Direct and indirect investments total Q545,259,097, which is 92.44 percent of total capital outlays, distributed among the most important programs and projects of state institutions.

For national reconstruction programs a total of Q44,569,083 has been allocated. The projects are scheduled in different branches of public administration.

To meet existing financial obligations, the draft budget contains only the amounts strictly necessary for initial capital payments, as well as interest and the servicing of the public debt.

"The payments program of the public debt," he concluded, "is financed exclusively with current revenues."

FINANCE MINISTER DISCUSSES COUNTRY'S PUBLIC DEBT

Guatemala PRENSA LIBRE in Spanish 31 Oct 81 p 2

[Text] The nation's public debt totals 1.6 billion quetzales, Finance Minister Arnoldo Belteton Sanjose told PRENSA LIBRE yesterday.

The official was interviewed during the inauguration of the Aguacapa hydroelectric project. He stated that in the state budget for 1982 a total of Q225 million has been earmarked for paying off the public debt, including interest.

He indicated that what is owed represents investments in important projects for Guatemala--above all because they will allow the coming generations to live under better conditions--for example, hydroelectric projects such as that of Aguacapa.

Bonus Payments On Schedule

The finance minister also was asked by our reporters about recent speculation that "as a result of the difficult economic situation in the country, the payment of bonuses to civil servants may not be forthcoming at the end of the year."

Belteton stated that such is not the case, because although there are budgetary problems, government employees will indeed receive their respective bonuses.

In addition, he pointed out that in the 1982 government budget, the largest allocation is for the ministry of communications due to the various projects that must be built.

"The other ministries will continue as they were in 1981. We are doing everything possible, however, to add some positions that the ministry of education needs, particularly teaching positions."

Hiring Freeze

In another part of his statements, Belteton said that the government will continue its hiring freeze in 1982.

"It is public knowledge," he concluded, "that we face difficult problems; for that reason, next year no new positions will be authorized, except for those that are absolutely essential."

DIFFICULT ECONOMIC SITUATION TO CONTINUE IN 1982

Guatemala PRENSA LIBRE in Spanish 3 Nov 81 p 15

[Text] "The end of this year and 1982 will be difficult for the Treasury because of some obligations stemming from large investments. But in 1983 the national economy will improve," stated the minister of public finance, Arnoldo Belteton, after delivering the draft budget for next year to the congress of the republic.

"Our economy will improve," he reiterated, "if we take into account that major projects will be inaugurated, such as the Aguacapa plant last week, and the Chixoy plant next year. This will help us economize on oil purchases."

"Furthermore," he indicated, "we hope that by 1983 there will be greater oil production, which will naturally change Guatemala's economic conditions."

"The adverse situation will continue in 1982," he pointed out, "although there is hope for improvement due to research in the petroleum sector that indicates that this is the time to invest in oil.

"Investors are enthusiastic."

National Reserves

"The country's reserves total about 220 million," stated the finance minister, "but a precise report will be given by the Bank of Guatemala. The reserves will grow with the infusion of funds lent by the International Monetary Fund (IMF)."

"Has the flight of capital abroad been prevented with the stricter measures imposed with exchange control?"

"This measure is still recent, so we have no statistics yet," he answered. "There has been a change in the policy on foreign currency in terms of travel abroad. Tourism abroad has been reduced. In general, the results cannot be quantified yet."

"Moreover," he stated, "we cannot yet evaluate the effects of higher interest rates because the increase was authorized only recently.

"This increase is an incentive for capital to return to Guatemala; we hope in this manner to encourage savings. Before, Guatemalans had no way to save, because interest rates were too low, to counteract the higher rate of inflation at that time.

"These higher interest rates favor savings, and there will be no erosion of capital; we are confident that the measure will help bring back Guatemalan money."

LEFTISTS SEEN AS ABSENT FROM ELECTROAL PICTURE

PA140032 Guatemala City Cadena De Emisoras Unidas 1200 GMT 13 Nov 81

[Station commentary: "The Electoral Spectrum in Guatemala; From the Center to the Rightwing"]

[Text] The alliance between the Guatemalan Christian Democracy [DCG] and the forces supporting Alejandro Maldonado Aguirre, which has presented a single presidential and vice presidential state consisting of Maldonado Aguirre and journalist Roberto Carpio Nicolle, does not substantially modify the electoral political scheme, but does broaden centrist positions.

Thus, at present the gamut of ideologies participating in the campaign ranges from the center to the extreme right, without effective participation by any leftist group. In fact, despite the confusion that prevails, whether internationally or not, both the DCG and the National Renovating Party [PNR] fit perfectly into a centrist framework, without the slightest pink tinge.

Even the United Revolutionary Front [FUR] is more responsive to social democratic postulates than to truly leftist premises. To be honest, then, it is not really possible to say that the electoral spectrum offers a complete range of ideological views. On the extreme right we find the National Liberation Movement (MLN), with its implacable anti-communism. The Nationalist Authentic Central (CAN) has typical liberal positions on economic and social issues. The official coalition of the National Integration Front (FIN), the Revolutionary Party (PR) and the National Unity Front (FUN) brings together diverse interests that obviously wish to remain in power. And there now arises, as a new alternative, the DCG-PNR alliance, with a reformist but not a revolutionary tendency. As we said before, it will broaden the centrist position creating a certain vacuum that apparently leaves the left without any electoral options.

From a completely unbiased, bird's-eye view, this would be the electoral panorama currently presented by the Guatemalan political situation: a nucleus of parties and interests ranging from the center to the right. This means that regardless of outcome, we can, in line with the most elementary political concepts, expect reforms but no structural changes.

CAN PRESIDENTIAL CANDIDATE DISCUSSES POLICIES

Guatemala PRENSA LIBRE in Spanish 28 Oct 81 p 4

[Press conference with Gustavo Anzueto Vielman, presidential candidate of the Nationalist Authentic Central (CAN); date and place not given]

[Text] "Never in any country of the world has the flight of capital abroad been stemmed by imposing exchange control," said architect Gustavo Anzueto Vielman, the presidential candidate of the Nationalist Authentic Central (CAN) at a press conference.

"On another occasion Guatemala already tried exchange control for the same purpose, preventing the flight of capital. Gen Carlos Arana Osorio removed those controls when he took office and capital returned gradually.

"According to economic experts," he went on, "capital accumulates or remains the same if there are security and guarantees in a country. It is clear that capital always runs some risks.

"To ensure the return of money that has left the country, a 100 percent guarantee should be given. Exchange controls should be lifted so that investors can work freely.

"When these guarantees are present, capital will return. Capital is in short supply in the world. The systems we propose to implement are designed for that purpose."

[Question] What specifically is CAN's ideology?

[Answer] CAN is a nationalist party. We believe firmly that all parties and candidates should analyze the problems of the country and suggest solutions.

The nation is mature; we propose these solutions without attacking any other candidate. At the polls it is the people who will decide what suits them best.

[Question] Is Luis Alfonso Lopez' candidacy for the vice-presidency of the republic irreversible?

[Answer] Candidacies do not belong to candidates but to the parties. They are the ones that choose the candidates; at least that is true in CAN. Given that this party has decided to go it alone, Mr Lopez' candidacy is irreversible.

[Question] Is an alliance with another party possible?

[Answer] CAN is keeping the door open to talk with other parties or groups on the basis of its existing platform, which is absolutely defined and cannot be changed.

We are absolutely convinced that there is no other alternative. Either we make the change with the challenge we have proposed, or Guatemala sinks. There is no other alternative.

We are following Costa Rica step by step. It doesn't take a genius to figure out what can happen to us if we continue the way we are now. We are convinced that the only way out for us is to have a free economy. We will achieve that; on that we stand firm.

Any party that maintains CAN's nationalism, its line and its philosophy will be welcome.

[Question] You have stated that of the 56 taxes you will leave only six. How will you obtain revenue for the nation's expenses?

[Answer] That is true. Those 56 taxes only generate 19 percent of the nation's general budget.

With the value added tax that we plan to implement--which has nothing to do with the Mexican VAT, a sales tax--we will obtain 40 percent. Since the value of land will be taxed instead of having a land tax, the income will be maintained, although the tax will be lower. This system has been tried out in other countries.

The key to the system is that it is smooth, easy to implement and nearly impossible to evade.

[Question] What is CAN's oil policy?

[Answer] We have reports that our petroleum is of good quality. We must exploit the oil and use it to the benefit of the country. We must not make the mistakes that Mexico and Venezuela did.

Mexico, which has huge petroleum reserves, has been classified by ECLA as an impoverished nation. Inflation in Mexico is due to the way oil has been managed.

We believe that with the oil we generate the cost of electricity will be lower, and the National Institute of Electrification (INDE) will also lower prices for the benefit of the populace.

PSD TO GIVE FSLN ANOTHER OPPORTUNITY

PA301617 Managua Radio Corporacion in Spanish 2200 GMT 29 Nov 81

[From "Social Democracy in Action" Roundtable with Social Democratic Party members Luis Rivas Leiva, Manuel Matos, Ruddy Ibarra and Guillermo Potoy, on 29 November in Managua--live]

[Excerpts] [Rivas Leiva] Although the FSLN has on many occasions expressed specific trends regarding the process; after awhile it changes positions. We, as members of a civil organization, of a party, believe a country should solve its problems through civil means. We believe that any ideology should prevail by the people's will. We feel we are obliged, even if the FSLN has lost its credibility by acting contrary to what it says, to give it one more change to prove what it says. Particularly when they make statements to a number of parties, as Commander Tomas Borge did at the meeting of the permanent conference of Latin American political parties, COPPPAL. What he said will go down in history whether or not it is realized. I remember when Commander Fidel Castro, soon after the victory of the Cuban Revolution, expressed democratic concepts, which at the time met with the people's approval and everyone thought that the Cuban Revolution was going to develop along the lines of a true democracy. Those who read LA PRENSA had the opportunity to read not long ago on page 2, many of the concepts expressed by Commander Fidel Castro at that time. Since then we have seen what has happened to the Cuban Revolution. Everything is different from what Castro said. He used to talk about free elections, freedoms and of other things we know do not exist in Cuba. But in the case of Nicaragua, we have always said that we are different from Cuba. We are different from Cuba geographically, politically, in our idiosyncracies, religion, customs, beliefs and even geopolitically. But as I said before, it is our duty to give the FSLN another chance and to believe what Commander Borge said at the COPPPAL meeting in Panama City before a large number of Latin American democratic parties and I quote: we are neither going to support nor cover up totalitarianism in Latin America. He also said: we realize that the only way to give credence to democracy as the system that promotes man's freedom and dignity, is for us to serve as an example of what we preach and that we do not resort to methods that the totalitarian countries use to maintain their hegemony. Further on Borge said: we are not anti-U.S. We are true democrats. We do not willingly or unwillingly respond to strategies which seek to confront us with that great nation. We reject all kind of foreign intervention, from wherever it comes, against any country on earth.

Let us hope then, that Commander Borge's words are sincere. The problem is that our revolution has several leaders and one of the nine of the leaders might say something somewhere and in a week or 7 days another one is shooting off his mouth with something entirely different. For example, talking about Marxist-Leninist guidelines of the revolution, making confessions of Marxism-Leninism and implementing measures and issuing decrees, which are absolutely different to what another commander of the revolution said previously.

However, we believe Commander Tomas Borge because of his long standing struggle, his sincerity and as the senior living founder of the FSLN. We are going to give him a vote of confidence and will participate if allowed. We are all Sandinists. The majority of Nicaraguans, except the Somozists, are Sandinists. We, therefore, believe that a Sandinist democratic revolution aimed at structuring a democratic system that will issue laws and give legal status to political parties, thus establishing that it believes in political pluralism, calling for free elections to prove that it believes in the people's right to vote; and that the status it was forced to take was only circumstantial because there was no other way around the genocidal Somozist dictatorship; and that they now believe in democracy and are going to use every mechanism to implement a real democracy in Nicaragua.

Therefore, the Social Democratic Party, PSD, is going to give the FSLN another opportunity so that history does not present us as an intransigent group. If we took positions which the FSLN strongly criticized, it was because we wanted a true democratic system for our country and that is why we are going to give them another chance and we are going to try to see Nicaragua take a democratic path.

[Rivas Leiva] Maybe it is not important to assume a definite ideology, because a political movement or a revolution does not need to say that it is one thing or another. Instead, its actions should prove what it is. Its acts will speak for it. What has worried and continues to worry us is the fact that they take positions, issue decrees and carry out activities that under no circumstance we can consider part of a democratic process, even if the FSLN says so. If they assume a totalitarian attitude, it is not necessary for them to say what they are, social democrates, Marxist-Leninists, because their actions demonstrate what they are. In other words, their acts will determine if this is a genuinely democratic process.

[Potoy] You say you are glad that some of them declare themselves as social democrats. Why do you say that?

[Rivas Leiva] Yes, we are glad because we are led to believe that things are going to change. If they are true social democrats, they will have to change the course of the revolution. We hope and we would like very much for them to give the revolution the course of a social democratic revolution. However, we disapprove of them trying to appear as social democrats, while the Nicaraguan Government is totalitarian or of a totalitarian trend which we do not like and which is causing the serious political, economic and social problems in Nicaragua.

[Ibarra] Let's see if we can reach an agreement, because I have a different view regarding the invitations that the FSLN receives from different organizations with different ideologies. I think that the FSLN is free to attend any meeting of any ideological group. However, I disapprove of the confusion they create because when they attend a communist meeting they are communists; when they attend a social democratic meeting then they claim to be social democrats; if they attend a meeting with democratic organizations, they declare themselves democrats; and when they have meetings with the communists, they are communists.

As I said they are free to meet with any organization. If the communists invite us to a congress, we will go but we will maintain our social democratic position which are well defined.

[Rivas Leiva] In conclusion I wish to comment briefly on the attacks against the church and particularly against Msg Miguel Obando Y Bravo. Recently a member of the FSLN national directorate said that these attacks were ordered from abroad. We do not share this belief. The magazine SEMANA COMICA has been criticizing Monsignor Obando Y Bravo through cartoons and other jokes for 18 months, we must say that the editors of SEMANA COMICA are Somozists. The Sandinist people's army, EPS, and the police were present during the attack on the event at the (Maria Mazzarello) church, when the mob harassed the people and Monsignor Obando Y Bravo. They were face to face with the attackers. The people who participated in the harassment were fully identified. Therefore, we must conclude that they were also Somozists. What about the mob's attack to the archbishopric offices during the problems of Father Batalla? The ringleaders were fully identified. Can we call them Somozists? We do not doubt that the Somozists would like to take advantage of the situation, but we doubt that all these attacks are ordered from abroad. Anyhow, all seems to indicate that the FSLN is seriously thinking that these attacks--against a priest, an archbishop--do not do them any good and are by all means unjust. Monsignor Obando Y Bravo has for many years maintained a position in favor of the people's interests. This was always his position during his face to face struggle with Somozism. We hope that the statement by the FSLN represents a change of attitude, because Monsignor Obando Y Bravo does not deserve to be treated this way. As a matter of fact none of the bishops do. They are all good people. They are priests dedicated to their church and who have maintained a spiritual position instead of a political one. They are spiritual guides of our people who are highly Catholic in their majority and who have been very respectful to our church leaders.

BRIEFS

AUSTRIAN ASSISTANCE--Austria's Christian youth have once again shown their solidarity with free Nicaragua by donating a passenger boat to the residents of Solentiname Island in Lake Nicaragua. The "Solentiname," which can carry 40 passengers and cost $60,000, will provide shuttle service between Solentiname Island and San Carlos beginning 16 November. [Managua Radio Sandino in Spanish 1200 GMT 12 Nov 81 PA]

FISH EXPORTS--Nicaragua has exported nearly 5 million pounds of fish this year, at a profit of $16 million, (Juan Gasol), official in charge of the Nicaragua Sea Products Enterprise, reported. The United States has been the primary market for those products, but the government is making efforts to diversify the market, with good possibilities for sales to Venezuela, Spain, France and several islands of the Caribbean. [Managua Radio Sandino in Spanish 1200 GMT 12 Nov 81 PA]

AUSTRIAN MEDICAL DONATION--The ministry of health has received a donation of medicine from Austria. This medicine will be used at the Carlos Roberto Huembes Hospital, which services more than 70,000 people in over 150 communities. Dr Herman Rieyler, a member of the Austrian Medical Brigade, presented the donation, comprising 635 kg of antimalarial and antiparasitical medication and vitamins. Nicaragua has received approximately $1 million in medication from Austria in the past 2 years. [PA142051 Managua EL NUEVO DIARIO in Spanish 1 Nov 81 pp 1, 10]

MEAT EXPORTS FOR 1981--(Armando Jarquin) director of the Nicaraguan meat enterprise, has reported that Nicaragua's meat exports amount to nearly 17 million pounds, which have brought $18 million in income. It is expected that another 5.6 million pounds will be exported during the remainder of the year, in order to meet the production goal of 26.7 million pounds of meat, of which 25.4 million pounds were intended for export. (Jarquin) added that because of various factors only 92 percent of the goal will be met and that negotiations are underway to broaden our market in the socialist countries. [PA142051 Managua Radio Sandino in Spanish 0300 GMT 14 Nov 81]

GOLD PRODUCTION--From November 1979 to October 1981, a total of 118,000 ounces of gold have been produced, which is equivalent to $68 million for the nation, it was reported by Ramiro Bermudez, deputy minister of the Nicaraguan Minerals and Hydro-Carbons Institute. He added that the goal of the economic plan had been met 100 percent in 1980 and that so far in 1981, production has been 10 percent of plan, especially in the Francisco Meza complex and Bonanza Mines. [PA142051 Managua Radio Sandino 0300 GMT 5 Nov 81]

NEW TEACHERS' COMMITTEE--Yesterday 253 delegates, representing the country's 18,000 teachers, elected a new national executive committee and appointed Natan Sevilla Gomez as its secretary general at the second national congress of the National Association of Nicaraguan Teachers. The teachers approved new statutes and a 1982 action plan. They also ratified the report presented by the outgoing national executive committee. U.S. PREPARING NAVAL BLOCKADE--Panama City, 27 Nov (ACAN-EFE)--Commander Tomas Borge, Nicaraguan interior minister, stated today in Panama that he received "a few minutes ago" information that the United States is preparing a naval blockade of Nicaragua. During a press conference in a hotel on the outskirts of this capital which began at 1500 hours (1900 GMT), Borge added that the information on "a naval blockade on both coasts" (Atlantic and Pacific) fits in with the U.S. statements and threats of aggression against Nicaragua. Referring to the date the announced blockade could become effective, the Sandinist commander noted: "It could probably be within the next 2 months." Borge, co-founder of the FSLN, is attending a meeting of the COPPPAL which opened in this capital yesterday and concludes today. In connection with the blockade plan, Borge said he had not yet revealed it to the other Latin American politicians gathered in this capital because the information he possesses must be evaluated and studied by the Nicaraguan authorities before any decision is made. COLUMNIST WARNS OF POSSIBLE DANGER ON U.S. BASES

PA041452 Panama City CRITICA in Spanish 2 Dec 81 p 7

["The Revolution Does Have Its Writers" column by Juan A. Bernal: "What's on the Military Bases?"]

[Text] The warlike position that President Reagan has been adopting in his foreign policy, not only regarding the USSR but also the third world, leads us to reflect upon the danger that Panama would face in a conflict involving the United States. Although the Panamanian people and government are peace-loving, we must admit that there are still four U.S. military bases on our territory. These bases will remain here until the year 2000, if the Torrijos-Carter treaties are fulfilled.

During a war, a military base is an important target. Its importance increases according to what is stored in that base.

The honorable representatives who questioned the deputy foreign minister during the recent assembly session, did not ask if the military bases remaining in the canal area contain any thermonuclear devices or any atomic missiles which might arouse the suspicions of enemies of the United States.

We Panamanians must make sure that no atomic devices which pose a danger to the security of the Panamanian people, are stored on Panamanian territory leased to the United States for its defense. Our government can obtain this assurance only through a declaration by President Reagan or by the southern command and an on-the-spot inspection by Panamanian officials in charge of our security.

According to the treaties the canal is open to ships of all nations, in peace as well as in war. However, this situation would change if there were stores of thermonuclear weapons near the canal. Instead of being part of the canal defenses, these weapons would be a military target for the enemies of the United States.

According to rumors there are at least 300 CIA informers in Panama, many of whom render these services free of charge. They report any irregularity which might affect the security of the canal area or of the United States. Although these citizens, natives as well as foreigners, render a valuable service to the U.S. Government, their service as informers is useless if they are not aware that they are sitting on a powderkeg.

In a place where there are many CIA informers, who can guarantee that they are not double agents informing both sides? This is especially true in our tropical countries where those who are engaged in this profession usually play both ends against the middle.

Until recently the American people could have safely said, "In God we trust." Now, however, with Mr Reagan in power, they don't know if God or the devil is on their side, or if Mr Reagan has earned the animosity of both of them.

LATIN AMERICAN UNITY SAID TO BE UNACCEPTABLE TO U.S.

PA022341 Panama City MATUTINO in Spanish 2 Dec 81 p 4-A

[Luis Restrepo Rosas article: "Panama and Santa Fe"]

[Text] During the past 15 days, Panama City has been the site of important national and international conferences. All these conferences ahve been dedicated to pointing out the need for internal unity in local affairs and for hemispheric unity in Latin American affairs.

The Panamanian association of engineers and architects has carefully analyzed the national situation and on the basis of what the participants have said, the event has had very positive results, especially regarding the issue of deriving greater benefits from our geographic position and the adequate, scientific and efficient use of our natural and human resources.

As for the international situation, or more specifically the Latin American situation, Latin American leaders have met here to study the political situation, from all angles: the crisis in central; the warlike position of President Reagan's Government and its continuous threats to the region's stability, the people's problems in the southern tip of the continent, subjected to brutal regimes that consider the disappearance of a human being as a natural thing.

Now we have dedicated the consultative meeting of the Latin American Economic System (SELA) in an effort to form a common front that may propitiate "negotiations to secure better conditions for the Latin American countries in their economic relations with the United States."

This Latin American unity is unacceptable to the country of the north. There is a document that establishes U.S. policy on Latin America. The "Sante Fe document" was prepared by Reagan's ultraconservative advisers when he was just an aspirant to the presidency of his country. For those analysts, Latin America is not an homogeneous entity. According to them, Latin America is composed by what they call "plural Americas," that is, each country is a separate entity and has no link with the others because of geographic and climatic conditions. The document even hints that there is religious and language unstability, as if wanting to take for granted that penetration efforts using those paths, would be a complete success.

This is why the Santa Fe document's economic policy recommendations to the U.S. president call for bilateral negotiations in Latin America. Cancun was the first evidence of this policy. While it is true that this policy was not definitely imposed there, it is also true that it at least, established a beachhead there. It just so happens that the Caribbean also plays an important role. President Reagan has appointed David Rockefeller as his viceroy in the Caribbean. His headquarters are in Jamaica from where economic aid to the nations of the area and the rest of Latin America is planned on the basis of acceptance of the Santa Fe postulates.

On this basis, Panama is already opposed to the Santa Fe because calls for hemispheric unity to face the giant of the north do not fit the philosophy of La Fontaine and his partners.

In urging Latin American unity to confront the United States, President Royo has become, according to the Santa Fe position, an apostate. He probably is already the target of state department officials.

The idea is to weaken our unity, our culture, religion, history and especially, "our common needs," which is what is most apparent in the Sela meeting taking place in our city.

EDITORIAL CRITICIZES REAGAN'S SUGAR TAX PLAN

PA261905 Panama City MATUTINO in Spanish 25 Nov 81 p 4

[Editorial: "Reagan's 'Democracy'"]

[Text] The sugar producers Panama included, are deeply concerned over President Reagan's announced intention to levy a heavy tax on U.S. sugar imports in the immediate future.

The planned $0.04 tax would markedly reduce the sugar producers' revenues for next year. This reduction, which in Panama's case would amount to 12 million balboas, can seriously affect all of our countries' economies, due to the high percentage of their small budgets this reduced figure represents.

Twelve million balboas would mean nothing to a nation that obtains huge revenues from other areas of its budget. But this sum does have great quantitative significance for a country that could use this money to resolve some of its most pressing problems--those that affect the health of its inhabitants, those connected with its road systems, its people's education, infrastructures and the social attention demanded by their ever-increasing numbers.

Whether or not implemented until it becomes a U.S. law, and due to the fact that it has emerged as an initiative of his administration, President Reagan's project has made it clear that the U.S. president has two opposing concepts of democracy. On one hand, Reagan proposes, decides upon and implements actions intended to safeguard regimes that, in his view, are based on the democratic philosophy. Apparently, Reagan's actions will not stop even in the face of the threat of limited or total war. On the other hand, however, the same gentleman drafts bills that condemn friendly nations to the whiplash of his taxes. By doing this he is limiting his poorer allies' possibilities of achieving economic recovery, while the wealth of the rich in his country is consolidated on the basis of the callousness of these selfish measures. Of course, this applies only to the wealth of the rich, because the poor there will become poorer every day, just like the poor here.

Apart from the projected negative impacts of these figures, the negative social and humane aspects of this measure should make somebody up there stop and think, in order to prevent the rising level of discontent and negative public relations that a provision of this kind can elicit, to the detriment of the already weakening image of the current U.S. administration. This image is already casting shadows on the U.S. people themselves, for they might seem to be guilty of expressing their solidarity with attitudes that, in all justice, should be attributed exclusively to the team of men currently directing their destiny.

BRIEFS

U.S. SPEEDING UP 'AGGRESSIVE PLANS'--Upon inaugurating the sessions of the permanent conference of Latin American Political Parties (COPPPAL), President Dr Aristides Royo warned the United States and the world that "we have indicated that fulfillment of the canal treaties is afflicted by distortions which we Panamanians cannot accept." It was a clear and timely warning connected to current developments. The warning, made at an important international forum, is in keeping with the Panamanian Government's policy of "taking to all world forums our protest over the violations of the Panama Canal treaties." We cannot let the United States use Panamanian territory to attack workers and peasants in Guatemala, El Salvador and Nicaragua, who are not willing to surrender their freedom, their rights and their hopes to the banana transnationals. They are also not willing to become pawns at the service of imperialist interests. It must be borne in mind that the United States is speeding up its aggressive plans against the region. In this context, the U.S. Government has asked U.S. private hospitals to reserve /50,000 beds, which are to be placed at the army's disposal in case of an emergency/ [passage within slantlines published in upper case]. ...It is a clear fact that that emergency will take place in Central America and Panama, for we shall not be spared the aggression. $100 MILLION IN LOANS--Loans for approximately $100 million were obtained by Agricultural Minister Dr Alfredo Oranges Bustos in his recent trip to Washington, New York, and Rome. Dr Oranges announced that $15 million will be made available to small-and medium-producers for small irrigation projects. A four-part agricultural plan totaling $43.5 million will benefit the peasant cooperatives and small- and medium-producers, as follows: a program to help the neediest producers, one for the agricultural and industrial sectors, and a plan for the lumber and fruit growing sectors. Oranges emphasized the importance of funds which will be used specifically for the transfering technology, improving the national marketing network and issuing land property titles. Other international funds will be distributed as follows: $15 million will be invested in fish farms, $12 million will be used to help indians in remote places and $8.5 million obtained from the agricultural development fund [Fondo Para el Desarro Agr cola] will be used exclusively for the development of the poorest regions in the country. COPEI INTERNAL AFFAIRS, CANDIDATES' ROLE ANALYZED

Caracas EL UNIVERSAL in Spanish 9 Nov 81 p 1-12

[Article by Tania Vegas: "The Faces of COPEI"]

> [Text] Teams in the underground game. It is not known as yet whether "Pepi" will try for the nomination. "Herrero-Pedropablismo" hopes that Montes de Oca will withdraw from the administration in March 1982 to launch his campaign. This sector feels that a "change in the balance of forces"--which would favor it--may materialize during the next special national convention. For the former president's collaborators, there is no possibility of "negotiation" because everything has already been said.

The Social Christian Party at this time does not have anyone trying for the nomination. This was stated emphatically by all of the followers of Rafael Caldera in promoting a possible candidacy of the current foreign relations minister Rafael Andres Montes de Oca.

For them it is unnecessary to push any campaign in view of the fact that "the former president has the support of the entire party."

The "Herrero-Pedropablistas" for their part emphasized that there cannot be any internal campaign because the party has not yet decided to start it. Furthermore, they maintain that Montes de Oca cannot engage in political activities while he is still a minister in an executive office.

The party's electoral situation for the moment is very calm. Some are confident of victory and others are awaiting the course of events before planning their strategy.

For the time being, it would seem that concern is centered on what might happen at the party's special national convention which will be held early next year.

That party gathering will take up the reform of the bylaws which calls for the expansion of the management bodies. In this sense "Herrero-Pedropablismo" wants to have outstanding personalities in the sector take over some of the six new positions on the National Committee.

However, high-ranking spokesmen said that those who publicly criticize the current national leadership "will not enter the kingdom of heaven." It seems that this "kingdom" is not only the National Committee but the lists of candidates for the posts which the Social Christian Party may win in the deliberative bodies during the national elections.

"Herrero-Pedropablismo" hopes that the agreement worked out in the prior national directorate--through which the National Convention will be able to study other matters which concern subjects other than the reform of the bylaws--will enable them to plan the reorganization of the regional committees and other leadership bodies to make sure that they will reflect what they call "the party universe."

In this way they could get a stronger platform which would indicate their political clout in the party and this would make it necessary for them to be consulted in any internal decision.

This matter is closely tied to the presidential candidacy although the Caldera followers reject the idea that there could be elements for possible "negotiation" before the launching of the candidacy of Rafael Caldera.

Preparations

Regardless of currents, the Social Christian Party has in public advocated an opinion contrary to the idea of advancing the national election campaign.

It stuck to this position in the Supreme Board of Elections, indicating that both the choice of the party candidates and the presidential campaign must be scheduled for the year 1983, specifically, 8 months before the national elections.

Consistent with this position, it objected that AD [Democratic Action] is getting ready to elect its candidate before the CSE [Supreme Board of Elections] has set the legal deadline. However, since to all appearances AD will not desist from its idea and since the electoral body will probably agree that this be done, through the formula of the "threes," the Christian Social Party could reconsider the timing for its presidential congress.

In the last directorate, Eduardo Fernandez already suggested that--as ruled by the CSE--the party event could be held at the end of 1982. But they also declared themselves ready to do so at any date prior to July 1982 "if the electoral pressure of the other parties is very strong."

That would torpedo the hopes of "Herrero-Pedropablismo" to introduce some change in the special national convention since the party would decide not to do that but rather right away to go into the election of its presidential candidate.

The Caldera group only is waiting for the party's signal before launching the plans that have been worked out--but not for an internal confrontation, which they do not consider important; instead this would be for the national campaign in the certainty that Caldera will be the Christian Social Party's candidate. This is why they say that "Caldera will be nominated unanimously at the presidential congress."

The Social Christian Party has already appointed its national election commission in the past directorate. Jose Antonio Perez Diaz will be the chairman and it will consist of Lorenzo Fernandez, Felipe Montilla, Miguel Hernandez Ocanto, and Dagoberto Gonzalez.

This commission has the basic job of organizing the presidential congress. However, it has been noted that it will also look for a formula of consensus that would spring from the conversations with the various tendencies within the party.

But, in spite of everything that might be maintained to the contrary, it seems that there is just one single formula: Caldera's candidacy and the thing really involved is that this should not produce any losers.

"Calderismo"

"Caldera does not have a campaign headquarters because he does not need it; the presumed purpose of such headquarters is to assure nomination--something which the former president already has sewed up." This comment was made by close associates of the Social Christian Party leader and this is the feeling of many other leaders in his group, both in private and in public.

Caldera will appoint his headquarters but that will happen after he has been "proclaimed" as Social Christian Party candidate. To run the campaign, the name of the current Venezuelan ambassabor to the OAS--Hilarion Cardozo--has been mentioned.

Nevertheless, if there is such a thing as a team of "collaborators" of the former president, it would be made up, among others, of Jose Curiel, Andres Sucre, Oswaldo Alvarez Paz, Paciano Padron, Gustavo Tarre Briceno, Hector Turuphial, Luis Enrique Oberto, Maria de Guzman, and Luis Corona.

The people within "Calderismo" do not understand the intent behind launching a nomination drive for Montes de Oca "since the situation has already been defined."

However, they agree that Montes de Oca does have the right to do that even though he has no option.

In this sector it is hoped that Caldera will be the consensus candidate not only for the party but also for the nation; but that would not materialize if "Herrero-Pedropablismo" were to insist on going with "Pepi" until the end. That might help the followers of the current minister in negotiating some positions in exchange for the "unanimity" of the choice of Caldera. Those who support the former president do not believe in this possibility and are sure that the "consensus" will not be negotiated until the time is ripe because of the objective conditions nationwide.

They feel that their leader has already achieved that consensus and that an example of that was the national directorate in which even the regional leaders--who considered themselves to be "Herrero-Pedropablistas"--voted for the formula of "Calderismo" which calls for extending the term of office of the current officials.

They also think that Caldera will be the national consensus candidate and that this has been demonstrated in the trips which the former president has made throughout the country's interior on the basis of the invitations they got for him.

His "collaborators" say that Caldera will not reach the end of his term of office as president of the International Interparliamentary Union until September of next year at which time he will be able to devote himself fully to political activities. However, it is a part of his routine to visit some sections that invite him.

As for his administration program, there is a team which is constantly evaluating the execution of the program of President Herrera. In this way they spell out the preliminary goals for what is to be the election platform of the former president.

The final draft of the general program outline will come out of the presidental congress, as provided for in the bylaws, and this job will be done by a team which the candidate will have to appoint.

Eudoro Gonzalez, Social Christian Party leader, who is a member of Caldera's team, thinks that this program will consist of two fundamental areas. "First of all, the revival of the economy which, in what remains of the term of office of President Herrera, will receive major encouragement. Second, the activities of the public services and the housing problem which is of social interest." He noted that there is no specific study on that score since these activities are subject to the decisions which the party will have to make in connection with the issue of the candidacy.

The atmosphere in "Calderismo" is one of absolute certainty. It is not totally ruled out that "Pepi" might try to run but it is thought that, if he were to do so, he would withdraw his nomination in the presidential congress because "Herrero-Pedropablismo" will not try to run the risk of "being counted out" when it has less than 10% of the votes.

They also insist that it must be realized that Caldera is the best candidate, "the only ace the Social Christian Party has" in 1983. Among other things it is pointed out that he guarantees that the presidential campaign will not become a "plebiscite" on the record of the current administration.

The exact opposite would happen with "Pepi" who, because he belongs to the administration team and is identified with "Herrerismo," would be burdened with all of the "guilt" of the administration.

They point out that it would not be good for him to try for the nomination "because he repeatedly expressed his solidarity with the Luis Herrera administration"; Caldera is different however and is not associated with the administration's record.

The election campaign will be aimed at promoting the figure of the former president, his qualities, emphasizing primarily his administration. The fact that he had been president of the republic before "and that he had done a good job" is the aspect which "Calderismo" will stress and it is said that this idea will prevail in the confrontation with AD.

They admit that the Blanco party will try to run the campaign in such a way as to link Caldera with the present administration and will try to blame him for the "mistakes" attributed to the administration. Hence they note that the man who manages to point the campaign in one or the other direction will have a greater chance of victory.

"Herrero-Pedropablismo"

"There will be a large number of candidates at the presidential congress and Montes de Oca does have a clear option." This was noted by the "Herrero-Pedropablistas" who expect the current minister to represent them in the internal contest.

Although they deny that they are involved in a campaign, one of their leaders admitted that the trips started by Pedro Pablo Aguilar on 30 October, through the Date of Tachira, was the virtual beginning of "Pepi's" campaign.

At that time, Aguilar visited the district committees in the state and it was announced that he would make similar trips each weekend until he has covered the entire country.

The idea is to evaluate the situation of "Herrero-Pedropablismo" within the party before the national directorate meets and with a view to the next event, that is, the special national convention.

People in this sector think that, through the action taken in the San Juan de Los Morros and thereafter in the national directorate, they gave evidence of the strength of the leadership of Pedro Pablo Aguilar "who is the undisputed leader of the Christian Democrats."

"Herrero-Pedropablismo" supposedly emerged strengthened from that, something which undoubtedly means support for "Pepi" and his idea of trying for the nomination.

But in response to all this, minister Montes de Oca has not given any assurances. Only once did he confirm in public that he might leave the administration in March of next year. But he has not indicated any possible final decision as to his candidacy, not even to his close associates.

"Herrero-Pedropablismo" places a portion of his hopes in the special convention because, if the "reorganization" of the leadership bodies is proposed, not just their expansion, as provided for in the reform of the bylaws, they are confident that a change can be brought about in the "correlation of forces."

This "change"--which they feel will favor them--would influence the internal campaign because it would give them greater control over the decisions to be adopted.

They also assured us that they have a majority in the presidential congress because minister Montes de Oca represents an "ace" for the victory of the Social Christian Party in 1983.

In any case, if things do not work out as they hope, there are some leaders in Herrero-Pedropablismo" who are thinking of 1988--not with "Pepi" but with Pedro Pablo Aguilar. In spite of that, it will depend on the strength which this current can muster for that occasion because "Calderismo" is already mentioning, among others, Eduardo Fernandez as the next candidate of the Social Christian Party.

CONSERVATION PROGRAM EYED AS FUEL IMPORTS NEAR $80 MILLION

Bridgetown ADVOCATE-NEWS in English 3 Nov 81 p 1

[Text] Barbados energy import bill will most likely rise above the Bds$80 million mark this year with the local petroleum demand at approximatley 1.0 million barrels.

This was yesterday disclosed by Senator Clyde Griffith, Parliamentary Secretary with responsibility for Energy and Natural Resources.

He was addressing a five-day workshop on "Appropriate Technology" at the Caribbee Hotel, Christ Church.

Senator Griffith said that it is expected that by 1985, inland product demand would reach 1.6 million barrels at a cost well over Bds$100 million.

"In this context, it is vital that we take all possible action to reduce such costs," the Parliamentary Secretary said.

He added that it had been estimated that well-planned energy conservation programme, could, in the first year of implementation, realise up to 10 per cent energy savings, and up to 20 per cent within the following three years.

According to Senator Griffith, it is expected that next year, Barbados would be aided in implementing its conservation programme through technical assistance from the World Bank, which had already commissioned an energy conservation expert to look into the feasibility of initiating a conservation programme in Barbados.

He said the fact that the overwhelming part of technological research and development in the world had taken, and still was taking, place in the industrialised countries, meant that existing technology was frequently ill-suited to the conditions for the developing countries.

Senator Griffith said that modern technology invariably reflected the fact endowments of the industrialised countries which were characterised by a relative scarcity of labour and a relatively large supply of capital as well as of skilled labour.

He added: "Ideally, what is needed in the developing countries is in many cases a technolgoy which is more suited to their factor endowment, and which better reflects their supply scarcities and needs."

The Parliamentary Secretary issued a word of warning on linking the terms "appropriate" and "alternative" energy technology too closely together.

"The fact is, that most of the research and development associated with alternative energy technology will be carried out in the developed countries," he said.

The Senator said that the United Nations Conference on New and Renewable Sources of Energy endorsed the recommendation that a World Bank affiliate be established to assist developing countries to develop their indigenous sources of energy, including carrying out research into the development of alternative sources of energy.

According to Senator Griffith, that recommendation had not met with a favourable response from influential quarters.

"Countries like Barbados do not have the financial capability to become involved in original research and development, and thus, in the final analysis, may be forced to accept the alternative energy technology of the developed world," he said.

Senator Griffith added: "Our inability to provide substantial budgetary support, like most Caribbean countries, highlights the urgent necessity for the establishment of the World Bank Affiliate."

GOVERNMENT, MOBIL STUDY EXPANDED PETROLEUM DEVELOPMENT

Bridgetown ADVOCATE-NEWS in English 3 Nov 81 p 2

[Text] The Barbados Government is presently negotiating with Mobil Oil for further exploration and development of petroleum resources on land.

And Government Senator Clyde Griffith, said yesterday that it was anticipated that there would be a final agreement which would encompass deep drilling exploration and production.

Senator Griffith, Parliamentary Secretary in the Ministry of Finance with responsibility for Energy and Natural Resources, was delivering the feature address at a workshop on "Appropriate Technology" sponsored by the Caribbean Conference of Churches and Christian Action for Development in the Caribbean (CCC-CADEC) at the Caribbee Hotel, Christ Church.

He said that Government was also in the process of attracting bids for offshore exploration.

Senator Griffith said that consultants had been instructed to prepare packages of relevant data which had been collected from the offshore seismic survey.

According to the Parliamentary Secretary, Government also proposed to involve the National Petroleum Corporation which looks after the country's Petroleum Winning Operations.

He said that Government had been examining various forms of new and renewable sources of energy, including solar, wind, and bio-mass with a view towards future use if found technically and economically feasible.

Senator Griffith said that the major advancement in the use of renewable sources of energy to date, was in solar powered water heating appliances.

He said that a substantial start had been made in tapping the market for direct use of solar energy for water heating by three local firms which were manufacturing and marketing a variety of systems.

He said that Government had provided assistance to the firms by granting them approved enterprise status under the Fiscal Incentives Act, 1974.

In addition, Senator Griffith said, Government had also sought to promote the competitiveness of solar powered water heaters by placing a 30 per cent consumption tax on imported gas and electric water heaters. And, Government had allowed solar water heater installation costs to be fully tax deductable.

He said, however, that despite that favourable treatment to the industry, several difficulties remained, the major one being the high installation costs of solar systems.

Concerning the wind power potential in Barbados, Senator Griffith said Government had secured assistance from the Inter-American Development Bank (IDB) to install a wind turbine with a rating of about 200kw. This will help in the gaining of experience in the installation, maintenance and operation of wind turbines, and in the problem involved in feeding wind generated electricity into the national grid.

He said that actual operations were expected to begin next year, and the project is estimated to cost Bds$1.87 million.

GOVERNMENT ESTABLISHES NATIONAL ENERGY ADVISORY GROUP

Bridgetown ADVOCATE NEWS in English 6 Nov 81 p 2

[Text] The Barbados Government has established a National Energy Advisory Group which will broaden the scope of the input into the island's energy planning process. Suppliers, distributors and large consumers of energy comprise the group.

Following the group's first exploratory meeting a week ago, Government expressed the hope that the advisers will assist in defining major energy issues and relative priorities. The members are also expected to comment on the implications of energy planning as it relates to economic acticity, and advise on the implementation of energy options, and ensure participation and co-operation in responsibility.

This development comes against a background of a comprehensive energy assessment of Barbados carried out by the Energy Division of the Ministry of Finance and Planning, over the past several months.

The report of that study has concentrated on energy conservation because of its potential short-term impact, and it has essentially form the basis for formulating a balanced energy conservation plan.

Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Finance and Planning, with special responsibility for Energy and Natural Resources, Senator Clyde Griffith, says that an efficient conservation plan will require a range of actions by many participants in Government, industry, commerce, and financial institutions and above all, the people of Barbados over a period of time.

Energy conservation has several appeals among which are: conservation combined with fuel substitution can lead to a reduction in oil imports and the island's dependence on foreign oil; efforts to conserve are typically less capital-intensive than efforts to produce an equivalent amount of energy with a new energy source; conservation provides additional time for careful study and development of alternative sources of energy and for making investment decisions with regard to future systems; conservation action can be taken more quickly than supply development action; and conservation actions are usually cumulative, having important long-termed as well as short-termed effects.

According to Senator Griffith, the report has made it clear that Government's conservation programme must take into account the following:

"The development of a set of energy conservation resource development goals for industry, commerce, tourism, government and transportation. In the area of transportation, much of the groundwork for the development of conservation has been laid by the recommendations of a Barbados Surface Transportation Study, which was commissioned in 1979 to examine Barbados' transportation problems.

"The report has enabled us to pin-point transport as the largest energy-using sector of the economy, some 32 per cent, when one considers diesel and gasoline fuel use.

"Energy use in private transportation is clearly dominant, accounting for some 49 per cent of all fuels used in transport. Government is very aware that transport constitutes an important area for energy policy.

"Implementation of a national energy efficiency programme which would include (a) publishing guidelines for energy efficiency in existing industry and buildings, for all new energy-using equipment and in new construction; and (b) developing standards for energy use in buildings and for energy-using equipment.

"Mobilisation of a public and private sector energy audit task force.

"Creation of concessionary financing mechanism and grant opportunities for energy conservation. As a frist step, the Barbados Development Bank currently has funds to provide 100 per cent financing for the hotel sector to install solar water heaters.

"Development of an energy investment plan to identify and evaluate the cost—benefits and priorities of potential energy sector planning needs and investment opportunities. This plan would form the basis for defining proposals for various donors."

Government's conservation programme will involve a massive public education campaign utilising all sections of the media.

To this end, Government is hopeful that the media managers will encourage specialisation by their reporters so that adequate and informed coverage of energy is provided, Senator Griffith said earlier this week.

It is anticipated that wherever necessary, in conjunction with the Barbados National Standards Instutution (BNSI), legislation will be brought in, to assist consumers in understanding the implications of purchasing applicances requiring the use of energy (GIS)

SUCCESSFUL OIL WELLS--Three out of ten oil wells sunk so far this year in Barbados are proving to be good gushers. Project Manager of Mobil Exploration (Barbados) Limited, Brian Westgate, said yesterday that the three wells were at St. Philip Church in the North, Carrington Estate and the new one at Four-square. Westgate said that only one well (Searles Plantation) out of the ten sunk this year had to be completely written off. He said that at the moment he could not comment on the well which was recently sunk in St George, because they were still far from reaching the planned depth. He added, however, that they had been looking at some tests, which had looked very good. Of the other six wells, Westgate said they would give some oil, but not of the outstanding proportions of the other three. Mobil has intensified prospecting operations since buying out the oil rights from the General Crude Oil Company of Texas, which was granted a licence to prospect for oil in Barbados in 1966. The company's lease is expected to expire in 1984. Earlier this month, Mobil sunk a well at The Farm, St. George, the first to be sunk outside St. Philip. PUBLIC SERVICE COMPANY REPORTS $23.4 MILLION LOSS IN 1980

Kingston THE DAILY GLEANER in English 7 Nov 81 p 2

[Text] Jamaica Public Service Company suffered a $23.4-million loss in its operations last year and is to institute measures to cut expenditure.

The measures include rehabilitation of power stations, restrictions on new construction, improvement in revenue collecting and prohibiting the provision of service to customers where meters are not available.

A JPSCo. release yesterday said:

"Jamaica Public Service Company Limited, has instituted measures to cut expenditure in an effort to improve the financial position of the Company."

Fuel Costs

"The expenditure cuts, follow a loss of $23.4 million which the Company suffered in its 1980 operations. Of this amount, $12.6 million was due to unrecovered fuel costs resulting from the inability of the company to meet the level of efficiency of 13,500 British Thermal Units (BTUs) per kilowatt hour, governing the fuel adjustment clause.

Other contributing factors were increases in operating and maintenance expenses.

Fuel expense for the year was $125.7 million, 57.1% of the total operating expenses of $220.2 million. The cost of fuel rose by $38.4 million or 44% over 1979 and according to the annual report, "imposed a great strain on the company's cash flow."

Saving Measures

Announcement of the cost saving measures was made following a meeting between the Board of Directors and the Management of the company on October 16.

The chairman of the Board, Mr Orville Cox said, "The new Board of Directors of the Jamaica Public Service Company Limited has been faced with a situation where the company suffered serious financial losses in the year 1980. The company's financial position has been explained to and has been discussed with the Government. It is not sufficient, however, to look only to the Government for the solution of the problem as there are crucial areas that the company must, itself address in order to minimise and contain some of the operating expenses."

Under the measures announced, top priority will continue to be given to rehabilitation of power stations to increase reliability of the system and improve the efficiency of electricity generation.

Line Losses

A programme to reduce line losses which it is felt, are exaggerated by theft of electricity, is to be immediately instituted. The Board also requested improvements in the company's revenue collections to reduce the time-lag between supply of the service and payment of the bills. It has also been decided to prohibit the provision of service to customers where meters are not available.

Restrictions have also been placed on new construction, overtime, transportation and travelling, contractor services, purchase of materials and advertising.

The chairman has called upon all sections of the company to participate in the efforts to improve the company's financial position."

OIL SEARCH BEGINS; SEAGA OUTLINES FUTURE DRILLING PLANS

Kingston THE SUNDAY GLEANER in English 8 Nov 81 pp 1, 2

[Text] Search for oil in Jamaica began in earnest yesterday when the Petroleum Corporation of Jamaica started drilling its first oil and gas exploratory well in Hertford, Westmoreland.

Prime Minister Edward Seaga visited the drilling site yesterday morning to initiate drilling, a news release from the Jamaica Information Service (JIS) said.

"This is the first well to be drilled in our renewed efforts to search for indigenous fuel in Jamaica," Mr Seaga said. He also said that two other wells will be drilled in this first phase of activities and said that "if results are encouraging it is possible that the drilling programme could be extended to a second phase."

Financing of the foreign exchange component of the project has been provided by a loan of U.S. $23.5 million from the Inter-American Development Bank Mr Seaga said.

All local costs are being paid from the resources of the Petroleum Corporation of Jamaica and the Government will own 100% of any found, through the Petroleum Corporation, which is a Government agency.

The Hertford well, about 4-1/2 miles northeast of Savannah-la-Mar, will be drilled to a depth of 10,000 feet, or until an economic basement is reached. Mr Seaga said selection of the Hertford site was made primarily on the basis of geophysical data acquired in 1979 by P.C.I.

Drilling is expected to last for 60 days, but may be extended depending on the type of geological formation encountered, and the engineering problems which may arise during drilling.

Mr Seaga said that when the drilling at Hertford is completed the rig would be removed to Windsor in St Ann for the second well. A third well at Ecclesdown, Portland will complete the first phase of activities.

Over 20 local and foreign companies have been contracted by P.C.J. to provide the materials and services required for the drilling operation. Management of the drilling activities, Mr Seaga said, is being conducted by Petro-Canada, the Canadian State Oil Corporation; and the drilling contractor is Parker Drilling Company of Tulsa, Oklahoma, U.S.A.

Referring to offshore exploration, the Prime Minister said that drilling on Pedro Bank is expected to start in the third week of December when a consortium, consisting of Union Texas, of the U.S.A., and AGIP of Italy, drill their first well on the Arawak Block (Block C). This is one of five exploration blocks into which the Pedro Bank area has been divided.

Mr Seaga also said that those two companies signed a second contract in September to conduct oil and gas exploration on Bonito Block, Block D on the Pedro Bank.

In the event of a commercial discovery off shore the Prime Minister said, the government will receive 12-1/2% of the net production as royalty, in addition to normal corporate taxes payable under the Income Tax Law of Jamaica.

If a discovery is made P.C.J. can opt to become a partner in the operations with 10% equity participation for the Arawak Block and 30% for the Bonito Block.

Mr Seaga added that Union Texas, as operator is required to use Jamaican goods and services whenever these are available on a competitive basis, and skilled Jamaican nationals will be given preference over imported labour.

SEAGA REPORTS TO PARLIAMENT ON ENERGY DEVELOPMENTS

Kingston THE DAILY GLEANER in English 4 Nov 81 pp 1, 17

[Excerpt] On energy the Prime Minister said design and development of a plant to use bagasse for electricity production at a very low cost is being negotiated with the French Government.

"This involves a special process which has the potential of producing approximately 100 megawatts of electricity from a total bagasse production of 1.2 million tons. If the negotiations are successful, this development will be phased over a six-year period, while the sugar cane production develops."

An agreement was signed recently between Jamaica and Sweden for assistance to begin a feasibility study towards the construction of the first one-megawatt plant in the country. This project will begin in November.

JPS Diesel

The Prime Minister also announced that a more energy efficient slow or medium-speed diesel system is to be installed at the Jamaica Public Service Company within the next two years, and that special attention to the development of rural energy needs is currently being studied for implementation.

Dealing with the economy, the Prime Minister said a comprehensive public sector investment programme was at the point of completion after many months of hard work by officials here and the World Bank.

It was the first time that such a comprehensive exercise had been undertaken and the results would enable "us to manage the financing of projects and the preparation of the annual budget with far greater speed and efficiency."

He said that the private sector investment requirements was approached on the basis of determining the maximum sieze of the pool of capital which could be generated locally, foreign investment was considered necessary only to make up the difference between the capital which could be provided locally and the total required.

OIL, GAS DEPOSITS--Caracas, 27 Nov (AFP)--State-run Meneven has discovered a new super-light oil deposit in southeastern Venezuela. The deposit is initially producing 1,800 barrels of condensed crude oil per day and 4 million cu ft of gas per day. Maraven has also announced the discovery of another hydrocarbon deposit in the Venezuelan Caribbean, capable of producing 50 million cu ft of gas and 350 barrels of oil per day. Several weeks ago, Meneven also reported the discovery of a natural gas deposit in the northeast, capable of generating 45 million cu ft of gas. Venezuela, which produces 2.2 million barrels of oil per day, implemented in 1978 a new exploration program designed to increase its reserves, exploring for hydrocarbons in old and new fields and also at sea. CDB APPROVES $2.7 MILLION FUND FOR REGIONAL GRAIN PROJECT

Georgetown GUYANA CHRONICLE in English 6 Nov 81 p 20

[Text] The Barbados-based Caribbean Development Bank (CDB) has approved a $2.7M plan for the Caricom Corn and Soya Bean Project which has been renamed the Regional Grain Project.

This disclosure was made by Mr Peter Webster, a project officer of the CDB who, together with four other participants of a project management training programme, are now in Guyana, to study and make recommendations for the improvement of the regional grain project being conducted in the Eberoabo Savannahs in Southern Guyana.

The project management training programme, which began September, is being held in Barbados, with 25 participants from CDB member countries, including Guyana.

The programme which has been arranged by the CDB's Project Administration Training Unit deals with all aspects of project implementation and management. Participants are also to do a one week stint at an on-going CDB-financed project, one of which is the regional grain project in Guyana.

Amongst the other projects which are being studied by five-member teams comprised of participants of the Barbados Project Management Training Programme are a rural electricity project in St Vincent and the Grenadines, a cocoa fermentory project in Grenada, a cotton project in Montserrat and the Belmopan Hotel Project in Belize.

The group which has come to Guyana, includes representatives from Jamaica, Grenada, Barbados and Montserrat. Its members are of the view that the feasibility of the regional grain project hinges on several factors, including the accessibility of the project site and adequate supplies of fertilisers. In addition, they have said that the development of infrastructural works in the Eberoabo Savannahs is vital to the success of the project which is being undertaken jointly by the Guyana, St Kitts-Nevis, and Trinidad and Tobago governments.

Mr Webster revealed that of the 3,000 acres identified as the project area, the maximum area cultivated in one cropping of both corn and soya bean has been only 1,800 acres. The group sees the regional grain project which involves the cultivation of corn and soya bean as an important venture, especially in the light of the high food import bill of the Caribbean Region. Corn and soya bean are almost major ingredients in the production of livestock feed, which occupies a substantial portion of Caribbean food imports. GNA

CONDEMNATION OF U.S.--St George's Grenada, Wednesday (CANA)--Writers, artists and scholars from Latin America and the Caribbean have issued a statement here condemning the U.S. Government for "the intense propaganda campaign it has been carrying out lately...against Cuba and other peoples of Central America and the Caribbean." In apparent reference to recent pronouncements by Secretary of State Alexander Haig and other top Reagan Administration officials, the statement adds that such threatening language reveals a renewed attempt on the part of the U.S. Government to isolate Cuba and its intention to move against democratic forces in Central America and the Caribbean. Signed by the Standing Committee of Intellectuals for the Sovereignty of the Peoples of our America, which includes such figures as George Lamming of Barbados, Suzy Castor of Haiti, Juan Bosch of the Dominican Republic and Gabriel Garcia Marquez of Colombia, the declaration urges all artists and intellectuals and progressive people in general to protest "the hysteria launched by Reagan and his advisers" and to demand they cease their "aggressive provocations" against Cuba and Central America. The statement calls on the U.S. Government to respond to questions formulated by Cuban President Fidel Castro challenging the Reagan Administration to produce the evidence it claims to have concerning Cuban intervention in El Salvador. The Standing Committee's 12 members were elected by over 200 intellectuals from Latin America and the Caribbean who gathered in Havana during September at the meeting of "Intellectuals for the Sovereignty of the Peoples of our America." CDB LOANS--The Caribbean Development Bank (CDB), yesterday announced conditional approval by its directors, of nearly US$13 million in loans to help accelerate the development of Barbados, St. Kitts-Nevis, St Vincent and the Turks and Caicos Islands. Approval was given at the board of directors 68th meeting, held in Barbados on Thursday and Friday. Note was taken by the board of approval previously given by bank president, William Demas, for various other projects around the region. Most of the funds from the new loans are going toward power generation, with US$6 million for Barbados, and US$3 million for St. Vincent. To date, the CDB has approved total financing of over US$357 million, for the Caribbean states in the 11 years of its operation. [Text] [Bridgetown THE NATION in English 3 Nov 81 p 20]

FOREIGN MINISTER ON BEAGLE, BOMB, U.S. RELATIONS

PY051512 Paris AFP in Spanish 1905 GMT 4 Dec 81

[Text] Castries, 4 Dec (AFP)--Argentina and Chile would make a gross mistake if their actions in their bilateral negotiations on the Beagle are guided by impatience, Argentine Foreign Minister Oscar Camilion today told AFP.

There is no room for impatience in these negotiations, especially taking into account the need to safeguard the figure of the mediator and his success and considering the holy father's position in the world andthe worldwide interest existing on the subject, Camilion said.

Camilion went on: I believe we will find a solution within the framework of the mediation. Yet this will demand efforts and resourcefulness.

He added: Argentina adopted a more flexible position in the course of the bilateral negotiations even before the initiation of the papal mediation, and our talks with Chile and the development of the negotiations have demonstrated that neither party has adopted an inflexible position on the subject.

He said: The papal mediation by itself confirms that the two countries have shown flexibility, in their talks, because otherwise the holy father would have found it difficult to continue to mediate in the problem.

He added: Without flexibility, the mediation would have been short-lived. The first important benefit yielded by the mediation was that of dispelling the threat of war which became quite real in 1978.

He said: I believe 1982 will be really important for expediting the pace of the Argentine-Chilean negotiations and for formulating their juridical-formal aspects. I believe this for several reasons, but above all because a bilateral treaty for the peaceful solution of conflicts which has been in force since 1972 will expire this year and we cannot let time defeat us.

Camilion also denied the charges of Argentine military participation in the Bolivian military coup of 17 July 1980 led by Gen Luis Garcia Meza.

No Argentine nuclear theory has considered, considers or will consider in the future the possibility of making a nuclear bomb, Camilion said.

The technology to make bombs is much less sophisticated than other nuclear technologies, and a country which may opt for making the bomb will automatically be put on the international blacklist and thus it will miss its chance to have access to the necessary nuclear progress, he said.

Argentina does not need a nuclear bomb. To make the bomb would be negative for the future of its nuclear program and, besides, it cannot make the bomb clandestinely, he said.

Our relations with the United States have improved to the extent that the Argentine process has improved. We are now going through a period of absolute normality, despite a few negative things which we inherited since there are still some prisoners in the country whose status is not fully in keeping with international juridical standards, Camilion said.

IGLESIAS ROUCO COMMENTARY ON CURRENT DEVELOPMENTS

PY280111 Buenos Aires LA PRENSA in Spanish 24 Nov 81 pp 1, 6

[Commentary by J. Iglesias Rouco]

[Text] On armed forces decisionmaking levels the conclusion has reportedly been drawn that if Gen Viola cannot resume his activities within the next 20 or 30 days, the present commander in chief of the army will have to assume the presidency. According to some of the media which have been consulted, the navy has reportedly approved the plan, although the air force has so far not pronounced itself on it. Upon becoming president, General Galtieri would retain the army command.

The plan would, however, go beyond a mere relief. According to our sources, the following would be attempted:

1) To strengthen presidential power considerably. Thus, the new ministers, governors, ambassadors, judges, directors of official banks, etc., would be appointed directly by the national executive, with the purpose of creating a system of dependencies and loyalties between president and officials, and not between the latter and the military commanders.

2) To bring about a system of gradual and ample civil participation. The commanders of the armed forces would retain only the main nucleus of authority, which in practice would be that of the executive, and they would only participate in the adoption of "momentous" decisions. However, the commanders would continue to have delegates in each of the ministries.

3) To establish the principle of "coordination of efforts." The military leaders would call on the population to achieve said "coordination of efforts" as a prior step toward a government of "national unity." Its object would be to define a long-term political and economic plan, upon which they would also form a "definitive" cabinet, or at least one to last a number of years.

For all we know they would try to carry out the major part of this plan even if General Viola were to return to the Casa Rosada.

So far the military decisionmaking levels mentioned earlier are not discarding the possibility of a "fourth man" at Casa Rosada if Viola were not capable of resuming the presidency. This is because certain minority military sectors could, after all, object to the presidency and the post of army commander being in the same hands, and seemingly there is no intention of imposing a system that will not command a clear unanimity. Several persons are being considered for such a contingency: the most outstanding being General Delia, whose performance in the final stages of the Peronist administration facilitated the "process"--he is often referred to as the "maker" of three commanders in chief and of two presidents--and Gen Carlos Chaseing, former governor of Cordoba, who retired in 1976, the same as Delia. General Ongania is also mentioned, of course, although as a far more remote possibility. General Mallea Gil is being considered for the general secretariat of the presidency only (moreover, this officer probably remembers what happened with Levingston).

It is obvious that the army's high command is having a rather hectic time, because in additon to preparing a wide-ranging political plan, General Galtieri and his assistants are working on the future structure of command of the army.

According to our sources, the higher promotions board has reportedly established the following order for promotion to the rank of major general: 1) Calvi (cavalry); 2) Martella (infantry); 3) Varela Ortiz (artillery-engineering); 4) Guanabenz Perello (artillery); 5) Barbieri (communications). The promotion of the first four is reportedly certain; Barbieri's promotion would depend on the future military status of General Liendo, who is at present in charge of the presidency.

However, the key to the changes that will take place in this area will be the appointment of an army chief of staff, since it is very likely that General Vaquero, who has been in the rank of general for 4 years, will go into retirement. In this regard, Galtieri's alternatives have been modified substantially by Viola's illness as well as, according to suggestions made by reliable sources, by the recent confrontation of General Nicolaides with radicalism (after the president's "hypertension" Nicolaides started coming to the forefront as a possible candidate to fill the post).

According to our sources, the political plan, which is now being studied at the army command and which is based on an "ample national agreement," could place General Villareal--who is an old friend of Viola's as well as of Galtieri's--in the army's joint staff. Like Galtieri, Villareal has always belonged to the army "moderate" line, headed by Videla and Viola. However, Galtieri and Villareal are considered to act more forcefully and expeditiously than the present and former presidents. It should be borne in mind that Villareal strongly supported Galtieri as candidate for the post of army joint staff commander against Gen Suarez Mason, who is now the chairman of YPF [government oil deposits].

In the meantime, yesterday's meeting of General Liendo with the cabinet was almost entirely devoted to determining guidelines for the activity of the ministers during the "leave" of the president. According to our sources, Liendo has reportedly requested the greatest "discretion" on Viola's health, to the extent of even in their private conversations, limiting themselves to quoting medical reports. He has also reportedly recommended that they refrain from proposing substantial initiatives but rather promote as much coordination as possible in their respective ministries. Finally, the acting president has reportedly indicated that no resignations will be considered until the "leave" ends, in other words, those ministers who wish to resign cannot do so until then. General Martella has reportedly given similar recommendations to advisers and other officers of the presidency.

The truth is that the governmental paralysis brought about--really just accentuated--by Viola's illness will not be overcome until a final decision is made on Viola's continuity or replacement, even if plans already underway--such as the elimination of indexation on building loans by the BHN [National Mortgage Bank]--are speeded up. Important projects such as Yacyreta, the derogation of circular 1050 or reform of the administrative investigations supervisory office--approved by the CAL [Legislative Advisory Commission] although allegedly with suggestions and changes which are still being kept secret--will have to wait until the situation is clear. This does not imply that there might not be developments regarding these and other matters.

As to the supervisory office, attention should be paid to a letter made public yesterday by Mr Sadi Massue in response to Mr Frugoli's letter, which was also critical of the minister. Frugoli's letter was made public a few days ago by Mr Sola, one of the assistant prosecutors who at present heads that office.

Some of the paragraphs of Massue's letter--who is a true symbol of dignity and integrity in these ill-fated days--seem to stand out, above all because those paragraphs reveal, as pointed out by Massue himself, Mr Frugoli's "inaccuracies" and perhaps a few other more disturbing things. Among those paragraphs there is one which is truly devastating.

Mr Sadi Massue says: "I do not think I am just being suspicious in noting a similarity in the two instances in which they tried to modify the prosecuting office. Its organic bylaws were reformed in 1976, when three former commanders in chief were being tried in criminal proceedings--it was mistakenly believed, the minister says, that it was done deliberately--and as a result the prosecuting office was left out of the prosecution. That office today has high-ranking officers under investigation, and the same procedure is being adopted although neutralizing it even more this time."

COLUMNIST VIEWS ECONOMIC IMPLICATIONS

PY030138 Buenos Aires LA PRENSA in Spanish 1 Dec 81 pp 1, 6

[Commentary by J. Iglesias Rouco: "A Challenge and Other Shadows"]

[Excerpt] Although it is true that General Galtieri supports--as has been said--a genuinely liberal economy, the five measures which were announced on Saturday posed a real government challenge to the army commander in chief. This matter, like that of the president's illness--both of which are closely related--will probably be carefully analyzed by the junta. As far as we know, these moves made by General Liendo, moves which are undoubtedly making fundamental changes to the economic structure, would be considered by several officers as a political counteroffensive designed to hamper the process aimed at General Viola's definitive relief, and also as a clear violation of the principles which have been established by the regime for the management of the economy. Everything indicates that in the next few days, or hours, important developments will occur in the crisis.

Whatever the case, the truth is that the "process" has decided to openly follow a policy of state-control, but only for a few days, by using mechanisms which are quite similar to those which were implemented by Mr Cafiero during Mrs Peron's presidency during the hours of chaos which preceded 24 March. According to our sources, even Mr Sigaut, who could hardly be regarded as an orthodox or even unorthodox liberal, has opposed as strongly as he could the measures which have been reportedly prepared by several technicians who did not even belong to the so-called economic cabinet, or at least to the Finance Ministry. But since the end of the already too relative freedom of the financial and of the exchange markets has been for some time a latent goal of some nationalistic groups of the army, the developmentists--connected, as we have said, to government political sectors--the Peronists and of the popular group of radicals, the replacement of Viola and the return to the "roots" of the "process" are becoming more complicated for the junta and for the officers who still stick to liberal formulas. In this way, a true coup is being promoted within the "process" with options which could have unexpected results in the next few days.

But there is something which is still more serious: The adopted measures open the way to gloomy economic prospects. In the first place, the eventual abolishment of the savings system through an artificially established top interest rate on savings deposits. At the same time, the almost absolute control of the exchange market might prevent a run on banks but, in the opinion of specialists, it will not be able to avoid the creation of a financial black market that will operate on realistic rates--higher than those officially established--and that will "relieve" the institutions of their commitments to the Central Bank. It is not worth talking about the establishment of a 180-day "swaps" [given in English] system, since everybody recalls the results of the Cafiero "package." But it must be pointed out that contrary to all announcements, no contribution is being made toward the reunification of the exchange market, but an increase in the number of different levels within that market is actually being encouraged. At this moment, for example, there are not two markets as there were last week, there are four: one for commercial transactions, another one for financial loans ("swaps"-exchange insurance), a third "floating" one (tourism, currency purchases of up to $1,000 per buyer), and another parallel one on which the U.S. currency yesterday was quoted at 12,000 or 12,500 pesos instead of 10,000.

There is no possible explanation for this situation after almost 6 years of "process," although its supporters today give assurances--as Brigadier Graffigna did yesterday--that they have never had enough time to do what they would have liked to do.

BIOGRAPHIC DATA ON AIR FORCE COMMANDER-DESIGNATE

PY200159 Buenos Aires NOTICIAS ARGENTINAS in Spanish 1930 GMT 17 Nov 81

[Excerpts] Buenos Aires, 17 Nov (NA)--According to official information, Maj Gen Basilio Lami Dozo was appointed today new air force commander to take effect on 17 December to replace the current air force commander, Lt Gen Omar Graffigna.

Maj Gen Basilio Lami Dozo was born on 1 February 1929 in Santiago del Estero and is married to Beatriz Margarita Maria Pozzo and the father of five children, according to the data released by the air force.

He joined the Military Aviation School on 8 April 1946 as a cadet and graduated as an ensign with a degree as a military airman on 10 December 1949. He was successively assigned to the training group, the third air force brigade and transport group No 1.

He served in the technical group No 1 and transport group No 2 with the rank of second lieutenant and first lieutenant.

In December 1956 he was promoted to captain and in 1960 joined the command and general staff college from where he graduated as assistant to the general staff and was later promoted to major on 31 December of that same year.

With his rank as major he served the 5th brigade of the air force, the presidency of the nation, the aeronautics secretariat, air force command institutes and in the United States where he was sent to be trained as general staff training officer.

He was promoted to lieutenant colonel on 31 December 1965 and was transferred to the 1st brigade of the air force. In 1969 he took the higher courses of the command and general staff college.

Later on he served at the air force headquarters and after being promoted to the rank of colonel on 31 December 1970 was appointed Argentine representative to the council of the international civil aviation organization and member of the air transport committee.

In 1975 he served as deputy director of the command and general staff college and that same year was promoted to brigadier general and appointed head of the general staff's aeronautical affairs.

From 12 May 1977 until March 1981 he served as secretary general of the air force and was promoted to brigadier general [as received] on 31 December 1979.

He was then appointed instruction commander and at the end of 1980 was appointed air force operations commander, which post which he still holds.

BRIEFS

DENIAL OF HABEAS CORPUS--The first criminal and correctional court of appeals has confirmed the rejection of seven habeas corpus petitions, three of them lodged by extremists under arrest and at the disposal of the PEN [National Executive Branch]. Regarding the remaining four petitions, the court ordered that a trial judge start an inquest to investigate into the petitioners' alleged illegal deprivation of freedom. In a decision drafted by Judge Fernando Mantaras and endorsed by Judge Ramon A. Montoya, the court stated that "the faculty that Section 23 of the Constitution grants the executive branch (to arrest persons during a state of siege), is of an essentially political nature and, as such, it may not be revoked by a court of law." Raul Rodriguez Anaya, dissenting in part with the other judges, was in favor of applying the doctrine on control of reasonability in the use of this faculty, a doctrine that formerly prevailed in the court. He also proposed that the rejection of the mentioned habeas corpus petitions be partially confirmed. [Excerpts] [PY021739 Buenos Aires CLARIN in Spanish 19 Nov 81 p 8]

NEW GAS PIPELINE--A 1,120 kilometer pipeline in central western Argentina will pump its first gas on December 11, Gas Del Estado announced yesterday. The pipeline, to be operated by the Cogasco consortium, will include an additional 600 kilometers of branch lines, tapping Mendoza, San Juan, San Luis, Cordoba, and Santa Fe into the new gas fields at Loma de La Lata. Joined with the northern gas pipeline, Loma de La Lata gas will reach Rosario. The Centro-oeste gasline, 76 centimeters in diametre, will move an estimated 10 million cubic meters of gas per day with a possible increase of 8 million cubic meters if additional compressor plants are installed. PREELECTION MANEUVERING BY OPPOSITION PARTIES INTENSIFIES

SDP Alignments

Nassau THE TRIBUNE in English 5 Nov 81 p 1

[Article by Gladstone Thurston]

[Text] The official opposition Social Democratic Party will contest only six of the 38 seats in the upcoming general elections, leader Norman Solomon told a press conference this morning.

And he held out the hope that should the minority parliamentary opposition Free National Movement win fourteen or so seats, they could form a coalition Government to defeat the ruling Progressive Liberal Party.

The six seats the SDP will be contesting are Shirlea, Montagu, Marsh Harbour, Clarence Town, North End Long Island, and St John's. Contesting four of those seats will be the incumbents Keith Duncombe, Michael Lightbourn, James Knowles and Mr Solomon. No one was named for the other two seats.

Mr Solomon said he was not prepared at this time to name the candidates of the other two Montagu and North Long Island constituencies.

Overnight, the FNM announced that it will not be contesting the Marsh Harbour and St John's constituencies.

"We welcome that move," Mr Solomon said. "The move is overdue. If (FNM leader Kendal) Isaacs had sat down with us last April as we invited him to do, maybe all this could have been put behind us months ago and that would have been to the betterment of the country.

"If Mr Isaacs wishes to be regarded as a statesman and not as a politician, with respect I would commend him the thought that he might now wish, in the best interest of the Bahamas, to adopt a similar position with regard the other four constituencies. If he was to do that, I would say that the FNM has come of political maturity."

Mr Solomon went on to explain why the SDP was contesting just those six constituencies.

In the last elections held in Shirlea, Montagu, Marsh Harbour, Clarence Town and St John's, he said, the FNM candidates were all beaten by candidates from the BDP.

"It is our belief that the vast majority of BDP supporters will not have changed their views concerning the inadequacies of the Free National Movement and its leadership," Mr Solomon said, "and that they find more appealing the philosophy and the aggressive and constructive opposition politics of the SDP."

In the case of North End-Long Island, Rum Cay and San Salvador, Mr Solomon said that as matters stand today, "we see it becoming a four-man contest at the very least. In such a case, an SDP hopeful will not himself be creating any substantial degree of opposition diversity. Moreover, we visited the constituency before the FNM and our prospective candidate has already done considerable work in the area.

"By supporting us in six constituencies, voters will guarantee that the Bahamas will continue to have in Parliament a strong, vocal, and fearless opposition party."

Quoting political analysts, Mr Solomon said that as of today, the majority opinion of the supposedly politically-wise has the PLP winning the next election by a huge majority of seats. Some, he said, believe that the FNM may only win in one or two constituencies.

But, should the FNM prove the experts wrong and win 14 seats, "we would offer to form a coalition Government with Mr Isaacs. We make that commitment now."

Mr Solomon pointed out that the SDP, since its birth two years ago, has initiated and dealt with 23 separate issues in the House of Assembly. In the same period, the FNM brought up and dealt with two.

Mr Solomon further pointed out that the equal participation of two major oppositon parties splitting up the vote in every constituency would make a PLP victory virtually a foregone conclusion.

"For another," he said, "the existing and ongoing political warfare between the FNM and the SDP is bound to seriously confuse the voters' decision-making processes. Many who now wish to vote against the PLP, and who would in fact do so in a one-on-one situation, will probably not do so unless they can clearly see a greater opportunity for opposition victory than now exists. The greater opportunity can never come about as long as both SDP and FNM are operational and highly visible in every constituency."

Throughout the Bahamas, he said, citizens in ever-increasing numbers cry out for a united opposition and a change in government.

"The best economic and moral interests of our country have long demanded a united opposition and a change in Government," Mr Solomon said. "The unemployed, unmotivated, undirected, and under-educated youth of our country now demand a united opposition and a change in government. It is our earnest hope that the action of greater unification we now propose may at the very least enhance the possibility of achieving that change in Government.

"The PLP can be beaten. Indeed, were it not for opposition disunity they could have been beaten at the last general election. They can possibly be beaten at the next one. But they cannot and will not be defeated by opposition parties so gravely at odds with one another as are the SDP and the FNM."

• The Free National Movement has approved eleven candidates so far to contest the upcoming elections. They are leader Kendal Isaacs (Delaporte), chairman Cecil Wallace Whitfield (Pine Ridge), J Henry Bostwick (Nicolls Town), Maurice Moore (High Rock), Pierre Dupuch (Shirlea), Edmund Moxey (St Barnabas), George Wilson (St Michael's), Frank Watson (Carmichael), James Wood (Grant's Town), Cecil Richardson (Bain's Town), and Tennyson Wells (Bamboo Town).

FNM No-Contest Decision

Nassau THE TRIBUNE in English 5 Nov 81 pp 1, 13

[Article by Gladstone Thurston: "FNM Won't Go Against 3 SDP Seats"]

[Text] The Free National Movement may not contest three constituencies presently being represented by the official opposition Social Democratic Party.

Following a specially called council meeting last night, the FNM decided unanimously not to oppose SDP leader Norman Solomon in St John's, and Michael Lightbourn in Marsh Harbour.

THE TRIBUNE was reliably informed that the FNM is seriously considering not contesting the Clarence Town constituency, which is being represented by the SDP's James Knowles.

The decision not to contest St John's and Marsh Harbour, the FNM stated, was reached "so as not to spoil the chances of the overall opposition winning the Government from the Progressive Liberal Party."

The FNM release stated that "it is essential for the good of the nation that opposition parties take a sensible, practical approach to beat the PLP at the polls."

"Since it is obvious that FNM candidates cannot win in these (Marsh Harbour and St John's) constituencies and would only spoil the chances of other opposition contenders," the FNM release stated, "the party has decided not to contest."

Asked what motivated this move, FNM chief spokesman Arthur Foulkes said today they were "trying to clear the way and eliminate a three-way fight."

Though reticent in discussing the situation, Mr Foulkes said that he knew of no previous meeting with the SDP relative to the posting of candidates. "We are not asking them (SDP) anything," he said. "We are just going ahead with our plan."

"Obviously we don't feel the same way about Shirlea," Foulkes said. "We are confident that (FNM candidate Pierre) Dupuch will win Shirlea even in a three-way fight."

Asked whether the FNM will now be contesting 36 constituencies, Foulkes replied: "We have not decided that we are going to run 36. The Council just decided last night that in the case of those two seats (Marsh Harbour and St John's) we would not oppose. Obviously we have to consider a whole lot of things."

The Tribune was told earlier about plans by the FNM to attract to that party other members of the SDP as was done before with other SDPs, including Senators Dr David Sands and David Thompson.

"There is a chance that we may not oppose Solomon but we don't want him," a leading FNM hierarchy member said on Tuesday. "We may not oppose James Knowles and we want him. We may not oppose Mike Lightbourn either."

However, the FNM is going ahead with its intentions of contesting the Shirlea constituency which is presently held by SDP's deputy leader Keith Duncombe. The FNM has nominated publisher Pierre Dupuch for Shirlea.

"The deputy leader (of the SDP, Duncombe) must be opposed," an FNM hierarchy member said. "The deputy leader can't win. The man who caused him to be elected is in his grave. he (the late Sir Roland Symonette) had to go to every house to sell Keith. He (Duncombe) would be in serious difficulties if he runs in that district."

WORKERS PARTY LISTS 'REQUESTS' IN UNITY LETTER TO PLP

Shock to Party Members

Nassau THE TRIBUNE in English 27 Oct 81 p 1

[Article by Gladstone Thurston: "Village in State of Shock"]

[Text] BLACK VILLAGE is in a state of shock today following last night's move by the hierarchy of the Workers Party to become members of the ruling Progressive Liberal Party.

"We, the undersigned officers and members of the Workers Party do now make a most sincere and humble application to the Convention of the PLP to become members of the party," a letter signed by Workers Party leaders stated.

The letter, which was read to the convention last night was delivered to Prime Minister Lynden Pindling, Deputy Prime Minister Arthur Hanna, and chairman Andrew 'Dud' Maynard.

It was signed by the Workers Party's Phillip Miller, leader; Rodney Moncur, chairman and Donovan Dorsette, secretary-general.

Residents of Black Village the home of the Workers Party recalling Moncur's virulent attacks on the PLP, even to the extent of burning effigies of Prime Minister Pindling and other members of the Government, openly expressed shock at the Workers Party move.

One young man suggested that an effigy of Moncur be burnt, another said that he should be banned from the Village.

They were anxiously awaiting his return from a meeting he was to have had with PLP chairman Maynard this morning. They claim that he made that move without consulting the membership.

As Black Bahamians whose cause of racial and class oppression was taken up by the Progressive Liberal Party from the party's birth in 1953, the Workers Party letter read: "Our established vehicle for political action is the Progressive Liberal Party. All pretensions are mere pressure groups."

Despite the fact that they have "vehemently denounced the wrongs and omissions" of the PLP, the letter stated "we love and respect the party and its leaders, who are the greatest heroes in Black Bahamian history, for having given our parents a new hope and for having taken them to a new and glorious horizon.

"But we too yearn for a new hope, not only for ourselves, but for our babies as well. We too, long to reach a new frontier and see bright dawn on a glorious horizon.

"Perhaps we have been too anxious, too impatient: perhaps we have fanned the fire too vigorously. For this we humbly beg to be forgiven. At the same time, however, we ask that the PLP does not provoke the younger generation to wrath.

"We pray that we not be like the rebellious Absolom, son of King David, for that will bring grief to both the PLP and the younger generations. We pray that we be received by the fathers of the nation, as the prodigal son was received, in love and forgiveness.

"We are prepared to work with the noble fathers of this great Bahamian family and our desire is to be a part of the march to the new frontier."

In a petition that was not read before the convention, the Workers Party made seven requests:

- that democratic processes be made accessible to younger generations by instituting local government in Nassau as well as the Family Islands;
- that a housing work force, similar to the Defence Force, be recruited from the youth to ensure that even the poorest Bahamians are provided with spacious, hurricane-proof dwellings;
- that adequate land for housing be provided for the endless young Bahamian householders;
- that a farm work force of young people, similar to the Defence Force, be established to produce basic Bahamian needs and provide hundreds of high-income jobs, by proper use of the large tracks of land capable of sustaining food crops;
- that a work force be recruited mainly from the large population of unemployed young women to produce the major items of clothing worn in this country;
- that a dangerous drug policy by national consensus be devised so as to benefit the majority of the people;
- that the PLP government cease open and underhanded intimidation and victimisation.

Solidarity Following Retraction

Nassau THE TRIBUNE in English 31 Oct 81 p 1

[Text]

WORKERS PARTY members and supporters last night marched from Black Village to the Coconut Grove Monument where they were addressed by party leader Rodney Moncur.

Last night's show of solidarity by party members and supporters followed this week's announcement that the leadership had applied for membership in the ruling PLP a party that the Workers Party had vehemently opposed. opposed.

Since then, party leader Moncur, who replaced ousted leader Philip Miller following the disclosure, delivered another letter to the PLP withdrawing the original letter of application.

Most of the women from the Workers Party's women's branch, as well as long-time party members and supporters, turned up to hear leader Moncur explain why the party tried to join the PLP. Party leaders have since called the move a "political blunder."

Also present was former leader Philip Miller, who did not speak. No hostility was shown towards him, although members had accused him of instigating the move to join the governing party.

The march left Black Village, stronghold of the Workers Party, at 8 pm and arrived at the Coconut Grove Monument about 8:45 pm.

Moncur told the over 70 persons attending that Moses never reached the Promised Land; that it was Joshua "and Prime Minister Pindling will never reach the new frontier." Attaining the "new frontier" is the theme of the PLP's week-long convention, which closes with a banquet tonight.

Moncur said there is a new frontier on the horizon and the Prime Minister sees it, but he will never reach it.

Moncur said it was important for party members to protect and defend the honesty and integrity of the leaders of the party until its leaders could give them the correct explanation for trying to join the PLP.

He said radio ZNS' announcement that the Worker's Party had submitted a letter of application to the PLP had confused radio listeners.

Although BEC failed to turn on the monument light in time for the meeting, excellent lighting was obtained from nearby homes.

Mr Moncur said the party had paid BEC $10 the day before to turn on the lights, but they did not do so.

He said that the party will ask BEC to refund the $10

HANNA ADDRESSES PLP CONVENTION, PLEDGES FULL EMPLOYMENT

1982 Target

Nassau THE TRIBUNE in English 27 Oct 81 p 1

[Article by Gladstone Thurston: "'Full Employment by Next Year' Says Hanna"]

[Text] THERE WOULD be "near full employment in the real sense" by the end of next year, Deputy Prime Minister Arthur Hanna told last night's session of the ruling Progressive Liberal Party's convention.

This was the second time that a PLP convention had been given a target date for full employment. The first time was in 1978 when the party celebrated its silver jubilee. Then in the keynote address that was televised Prime Minister Pindling promised full employment by October, 1980. The theme of that convention was "surviving the next 25."

"In the next few months you will have seen many of our people, especially the young men and women, finding suitable employment and this trend will continue until all are employed," Mr Hanna told delegates last night.

Addressing hundreds of delegates from the 38 constituencies throughout the Bahamas, Mr Hanna joined others in calling for party unity especially on the eve of another national elections. The theme of the convention is 'To The New Frontier.'

Mr Hanna called on delegates to be deeply conscious of the important tasks that lie ahead - to eliminate suffering, unemployment, ignorance and poverty; to rebuild roads and provide electricity and water and the normal amenities of life throughout the Bahamas.

The Government's highest and noblest duty, Mr Hanna said, is the elimination of human suffering whether that suffering is due to poverty or sickness.

"We are deeply conscious of the fact that much of this suffering is due to the persistent level of unemployment and we have made the question of full employment our number one priority," Mr Hanna said.

By full employment, Mr Hanna said he did not mean merely providing sufficient jobs for everyone no matter what those jobs are about.

"In that sense we have full employment now," he said. "We have more than enough jobs for everyone, but they are not necessarily the jobs that everyone wants or can do."

As an example, he said, there is insufficient manpower in the skilled and semi-skilled trades in the building industry; there have been attempts without success to find people to clear the streets in New Providence; there is a shortage of manpower in the fishing industry and in the agricultural sector. The Government still has to recruit accountants, doctors, lawyers, engineers, teachers and other professional skills.

"Yet, in spite of all this, there are still many people unemployed particularly the young men and women and older women who are compelled to look after their families themselves," Mr Hanna said.

It is with these things in mind that the Government had conducted its investment and development policy and its training programme "and firmly, I believe that there would be near full employment in the real sense by the end of 1982."

In the meantime, he said, Government proposes to step up its social programme to provide reasonable relief for those who are out of work or unable to work.

"The Government has committed large sums of money to ensure that no Bahamian anywhere should ever starve or suffer unduly and will commit even more funds if ever it becomes necessary so to do," Mr Hanna said.

"Let all those who have a problem come forth as I have said over and over again, 'our ambition is to wipe every tear from every Bahamian eye'."

The Government, he said, also hopes to ensure that all Bahamians everywhere are supplied with the basic amenities of life and it proposes to ensure that proper tar roads are provided everywhere in the Bahamas whether it be in Fox Hill, Bamboo Town, South Beach, Carmichael, Montagu, Acklins, Abaco, Exuma, East Grand Bahama or Andros.

There is also the question of the provision of water and electricity, telephones, airports and docks to all the Bahamas "to which our attention is turned," Mr Hanna said.

"We have geared our education programme to compliment our overall national goals and to ensure that Bahamians are suitably trained to take their rightful places in the building of our country," Mr Hanna said.

The Government, he said, is seeking to ensure that those in the Family Islands have a more direct involvement in their own affairs and hopes to implement suitable forms of local Government during 1982.

"Our ultimate goal is to make the Bahamas the greatest little country on the face of the earth," Mr Hanna said. "That may yet be far from us and we have to march wearily along the long and winding path but no one will be able to take away from us that hope which has survived again and again and no one will be able to crush the spirit of the thousands of Bahamians which has found rebirth again and again after so many crucifixions."

At the party's silver jubilee convention in October, 1978 Mr Pindling promised Bahamians full employment by October, 1980.

Speaking at the party's 23rd national general convention in the Polaris Hall, Holiday Inn, on Monday, October 30, 1978, Mr Pindling said:

"There is already full employment in Abaco and Eleuthera. Grand Bahama and Andros should have full employment by next year this time (1979) and New Providence by October, 1980."

At that time he said there had been a significant upswing in tourist arrivals and predicted that "the spending of those visiting in our Bahamas is within the striking distance of $500 million and the goal of two million tourists by 1980 is now within both sight and range."

"Reflecting the strong rebound in tourism in the Bahamas," he said at that time, "the external reserves of our country have risen almost continuously from the December 1977 level of $67.2 million to the peak level of $94.2 million."

He also said then that the Bahamas had more than enough capital to pay off in full all of the country's foreign debt.

In the televised speech he told the 1978 delegates that the Bahamas was poised for a period of great economic expansion.

However, the second quarter report from the Central Bank this year showed a drop of $26.7 million in income derived principally from tourism.

The Central Bank reported that net invisible earnings fell to $119.6 million from a level of $146.3 million a year earlier.

For the same quarter tourist figures fell by 1.2 per cent. Air arrivals had declined by 10.4 percent, while sea arrivals had increased by 16.5 per cent.

The national debt is now $280 million and inflation 12.9 per cent.

Election Plans

Nassau THE TRIBUNE in English 27 Oct 81 p 1

[Text]

IT IS UNLIKELY that national elections will be called before next year, Deputy Prime Minister Arthur Hanna indicated last night.

"One of the principal reasons for our seeking election in 1982," he said, "will be to carry the message of our party to our people and to acquaint them with our future programme and policy, to make them realise that we not only stand for them, but we are one of them and seek to assist and co-operate with them in removing their social and economic burdens."

Mr Hanna said that in the past the party had experienced opposition from the daily newspapers and those who seek to perpetuate special privileged groups. It was that opposition that the party will have to face, he said.

But, quoting one leader, he said: "The real danger will come from our toning down our programme and policy in order to win over the hesitating and compromising groups and individuals. If we compromise on principles we shall fall and deserve our fall.

"The only right way and the only safe way is to stand four-square on our own programme and to compromise with no one particularly those who have opposed progress for our country, the social economic and educational goals of our people or those who have opposed the national struggle for a free Bahamas."

Mr Hanna joined chairman Andrew 'Dud' Maynard in stressing the importance of unity within the party.

"This party survived because its members were true and loyal to the party, the country and to each other," Mr Hanna said. "We stuck with each other through thick and thin and we survived and if we stick with our people they and us will survive.

"I am convinced that the large majority of our people do not want to let go of us, but they want us to possess more of the land they want the same prosperity that they think some of us have."

In his opening address, chairman Maynard urged delegates to "stop conniving and back-biting one another. We are going to stop believing that we can hurt Tom without hurting ourselves. Then we will close ranks and save our fight for those people who wish to take your children back."

Candidate Recommendations

Nassau THE TRIBUNE in English 29 Oct 81 pp 1, 5

[Article by Gladstone Thurston: "PLP Drop Two From Election Candidates Lineup"]

[Text]

THE NATIONAL General Council (NGC) of the Progressive Liberal Party has dropped two incumbents from its recommended list of candidates to contest the upcoming general elections.

Dropped from the slate of candidates are West Grand Bahama/Bimini Member of Parliament Henry Bowen, and St Agnes Member of Parliament Bruce Braynen. All the other incumbents were approved by the NGC.

Replacing Bowen will be lawyer Moses Hall, and taking over from Braynen will be Youth, Sports and Community Affairs Minister Kendal Nottage.

However, the list of candidates presented to the convention this morning by secretary-general Berlin Pratt will be finalised by the convention this afternoon.

According to Pratt, a member of each constituency will move for the ratification of the candidate named for his constituency. Another member of the delegation will second the motion.

The session chairman, who will be Andrew 'Dud' Maynard, will then put the motion to the convention for acceptance or rejection.

However, one important question that went unanswered came from a delegate from the Mangrove Cay constituency. "If we nominate a man and second the motion and the convention says 'no', then what happens."

The Candidates Committee of the PLP, Pratt said, held several meetings and considered applications from persons seeking the party's nomination to contest seats in the next general elections.

"The Committee made its recommendations to the National General Council at a specially called meeting on Thursday (last) night," Pratt said. "The National General Council approved the Candidates Committee's recommendation by a unanimous vote with one abstention Henry Bowen abstained."

Approved candidates for New Providence constituencies are Arthur Hanna (Ann's Town), Norman Gay (Bain's Town), Leander Minnis (Bamboo Town), Paul Adderley (Carmichael), Perry Christie (Centerville), Valentine Grimes (Fort Charlotte), Phillip Pinder (Delaporte), Sir Clifford Darling (Englerston), Alfred Maycock (Fort Fincastle), Frank Edgecombe (Fox Hill), Shadrach Morris (Grant's Town), James Brown (Montagu), Kendal Nottage (St Agnes), Sinclair Outten (St Barnabas), George Mackey (St Michael's), Milo Butler Jr (Pinedale), David Knowles (Salem), Bradley Roberts (Shirlea), Bobby Glinton (South Beach) and Clement Maynard (Yellow Elder).

Candidates approved for the Family Islands are Wilbert Moss (Acklins, Crooked Island and Long Cay), Ervin Knowles (Cat Island), Errington Watkins (Clarence Town), Hubert Ingraham (Cooper's Town), Livingstone Coakley (George Town and Ragged Island). Philip Bethel (Governor's Harbour), Russell Franks (High Rock, Grand Bahama), J Russel Ford (Inagua and Mayaguana), Lynden Pindling (Kemp's Bay), Darrell Rolle (Mangrove Cay), Eddison Key (Marsh Harbour), Loftus Roker (Nicholls Town and the Berry Islands), Philip Smith (North Long Island, Rum Cay and San Salvador), Jeff Thompson (Pine Ridge, Grand Bahama), James Moultrie (Rock Sound), George Smith (Rolleville), Peter Bethel (St John's), Moses Hall (West Grand Bahama and Bimini).

If another seat is created in the Grand Bahama area, the National General Council has approved Wellington 'Doc' Stewart.

Referring to the party's constitution, chairman Maynard warned that anyone who is going to be nominated for an election must be a registered voter.

"We would like all candidates to produce evidence that you are in fact a registered voter this afternoon if you want your candidacy to be ratified," Maynard said. "You had better bring evidence. I would see that the convention complies with the constitution."

Opposition to Candidates

Nassau THE TRIBUNE in English 30 Oct 81 p 1

[Text]

PROGRESSIVE LIBERAL Party generals have come out strongly against the National General Council's choice of Errington Watkins as the candidate for the Clarence Town, Long Island, constituency.

"Under no circumstances whatsoever could we in good conscience sell Watkins as a PLP to the voters of this country," a leading general in the St Agnes/Grant's Town area told The Tribune. "We urge the party to call back that nomination and give it to a PLP."

Several PLP members claim that Watkins, formerly chairman of the United Bahamian Party (now defunct), was chief among those who "tried to destroy the PLP during its formative years."

They also recall that in 1970 Watkins, as chairman of "the enemy of the people," campaigned against Prime Minister Lynden Pindling in the Kemp's Bay constituency. He is on record as describing the PLP as being "inefficient and incompetent. It would appear to me that everything this government has touched went sour."

Watkins too was the leader of the Abaco delegation, which in 1973 petitioned the House of Lords in England for Abaco to remain a British Crown colony, not part of an independent Bahamas.

"He was the one who said that Abaco should not be associated with the same Prime Minister and the same party," one irate general said.

Less than a month before Independence of the Bahamas, Watkins told Parliament:

"If this is a democratic society we will be seeing the end of it on July 10. There will be weeping and wailing, and where there are no teeth the gnashing of gums."

By 1974, however, Watkins had returned to the PLP fold and openly announced his support of Prime Minister Pindling. Nevertheless, many PLP generals never accepted him as a PLP and were always wary of his moves, The Tribune was told.

"It's a good thing he is not running in Nassau. I wouldn't have campaigned for him," said another general. (Because of their position in the PLP and their business holdings, they asked that their names be not used).

It was their view that Raleigh Butler, who carried the PLP's banner in Clarence Town from the 1950's, is the person best suited for the candidacy of Clarence Town. Moreover, Butler, son of the late Governor-General Sir Milo, has for several years been the PLP's NGC member for Clarence Town.

"Raleigh was always a die-hard PLP," one general said. "It was his daddy who made the PLP win the Government. If it was left up to Watkins and them the PLP would have been broken up."

"How could I honestly go out and sell the PLP with fellows like Watkins," added another general. "It is a bad choice. No die-hard PLP could go out and campaign for Watkins."

"I don't see how the National General Council could by-pass a sincere and dedicated man like Raleigh," another general said.

"Is the memory of my party so short?" one asked. "They talk about UBP. They are putting the UBP in their bosom. They have one of Stafford Sands' men in their bosom. They have the chairman. Make sure spell that out – the chairman. Tell my party to call back that nomination and give it to a PLP."

"Look at (Henry) Bowen (who was dropped by the NGC)," noted another general. "Bowen is a man who carried the PLP banner in Cat Island during those dark early days. He has never strayed away from the party. He is a fair man. They dropped him and picked up a man like Watkins."

"Look like they're running out all the PLPs and taking in the UBPs," one general complained. "You might as well change the name of the party."

As the party prepares for the general elections, this is the first time that staunch PLP generals have spoken out against candidates nominated by the NGC. It is understood that there is ill feeling towards other PLP candidates, including Ervin Knowles (Cat Island), David Knowles (Salem) and Bobby Glinton (South Beach).

Pindling Policy Speech

Nassau THE TRIBUNE in English 31 Oct 81 p 1

[Article by Gladstone Thurston: "PM's Dream of the 'New Frontier'"]

[Text]

PRIME MINISTER Lynden Pindling last night released his blue print for development in the Family Islands and looked forward to the day when the capital of the Bahamas "will sit on the broad plains of Andros."

"New Providence will boast our financial capital, Grand Bahama will host our industrial capital and Andros will nurture our political capital with much more land to spare," he said.

Addressing delegates attending the 26th national general convention of the Progressive Liberal Party, Mr Pindling gave an insight of what to expect as they move 'To the new Frontier' -- the theme of the convention.

A capacity crowd at the Polaris Hall of the Holiday Inn Hotel, Paradise Island, heard the Prime Minister tell of how "at this moment the Government is literally swamped with applications for new direct private foreign investment..."

This investment will be in touristic developments in the northern, western, southwestern and southeastern parts of New Providence "but whether all of these will be able to get approval is problematical."

Nevertheless, he said, approval has already been given for further touristic developments on Paradise Island, Cable Beach, Coral Harbour and Lyford Cay with a combined value of some $250 million.

In addition to that, he noted, there is public investment on the order of $100 million, which is now being made in the Cable Beach area.

"The combined effect of all these will ensure the supremacy of Nassau's tourist facilities for, at least, another fifteen years," Mr Pindling said.

At the same time, he said, some banks and insurance companies have already been given approval to either expand their existing facilities or build new ones.

"We confidently expect the banking and insurance sectors to grow significantly, particularly in view of the unsettled and unsettling situations in the Middle East and Western Europe," Mr Pindling said. "Panama and Cayman will certainly get their share of this new business, but we have no doubt that the lion's share will come to our Bahamas."

In the consideration of the future, Mr Pindling said it would be wise to take into account the development of Eastern Grand Bahama.

There, two basic tools for its future economic development already exist a deep water harbour and a jet airport, he said. The deep water harbour is currently under the management of Burmah Oil and is principally used as an oil transshipment facility.

Around the harbour the groundwork has already been laid for the establishment of an industrial estate, Mr Pindling said. This freeze zone, he said, could be the catalyst that will fuel the economic development of Eastern Grand Bahama, transforming the settlement of High Rock into a major town, and bringing Pelican Point and Maclean's Town into the mainstream of the economy.

The airport is presently under the control of the United States government. Their facility at Gold Rock Creek played a major part in the development of the American Space programme. The airport is the last one in the Bahamas still being used exclusively by the Americans.

When they withdraw from it, due to improvement in their technology, as they have progressively done from Mayaguana, San Salvador and, most recently, Governor's Harbour, Mr Pindling said, the airport will open up direct domestic and international air service to Eastern Grand Bahama, with all the benefits that such a move entails.

Between High Rock and Freeport, he said, 2,000 acres of land have already been placed under the production of limes. These limes will be exported as whole fruit and in juice form to North American and European markets.

Acreage, he said, will be extended according to demand, and arrangements have been made for the transfer of farming technology to any Bahamian who would wish to grow a citrus crop under scientific conditions in the same general area.

"Over $100 million in direct investment has already been approved for various industrial, touristic and agricultural enterprises in Grand Bahama and more than that is presently under consideration," Mr Pindling said.

When the international airport at Treasure Cay, Abaco, was officially opened last August, he said, the public suddenly became aware of the vast potential for development that north-western Abaco had.

Cooper's Town, he noted, is the fastest growing community in Abaco with a population rivalling that of Marsh Harbour. Its young men are enterprising and prosperous and its fishermen are exploiting the rich resources of the banks.

In the Norman's Castle area where, he said, the most successful Bahamian farming venture of all time is being operated, the proto-type has already been developed for the growth and export of permanent crops like citrus and avacadoes and this proto-type will be further developed and extended to other islands of the Bahamas.

Treasure Cay which has won acclaim as the foremost resort development in Abaco is to experience new direct foreign investment to the tune of about $50 million, which has already been approved.

As for Marsh Harbour, hotel, condominium and marina developments, valued at $45 million have been approved or are under consideration for that area of Abaco "and they will either be wholly Bahamian-owned or have significant Bahamian participation."

Any new frontier in Abaco, he said, must include the successful exploitation of the 25,000 to 50,000 acres of prime agricultural land which runs to the northwest, west and south of Marsh Harbour.

The key factor for the economic development of this area, Mr Pindling said, is the harbour at Snake Cay. Any agricultural, agro-commercial or agro-industrial development must of necessity include a deep water facility at Snake Cay.

"The new frontier beckons in Abaco for another 20,000 Bahamians over the next twenty-five years," Mr Pindling said.

As for the Central Bahamas, the Prime Minister said public and private investment on the order of $15 million is on the drawing boards for Exuma.

"Banks in the Bahamas have not yet permitted the Exumian to participate in the development of Exuma as they have done in assisting Abaconians to participate in the development of Abaco," said Mr Pindling. "But, over the horizon and on to the new frontier, this state of affairs must change."

The completion of the new airport to be constructed in Moss Town, he said, will enable Exuma to be the communications hub of the central and southeast Bahamas. It will make possible better domestic and international air services not only to Exuma, but also for onward destinations in Long Island and Acklins and Inagua.

"As we look to the new frontier," Mr Pindling said, "we are forced to admit that Andros could hold the future of our country in its hands. Her rich soils will be the bread-basket of the Bahamas and her cooling waters will soothe many a dry throat.

"As Florida's frost line moves further south, as more and more farm land in Florida is eaten up by the expansion of her cities and the growth of her population, as its land becomes scarcer, the farm lands of Andros will come under economic use for the primary production of and the manufacture of food products, not only for domestic consumption, but also for export.

"From her rich banks and deep sea-troughs we will mine the gold of the sea and manufacture and process, on the spot, fish and fish products both for the local and the international market. Her conch-beds would be turned into factories of jewels producing rare cultured pearls like the Japanese did with their oyster-beds.

"I have a dream that one day, somewhere off the shores of Andros, we will at last be able to bring to the surface the oil which for many years we have been hearing about as being there."

Pindling on 'Local Government'

Nassau THE TRIBUNE in English 31 Oct 81 p 1

[Text]

PRIME MINISTER Lynden Pindling warned that local government would not mean that each island will be free to collect all the revenues that are now being collected and to expend those funds at its whim or fancy.

"The central government will maintain an overall responsibility for the oversight of local authorities together with those matters which are of national concern such as education, social security, defence and internal security," he said.

Discussions are now being undertaken by local government commissions, which have been asked to consider which areas of responsibility might effectively be administered locally.

Matters like local facilities and utilities, licensing, and other areas, which are of prime concern to the local communities will be fully addressed, Mr Pindling said.

"The Government's objective is to provide the people of each island with a direct voice in their local affairs up to clearly defined levels, and to foster the development of all our islands socially, economically and politically," Mr Pindling said.

The island best suited for local government, he said, is New Providence, but in all the discussions to date this point seems to have been overlooked.

The application of any new system of local government in any island, Mr Pindling said, will carry with it a responsibility to conduct local affairs within the local community "but there must be no illusions about the prospects of exercising power without the related responsibility of accounting to the community."

"The exercise of power without accountability will only result in chaos, and it does not represent what we have stood for over these many years.

"It should also not be overlooked that the exercise of responsibility and accountability will mean that the local government may have to raise new taxes from its own resources to defray the expenses of things it may want to do and pay for the system it operates," Mr Pindling said.

Involvement in local government will mean hard work and dedication, he said, "but as we look to a new frontier, it will enhance the ability of each of our islands to determine for themselves what the future will bring."

OPPOSITION FORCES ATTACK PLP CONVENTION PROCEEDINGS

Constitutional Referendum Issue

Nassau THE TRIBUNE in English 1 Nov 81 p 1

[Text] THE FAILURE of the ruling Progressive Liberal Party in convention to mention anything about the proposed referendum to amend the Constitution, came under fire from opposition parties today.

They all thought it peculiar that this major piece of legislation, which the PLP government has defended to the hilt, was not referred to once during convention.

"I think it is just being left quietly to expire in a corner or spring to life in some unexpected moment," said Social Democratic Party deputy leader Keith Duncombe.

Free National Movement leader Kendal Isaacs saw the secrecy over the referendum as "the major source of tension and uncertainty in our nation."

While the PLP's secrecy over the referendum is "more than a little peculiar," Mr Duncombe said it was not unexpected.

"I feel they are going to drop it," Mr Duncombe said. "Either that or attempt to marry the referendum with a general election which, in my view, they would do against the advice of the Attorney General (Paul Adderley). As a lawyer I think he must regard that as improper.

"A referendum must not be confused with a general election. A referendum is a separate issue. To put it on the same ballot paper as a general election is wrong," he said.

Mr Isaacs noted that the referendum has been a "troubling and burning issue since it was first raised. The Government went to the trouble to push through a Bill to amend the constitution causing a national debate which went way beyond the usual political boundaries. It involved serious moral considerations which caused Christian church leaders to make some fairly forthright statements.

"Now, after having put the nation through that trauma the governing party avoids even mentioning the referendum. This is typical of their lack of care for the sensibilities of the people they have been elected to govern."

"If they intend to pursue the referendum, they should say so and get it over with instead of leaving it hanging over the heads of the people. If they have decided not to proceed then they should say so. This would remove one of the major sources of tension and uncertainty in our nation."

Prime Minister Lynden Pindling first gave notice of the referendum during the Throne Speech in 1977. The Bill was tabled in the House of Assembly last year and passed with the required two-thirds majority vote.

Although the Prime Minister said the referendum would have been held last year, nothing happened.

What's next on the political scene? the Prime Minister was asked following the PLP's victory in the Rock Sound by-election. "Referendum and election in that order," he replied. "Both will come between now and 1982. Referendum this year; election '82."

PLP chairman Andrew 'Dud' Maynard was questioned about the referendum before the convention. His response was: "I don't know. The referendum at the moment is not something that I am concerning myself with too much. It is strictly a government decision on what happens to the referendum. The party instructed the Government to carry out certain things. So far, the government has been carrying out the wishes of the party as regards amendments to the Constitution as well."

Isaacs on Unemployment

Nassau THE TRIBUNE in English 1 Nov 81 p 1

[Article by Gladstone Thurston: "Isaacs Raps PM Over Jobs Silence"]

[Text]

THE CONVENTION of the ruling Progressive Liberal Party ended without the nation being told of "concrete plans to deal with what is perhaps the biggest problem massive, chronic and spreading unemployment."

"It is this problem of joblessness which contributes to many of the other ills which afflict us, including crime, drug abuse and the generl deterioration of our social order," Free National Movement leader Kendal Isaacs said today.

In an appraisal of the PLP convention, Mr Isaacs noted that predictions about the end of unemployment and dreams of some glorious future, have been heard before.

"The hard fact of the matter is that for the last decade we have had steadily increasing unemployment and the dream of prosperity for all has become a nightmare of poverty for many," Mr Isaacs said.

Recalling Prime Minister Lynden Pindling's promise of full employment by 1980, the Opposition leader said "we have to endure yet another promise of near full employment, this time by the end of 1982 and from Deputy Prime Minister Arthur D Hanna.

"My colleagues and I do not believe we will have to labour hard to convince the Bahamian public that Mr Hanna's promise is just as meaningless and empty as Mr Pindling's; they know it already."

"What Mr Hanna did not say," Mr Isaacs added, "is that he and his Government, through their misguided economic policies, are the ones directly and inescapably responsible for this human misery.

"What he did not say, too, is that he and his Government, through their equally misguided education policy, are the ones responsible for turning out thousands of young people who have no skills with which to earn a decent living. After all, it is they who have been managing the country's affairs for nearly 15 years."

Minister of Labour and Home Affairs Clement Maynard, he said, sought to confuse the public and escape blame by referring to the millions who are unemployed in several European industrial countries.

"What he did not say is that the rates referred to are comparatively recent while our high rate of unemployment has prevailed for a decade during heating and cooling periods in the industrial countries. This, of course is an old PLP excuse which is wearing thin," Mr Isaacs said.

He also pointed out that Mr Maynard neglected to give the percentages of the unemployment rates he referred to since they would have put his comparison in another light entirely.

In early October, Mr Isaacs said, one of the highest rates of unemployment in the industrialised west was in Britain and that was 12.4 per cent. The overall unemployment rate for the 10 European Community countries stood at 8.3 per cent.

"These rates are regarded as near-disaster by the Europeans but they are not yet in the teens," said Mr Isaacs. "In our case unemployment has been in the twenties and heading for thirty and this is a full-fledged disaster."

He implored the nation not to be misled "by the empty rhetoric, tricky arguments and insincere promises of the PLP. Only after the PLP have been removed from power will the real dreams and aspirations of the Bahamian people have a chance of coming true."

ZNS 'Toadying'

Nassau THE TRIBUNE in English 4 Nov 81 p 1

[Text]

SAYING that the radio and television stations do not belong to the PLP, the FNM today blasted ZNS TV and radio reports of the PLP's recent convention for their "toadying" to political bosses.

"Once again the ZNS radio and television have demonstrated that they have become the mere propaganda tools for the PLP," said FNM leader Kendal Isaacs.

"In the past they have refused to give adequate coverage to the national conventions of other political parties," he said. "On one occasion their coverage was limited to a single speech, yet they continue to give the PLP blanket coverage carrying all of their principal speeches."

"The radio and television stations do not belong to the PLP, who happen to be the governing party at this time, but to the people of the Bahamas.

"ZNS radio and TV should report the news on a professional basis and give the Bahamian people a balanced view of political news which they are entitled to have. Their commentaries should also be unbiased and professional, not the kind of toadying the nation was treated to by Messrs Carter, Johnson and Bethel during the recent convention," said Mr Isaacs.

Mr Isaacs said it would appear that the leaders of the PLP do not understand the concept of freedom of the Press. And gave as an example of this the attack on The Tribune by Education Minister Darrell Rolle in connection with the report of children at a government school being served spoilt lunches.

"Mr Rolle did not deny the report. In fact he confirmed it and gave an explanation as to why it happened. He did not seem to understand that it was the newspaper's duty to carry that bit of news, not to discredit the lunch programme, but merely to inform the public and leave them to be the judges."

Mr Isaacs said that Mr Rolle should have thanked the Tribune "since those responsible for the mistake would be more careful in the future."

And he added: "If ZNS was more like the two independent dailies in their coverage of national news, then we would be content and the public would be better served. To cover up the news is a disservice to the nation."

THREE ADDITIONAL CANDIDATES FOR ELECTION NAMED BY FNM

Nassau THE TRIBUNE in English 22 Oct 81 p 1

[Text]

THE FREE National Movement has approved three more candidates to contest the upcoming general elections.

Bringing the number of candidates nominated so far to eleven are James F Wood for Grant's Town, Tennyson R G Wells for Bamboo Town, and Cecil A Richardson for Bain's Town.

Others previously announced by the FNM are leader Kendal Isaacs (Delaporte), chairman Cecil Wallace Whitfield (Pine Ridge), Parliamentary leader J Henry Bostwick (Nicolls Town), Maurice Moore (High Rock), Pierre Dupuch (Shirlea), Edmund Moxey (St Barnabas), George Wilson (St Michael's), and Frank Watson (Carmichael).

Wood, 45, is an outstanding sportsman. He is the manager of Bahamas baseball champs Heineken St Bernard's, and is the manager and sponsor of two Little League and one Pony League teams.

He has played cricket, baseball, basketball and softball. He captained St Bernard's cricket team for the past 15 years and is himself a past president of the Bahamas Cricket Association.

Wood, who was the unsuccessful FNM candidate in St Michael's in 1977, is founder of the St Michael's Community Development Association.

He is a former lecturer at the Soldier Road Campus of the College of the Bahamas on business machine technology. He is owner and operator of Jim Wood Business Machines.

A Roman Catholic by religion, Wood is married to the former Eva Mott. They have eight sons and five daughters.

Wells, a lawyer/businessman, was the FNM's unsuccessful candidate for Clarence Town in 1977 elections. He is a partner in the law firm of Wells, Campbell and Company, and is president and director of several local companies.

An Anglican by religion, Wells is married to the former Stephanie Anne Thompson and they have three children.

Richardson, a teacher by profession, is a member of the Bahamas Union of Teachers' new Force Group which emerged last year. He attended Miami Dade Community College and Florida International University where he majored in music.

STRIKE FORCES TO BE FORMED TO FIGHT CRIME, ILLEGAL ALIENS

Nassau THE TRIBUNE in English 30 Oct 81 pp 1, 12

[Article by Anthony Forbes]

[Text] Labour and Home Affairs Minister Clement Maynard last night announced that the police and immigration departments will set up strike forces to fight crime and illegal aliens.

The Minister told delegates, on the fourth night of the PLP convention, that the immigration strike force, which will number 38 officers, will be coordinated by a top level official and will be established before the end of November.

Mr Maynard said the strike force will uncover the "illegal work forces" wherever they are in the Bahamas, put them and their Bahamian employers speedily before the courts, "and rid this country of them."

He listed those persons who will receive the "full attention and full force of the law" as tradesmen, labourers, live-in-maids and house maids, smugglers of drugs, guns, ammunition and human cargo.

The Minister said that 50 officers from a section of the police force will be trained and equipped as a strike force to be deployed in full strength or in three smaller units according to the nature of the operation in which they might be engaged.

He said joint operations would be undertaken with the Royal Bahamas Defence Force and that certain Family Islands and cays known for drug trafficking will receive particular attention to "disabuse" the general belief that the Bahamas is open territory.

The establishment of the two strike forces were several of the measures the Minister unveiled as part of Government's offensive against crime, unemployment and illegal immigrants.

"Tonight, I am pleased to announce that before the end of November, there will be established in the Immigration Department a strike force of 38 officers coordinated by a top level official whose function will be to uncover the illegal work forces wherever they are in the Bahamas and put them and their Bahamian employers speedily before the courts and rid this country of them," he said.

"With so many thousands of these aliens here, it makes it difficult to secure our frontiers and keep the Bahamas safe and peaceful for our own people," he said. "But this is only one area in which the security of our Bahamas is under siege."

He said the Bahamas appears to be under siege by armed criminal and international drug traffickers. The increase in crime, especially against the person, has a destructive influence on society and poses a threat to tourism, the Bahamas' number one industry, he said.

Referring to the international drug traffic, Mr Maynard said that if domestic crime was the only problem, it could be dealt with, but the fact is that "a cancer is growing in our society which threatens to engulf us."

He said that a significant part of domestic crime seems to be drug-related and participation by Bahamians in drug smuggling is a well-documented fact.

"I can tell you that these misguided brothers and sisters will be dealt with as severely as the foreigners who direct the trafficking. Of course not all of the narcotic passes through the Bahamian conduit. Some of it remains, unfortunately, and some of our young people are being corrupted by drug usage.

"But, even worse, many parents who have knowledge that their children are either using or trafficking drugs, prefer to pretend that nothing is wrong and even cover up the facts," he said.

He also noted that some Bahamians work closely with foreign drug traffickers and crooks feeling that the high pay will make up for the damage to children hooked on drugs whose lives are destroyed, and to the safety and integrity of our national boundaries.

"Beware of Bahamian wolves in sheep's clothing. Even now some of them claim to be PLP's. They have no intention of making an honest living. They undermine our confidence and our credibility by trading in the name of our party and its leaders," Mr Maynard warned.

He said sophisticated weapons are also being introduced through drug-associated sources and today, law-abiding citizens are in danger of their lives and threatened because of the greed of the few.

"This is a grave danger, which requires a concerted community effort, not only police action, but greater guidance from parents and teachers, lodges, friendly societies, service clubs, youth organizations and the leaders of our great party," he said.

He added: "The Government believes that crime has to be tackled and eradicated not so much with an abundance of motor vehicles manpower and equipment, but by the collective public will."

He told delegates that the "New Frontier,"--the theme of the convention--cannot be reached unless crime is eradicated. He said the suppression of crime is not the sole responsibility of the police, but also the duty of every citizen to obey and support the law.

Mr Maynard said Government is aware of the occasional cry of police brutality, but he did not believe that the indiscretion of a few officers should cause the public to ignore its duty to the police, "who are prepared to protect us even with their lives."

He said the Commissioner of Police (Gerald Bertlett) has assured him that every reported case of police brutality is investigated and when wrong doing is found, the officers are speedily dealt with.

The Minister said that if he could have had one personal wish granted, he would have asked that a sense of personal security returned to everybody in the Bahamas, especially to the ladies.

"The pattern of criminal activity has changed radically over the past few years, and the standard methods of police investigation are no longer fruitful when dealing with the incursion of armed foreign criminals who violate Bahamian sovereignty in pursuit of illegal drug trafficking, he said.

He said the police could not be everywhere at the same time, but must be equipped and in a position to strike swiftly at any point in the Bahamas wherever there is a threat to public order.

"Since ordinary police methods are outmoded when dealing with armed criminals who have access to sophisticated electronic equipment, aircraft and fast motor boats, the police force must be trained and equipped to react decisively.

"It is proposed to train and equip a section of the police numbering some 50 men, as a strike force. This unit could be deployed in full strength or in three smaller units according to the nature of the operation in which they might be engaged," Mr Maynard said.

He said the element of surprise, coupled with mobility, would be a deterrent to foreign criminals and then accomplices in the Family Islands and joint operations would be undertaken with the Defence Force.

He said the strike force will also attack the onslaught of violent crime against the person in the Bahamas and starting early in December, the police will clean up Bay Street of drug pushers and other meddlesome loiterers.

BRIEFS

DEFENSE FORCE COMMANDER--A new commander of the Bahamas Defence Force has been named to replace Commodore William Swinley who leaves the Bahamas on December 13 upon completion of a five-year tour of duty here. His replacement, Commodore C.P.R. Belton, is scheduled to arrive on November 28. Commodore Belton will be on loan from the Royal Navy. Commodore Swinley, who holds the rank of Captain in the Royal Navy, has been on loan to the Bahamas Government by the British Government since September 30, 1976, and has the distinction of having been the first Commander of the Royal Bahamas Defence Force. Under his command, "the Defence Force has made considerable strides in curtailing poaching in Bahamian waters by foreign nationals and continues its successful pursuit of drug smugglers with a view to keeping the waters of the Bahamas trouble free," an official news release from Bahamas Information Services said today. BWU LEADER WARNS OF REGIONAL ANTI-UNION MOVEMENT

Bridgetown SUNDAY ADVOCATE-NEWS in English 25 Oct 81 p 1

[Text]

The General Secretary of the Barbados Workers' Union (BWU), Frank Walcott has alerted union members of what he says is a plan afoot in the Caribbean to destroy the trade union movement.

Mr. Walcott told some 200 regional and local trade unionists at the Labour College on Friday evening that there is an element at large in the Caribbean which is pressing for the enactment of legislation in areas such as transport, the hospitals, among others, which they regard as essential services.

"But they don't pass legialation in those services that you, the workers, would not get dismissed," he said.

In a wide-ranging speech, Mr. Walcott cautioned the workers that the enemies of the trade union movement will use every method at their disposal to prevent the workers from using the strike weapon.

"They even use death as a means of preventing you from striking," he said

The BWU General Secretary was addressing a graduation ceremony for some 120 workers at the College between the months of July and October.

Among the workers receiving certificates were 21 students from the Dutch and English-speaking Caribbean who had just completed a one-week training seminar for monitors at the College, sponsored by the Caribbean Congress of Labour (CCC) and the Friedrich Ebert Foundation (FES), of West Germany.

The ceremony was also addressed by Senate Minority Leader, Evelyn Greaves, who is Head of the Labour College, Arp Kressin, the FES Regional Representative, Mr. George DePeana, Adviser to the Suriname Labour College and Mr. Burns Bonadie, Secretary-Treasurer of the CCL.

Addressing his remarks to the course participants, Mr. Walcott cautioned: "Those of you who will have to take on leadership roles will have to alert yourselves to what is going on. The statement, made from time to time by the employers about the trade union getting too strong is only one of the ploys to destroy us".

Mr. Walcott then made out a case for job security as a fundamental right. He argued that workers generally did not own anything, not even their jobs. Only in certain instances, in the public service, for example, were workers granted pensions. But he said that even in the service, workers could lose their pensions.

Mr. Walcott concluded by telling the workers that the trade union movement was entering "a crucial period" in its development. But he told them not to be too concerned because "when things are too easy you feel you don't have a challenge. If you are going to learn you have to have hard lessons."

ILLEGAL IMMIGRATION OF INDIANS, OTHERS POSING PROBLEMS

Tightened Regulations

Bridgetown SUNDAY SUN in English 8 Nov 81 p 3

[Text] BARBADOS may move through diplomatic channels in further attempts to check illegal Indian immigration in this country.

It was not clear up to yesterday, what form the diplomatic moves will take, but sources said the matter has been referred to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, which is expected to despatch a message to the Indian Government on the Indian immigration problem here.

Sources said the existing problem was a delicate one, and that Barbados had to tread carefully to avoid cutting off New Delhi support on foreign matters.

In recent months, the Barbados Government has been tightening up on measures to curb the inflow of Indians and Pakistanis, who have been going through other than conventional channels to gain residence and citizenship here.

Government had relaxed a monitoring scheme it had introduced two years ago, after it was thought that the immigration problem was under control. But then a new racket was exposed, in which it was suspected that Indians were being smeaked into Barbados at $4 000 a head. Some Indians were also found with passports, identifying them as residents of Barbados as far back as 1972, when the stamp identifying them as such was not in use before 1975.

One Indian was deported last month, when he tried to gain citizenship under his grandfather's name, after failing to win permanent residence, using his own name.

It is known that the Minister of State, Obrien Trotman, and the Chief Immigration Officer, Kenrick Hutson, held talks on the matter two Sundays ago, to agree on a formula for stricter measures against the illegal entries.

Only the chief immigration officer can now authorise Indians to enter Barbados.

Before then, Indians were granted permission to stay on the island for two or three days, when they entered at the Airport here. They were required to report at the Immigration Department in Bridgetown for and extension of the time initially granted.

But few adhered to such requirement. The records show that more than 160 have entered Barbados since January, this year, have not left the island, but have been untraced at the given addresses.

Official Advisory Committee

Bridgetown SUNDAY SUN in English 8 Nov 81 p 3

[Text] MINISTER of State, Obrien Trotman, will on Wednesday morning, officially launch this country's first Immigration Advisory Committee, and advise on the guidelines to be followed for the issue of permits for non-nationals to work in this country.

The committee comprises representatives of the Barbados Chamber of Commerce, the Employers' Confederation, the Hotel Association, the Barbados Workers' Union, and the Ministries of Education, Health and Labour.

The Chief Immigration Officer will function as advisor to the committee.

One objective is to determine manpower requirements while another is to decide what category of persons would be granted work permits.

Wednesday's meeting will be held at the conference room of Government headquarters on Bay Street.

ADAMS CONGRATULATIONS TO CHAMBERS HOPES FOR CLOSER TIES

Bridgetown THE NATION in English 11 Nov 81 p 1

[Text]

PRIME Minister Tom Adams of Barbados, is looking forward to continuous close and cooperative relations between Barbados and Trinidad and Tobago.

Adams' comments came in a congratulatory message he sent to his Trinidadian counterpart George Chambers on the outcome of Monday's general election.

Chambers' incumbent People's National Movement (PNM) swept the polls, capturing 26 of the 36 seats which were at stake in the 36 member House of Representatives.

Adams said: "The government and people of Barbados join me in extending sincere congratulations to you and your party on your resounding election victory.

"We look forward to the continuation of the close and cooperative relations which existed between our countries.

"We hope that our joint effort will further ensure the economic and social progress of all the peoples of the Caribbean region."

Foreign Affairs Minister Louis Tull, in commenting on the results, said that he hoped Barbados and Trinidad could work together for the better of the entire Caribbean.

Also commenting was president of the Democratic Labour Party, Branford Taitt. He said that the PNM's victory was not surprising to the keener students of politics.

"The enormity of problems of Trinidad and Tobago cannot be gainsaid, but at the same time, a large number of people of Trinidad and Tobago obviously feel that those from the ranks of the grassroots ought to be given a chance to prove themselves."

Taitt said the highly organised constituency branches and the motivation of the party faithful created a situation where it would take a lot more than the mere ambition of a particular group to remove the PNM from office.

The Opposition MP said that people of developing countries will not knowingly support leadership which does not identify with them.

"It will be an interesting time in

TIES WITH ST VINCENT--The Barbados Agricultural Society (BAS), has entered a cooperative with Venture the Georgetown area Farmers in St Vincent. Mr Haynesley Benn, General Manager of the BAS, has said that the venture has been in operation for a number of months. He explained that the farming group had only recently started, and that they were experiencing some "teething problems." As a result, the BAS has agreed to assist them in whatever way possible. At present, this help comes in the form of marketing services. The Vincentian farmers sent fruits to Barbados every week, and the BAS undertakes to sell the produce for them in Barbados. Last Tuesday some 50 boxes of agricultural produce were received by the BAS from the Georgetown farmers. The produce included oranges, grapefruits, plantains and anyas. They came in on the M-V Leonard T which runs a weekly service between St Vincent and Barbados. [Text] [Bridgetown SUNDAY ADVOCATE-NEWS in English 25 Oct 81 p 2]

ATTACK ON HOTEL--Police in Barbados have launched an island-wide manhunt for four men who carried out an armed attack on a south coast hotel last Friday night. The four assailants are alleged to have broken and entered San Lords Hotel, St Philip, and in the process at least one gunshot was heard. Police said no one was injured, but added that the attackers got away with more than $2 000 in cash and property. Reports further stated that it was the third consecutive night that gunshots were heard at the hotel, but this was not confirmed by the Police. A senior Police official said that the incident last Friday night was being viewed very seriously, especially since it was the first of its kind in a long time. The official said that investigations into the incident were being vigorously pursued. [Text] [Bridgetown ADVOCATE-NEWS in English 3 Nov 81 p 1]

MESSAGE TO DOMINICA--Prime Minister Mr Tom Adams has sent a congratulatory message to Prime Minister, Miss Eugenia Charles of Dominica on the third anniversary of that island's independence. The message read: "I wish to extend the warm wishes and sincere greetings of the Government and People of Barbados to the Government and People of the Commonwealth of Dominica on the anniversary of your Independence Day. I hope that our two countries will continue to work together closely in an effort to ensure the economic and social progress not only of our peoples, but of all the peoples of the region. IMMIGRATION CRACKDOWN--In the 10-month period, January to October this year, Immigration authorities in Barbados have deported 122 people and asked another 392 to leave the island. According to the Minister responsible for Immigration, Senator O'Brien Trotman, in both cases, Vincentians topped the lists followed by St Lucians and Guyanese. He told the first meeting of the Immigration Advisory Committee yesterday that the crackdown on illegal immigrants was conducted in accordance with Government's immigration policy and not "on any discretion exercised as a result of personal contact or personal likes or dislikes. There is no discrimination in any form," he said. "Equal treatment for potential immigrants is germane to Barbados' immigration laws." However, Senator Trotman added, immigration authorities have recently been faced with a new form of illegal immigration--that of persons trying to settle in Barbados on faked work permits. TEXT OF GOVERNOR POSNETT'S THRONE SPEECH TO PARLIAMENT

Hamilton THE ROYAL GAZETTE in English 7 Nov 81 p 5

[Text] Mr. President and Members of The Senate:
Mr. Speaker and Members of the Hon. House of Assembly:

The past year has proved to be a challenging one; however through hard work and good fortune, Bermuda is now well placed to face the future with confidence.

Following real growth in the economy, and a record number of tourists arriving in 1980, Bermuda and Bermudians are now obliged to cope with a recession in the United States, keener regional and international competition for the tourist dollar, and the effects of a debilitating industrial dispute earlier this year. There is every indication that Bermuda's economic growth in the coming year will be modest.

On the positive side, Government notes that over the past twelve months the rate of local inflation has fallen considerably, unemployment is virtually non-existent and despite a decline in regular visitors, the outlook for tourism, especially when compared with resorts elsewhere, can be considered reasonable, while international business continues to play a growing role in our economy.

Bermuda's strong, stable society, a result of enlightened government and hard work by generations of Bermudians, will unquestionably ensure that the high standard of living which we enjoy will be maintained and improved, and that the quality of life in general will be enriched.

In view of the critical importance of housing, particularly to those in the lower income bracket, every effort is being made to meet this need.

With housing as our top priority, Government will commence, with all possible speed, the construction of 100 housing units at a cost of $6 million, which will be sold or made available at reasonable rents, ranging from $375 for a one-bedroom unit. This step will necessitate the deferment of some capital projects in the current year and more in the coming financial year.

In other areas of Government's housing programme, 36 new apartments at "Devon Springs" in Devonshire are nearing completion and another 84 units are under construction in Southampton. In The Glebe Lands in Pembroke, 16 new units have been built, 21 have been renovated, and 10 are under construction. In the General Improvement Areas in Pembroke, 11 new units have been built, 2 have been renovated, and work is about to start on 10 other units.

Government is also having discussions with the Canadian Government regarding the possible construction by them of 60 housing units for Canadian Forces personnel at a site yet to be chosen at the west end.

As a consequence of this activity, Government alone will have constructed 300 units over the next 24 months.

Government will assist with the financing required to complete unfinished domestic dwelling construction and to rehabilitate dwellings that are now uninhabitable. This step will provide many new homes, particularly at the lower end of the rental scale.

Negotiations are taking place with representatives of the international companies in Bermuda and with the non-resident insurance undertakings in the expectation that substantial investment in The Bermuda Housing Corporation's projects will result.

Government is investigating the possibility of encouraging a wider private sector mortgage base for home ownership by providing some form of mortgage guarantee to lenders so that they can loan a larger proportion of the value of a house, thus reducing the down payment and assisting more persons to become home owners.

In addition to the provision of land and of design services for the construction of a residence for the handicapped in Smith's Parish, Government will provide similar assistance to the Bermuda Housing Trust to allow for the construction of housing in St. George's specially designed for the elderly.

Drawings for Lefroy House should go to tender by month's end for the construction of a 30-bed extension and the conversion of part of the residence into accommodation for senior citizens who are reasonably self sufficient.

Fees paid to foster parents for the care of children placed with them have been increased and are to be reviewed each year. It is hoped that this will encourage more Bermudians to consider providing this very important service.

During the current school year, a programme will be introduced which is aimed at discouraging young people from abusing drugs and assisting teachers to deal with the subject.

To assist in combatting the drug problem, the Methadone Clinic at St. Brendan's will be strengthened so that present staffing difficulties are overcome.

Government will be asking the Legislature to consider several Environmental Conservation Area Local Plans, the prime objective of which will be to preserve the Island's natural features for the benefit of future generations.

A new Hamilton Development Plan will also be published and laid before the Legislature.

A White Paper will be presented outlining legislation designed to control air pollution and noise pollution.

A comprehensive survey of Bermuda's arable land is being undertaken, the results of which will form the basis of an Arable Land Local Plan to provide better protection of this valuable national resource. A thorough survey of Bermuda's agricultural industry will be completed by year's end and will identify options for the future of the industry for the remainder of this century.

Plans for the construction of national sports facilities in Prospect are now being discussed and Government intends to engage the services of specialist architects to assist in devising and costing final plans. Government will introduce its Sport Award Scheme next spring to recognise the contributions to sport in Bermuda by current and past athletes, coaches and administrators.

Educational authorities note that tremendous improvement has been achieved in reading, language and mathematics by students at all levels of both our primary and secondary schools and it is anticipated that this trend will continue.

The annual Manpower Survey has been completed and Government intends presenting the Report to the Legislature early in the current Session. Legislation governing industrial health and safety matters is now being drafted and will be presented to Parliament after full consultation with interested parties.

Experience earlier this year demonstrated that there is not broad acceptance of much of our current labour legislation. As carefully as our labour legislation was drawn, Government feels that constructive amendments must be considered after the broadest possible consultation among all affected parties. More importantly, Government is committed to fostering a broad consensus which will provide harmonious industrial relations in order to avoid the adverse economic consequences which flow from industrial unrest and place in jeopardy the well-being of all Bermudians.

Legislation will be introduced to deal with the all-important issue of domestic violence which Government considers to be a very serious social problem.

A Green Paper focusing on various aspects of Bermuda's road traffic will be placed before Parliament for consideration in the current Session.

A study has been commissioned to examine the feasibility of an expansion of the ferry services as a means of providing comfortable and convenient access to Hamilton from the western parishes, and in the anticipation that it would relieve both congestion on the roads and parking in the City.

While we have been successful in resolving the latest incident involving Vietnamese refugees picked up by the Nedlloyd Crystal, the future of the Bermuda Shipping Registry remains under active review.

As a further protection against marine pollution, Bermuda will, at the same time as the United Kingdom, extend its territorial waters from the present three nautical miles to twelve nautical miles.

Efforts to bolster tourism will continue in the face of economic problems being experienced in Bermuda's major tourism markets.

Next spring, Bermuda will welcome the new Home Lines cruise ship, the Atlantic, specially built for the New York/Bermuda run. With a passenger capacity of 1,100, the new ship will replace the Doric.

Earlier this year, a new sales office was opened in Atlanta, and the start of daily air service by Air Florida from White Plains, New York is expected to generate additional business from the Westchester market area and, perhaps, from the mid-western United States.

Air Florida is also on record as being committed to the inauguration of a route between Bermuda and Europe commencing in March.

The major ramp reconstruction at the Civil Air Terminal has been completed. This is the first phase of improvements recommended by the International Air Transport Association Committee representing the airlines serving Bermuda. They have recently revised and recosted plans designed to meet demands of the foreseeable future, and to provide an improved, convenient, and efficient air terminal in keeping with Bermuda's image as a first class resort. Proposals and plans to finance them will shortly be placed before the Legislature for consideration.

The Retail Price Index continues to be the principal gauge of local inflation, and a survey of family expenditures will be conducted to ensure its continued relevance. Research will also continue to identify expenditure on items which form an essential part of the actual cost of living.

Following the passage of The Companies Act 1981, work is currently underway on the Regulations to the Act to be introduced in this Session which will enable this important Act to be brought into effect.

A Bill relating to the cost of credit has been prepared with the aim of assisting the local consumer. The Legislature will also be invited to consider amendments to The Deposit Companies Act which is designed to protect depositors.

Mr. Speaker and Members of the Hon. House of Assembly:

The estimates of revenue and expenditure for the next financial year will be laid before you.

Mr. President and Members of The Senate:

Mr. Speaker and Members of the Hon. House of Assembly:

You will be invited in the coming year to consider legislation which will include the following:

Legislation to prevent the air pollution of our environment:

A Bill to replace The Education Act 1954;

A Cost of Credit (Disclosure) Bill;

Amendments to The Stamp Duties Act; and

A Bill to modernise the practice of conveyancing.

The Police Advisory Board continues to provide valuable assistance. As a result of its recommendation, the Police Cadet Training School recently moved into the building hitherto used as a part of the Victor Scott School. This move will facilitate the expansion of the Cadet Scheme which is expected to contribute increasingly to the Bermudianisation of the Service. Police relations with the community have continued to improve.

The Bermuda Regiment has grown rapidly both in size and in public esteem during the past few years. Most of the recommendations made in 1978 by the Gilbert Committee have now been implemented and a further review of the position was therefore timely. We were fortunate that General Gilbert himself and most members of the earlier Committee were available for this purpose. Their recent Report should point the way for the next few years.

As this is the first occasion that I have had to address Parliament in Bermuda, I should like to take this opportunity to say that my wife and I were most grateful for the warm welcome with which we were received in Bermuda earlier in the year. I look forward to continuing close and cordial cooperation with Parliament and the different arms of the Government within the framework of the Constitution.

Mr. President and Members of The Senate:

Mr. Speaker and Members of the Hon. House of Assembly:

I now declare this Session open and may God guide you in your deliberations.

OPPOSITION PLP ASSAILS GOVERNMENT POLICY ON JOB OPENINGS

Hamilton THE ROYAL GAZETTE in English 26 Oct 81 pp 1, 5

[Text]

The P.L.P. has given short shrift to statements made by the Hon. John Swan, Minister of Home Affairs, regarding a shortage of Bermudians to fill local jobs.

In a press release delivered over the weekend, Mr. Eugene Cox, Shadow Secretary for Home Affairs, said it "is a mess of their own making."

Mr. Swan said on Thursday that Government's policy on Bermudianisation might have to change because of a drop in the number of school-leavers entering the work force. Mr. Cox says poppycock to all that.

"The Home Affairs Minister attempts to beguile the public by his failure to admit that the present dilemma is caused by Government's incapacity to promote orderly economic growth," he said.

The Minister said last week that some job categories currently closed to non-Bermudians may be opened. These include labourers, carpenters, engineers, clerks and architects.

"The Honourable Minister behaves as if he is unaware that the present state of our country is a direct result of his Government's policies," Mr. Cox added.

As a consequence, he said, "he seeks to camouflage Government's dilemma by luring the people of Bermuda into believing that we are tending toward a unique dilemma of zero population growth, low unemployment and a rapidly-expanding job market as if it were inevitable, and not a direct result of a deliberately-prescribed policy of his Government."

Mr. Swan said Thursday, "The decline in Bermuda's birthrate and the increasing difficulty in attracting young Bermudians into skilled trades and apprenticeships had long term implications for future manpower planners."

Census 1980 figures show that while the population expanded by 10,000 during the 1960's there was slow growth — only about 1,700 — during the seventies. The 1970s witnessed a net out-migration of several thousands.

But Mr. Cox says these events are not an inevitable outcome of the natural order but rather the result of the political order.

"Three facets of United Bermuda Party policy have been:

- "The adoption of an existing policy to limit the natural birth rate, while rapidly expanding the economy;
- "The Government's failure to set up an effective training programme, and;
- "Its failure to build adequate housing for the low income group."

Mr. Swan takes the view that factors such as sharply-rising expectations and the continuing and growing importance of international businesses to Bermuda's economy and well-being, cause Bermudians to opt for expanded opportunities in white collar areas.

He says Bermuda appears to be caught in a dilemma in that the Island is approaching a goal sought by many countries — zero population growth — which, coupled with zero unemployment and an expanding job market, makes Bermuda's dilemma unique.

But Mr. Cox retorts: "The Hon. Minister will recall a well orchestrated plan to limit the natural births by the provision of contraceptive devices in the local supermarkets."

Mr. Cox adds: "He must also recall the attempts of the U.B.P. Government to win votes in St. George's by developing the unsuccessful Holiday Inn Hotel, and the consummation of a deal with Mr. Ludwig to build the Southampton Princess Hotel, which resulted in an overtaxing of the labour force and an overheated economy that allowed the Government an excuse to avoid implementing an essential housing programme."

But Mr. Swan does not see his policy as a retrograde step at all. He says: "For the most part, the country's need for non-Bermudian workers could be seen as creating a pool of jobs for future Bermudians."

Mr. Cox replies: "This short-sighted policy provided foreign nationals with jobs and housing, thereby tacitly calling upon Bermudians to subsidise foreign nationals.

Mr. Cox sees Government's policy as influenced by lobbies external to elected representation, "not unlike the recent appointment of a certain doctor in St. George's and the appointment of a senior magistrate."

Mr. Cox says Mr. Swan has himself been directly involved in the decision-making process, as can be seen with the diversification of the local economy through exempt company business.

"Let me hasten to add that diversification is usually good for any economy, but to promote unbridled economic expansion without first defining the manpower needs, and to fail to provide locals with adequate training opportunities prior to the establishment of new job markets, and to infer that the size of the country is the sole reason for the limited workforce is tantamount to dishonesty, to say the least, and incompetent at best."

TRADE MISSION FROM AZORES DEPARTS WITH FEW RESULTS

Hamilton THE ROYAL GAZETTE in English 12 Nov 81 p 17

[Text]

THE visiting trade party from the Azores will fly home this weekend, a good deal wiser than when they arrived here last Sunday, but with little order book evidence of their trip.

Though the party's leader, Mr. Jaime Cabral, of the Azores' Department of Commerce and Industry, was quick to point out that the mission's main aim was to establish trade contacts with the Island's business community, the party was clearly hoping that its sales efforts would also achieve some on-the-spot success.

Said Mr. Cabral: "In terms of orders we have been reasonably successful. One firm contract has been signed with the Irish Linen Shop which is to be the exclusive agency for embroidery goods made in the Azores. But we were not just looking for sales in Bermuda."

Perhaps the only obstacle to trade with the Azores is the problem of transportation — a problem with which Mr. Cabral is very familiar. He said: "We know we will have to overcome this but it's a matter of building up trade to the point where shipping costs become reasonable. Air freight is far too expensive and would mean high selling prices. But there is a chance that our Government may consider subsidising exports. This is something we will have to go into."

The Azores' primary export is fish and fish products which make up about 30 percent of annual exports totalling almost $12 million. The U.S. and Canada are the country's principal trading partners accounting for 45 percent of overseas sales.

Figures for Bermuda are paltry by comparison. Last year, we imported $5,535-worth of goods made in the Azores -- and that is considerably more than the value of earlier imports. Though Mr. Cabral revealed that a Portuguese shipping line is interested in starting up a monthly service to Bermuda, trade has got some way to go before such a project would prove viable.

TEACHERS VOTE TO STRIKE; MORE THAN WAGES SAID AT ISSUE

Hamilton THE ROYAL GAZETTE in English 3 Nov 81 pp 1, 5

[Text] Bermuda's teachers voted overwhelmingly to strike on November 24 if wages settlement is not reached by that date. Nearly 400 of the 660 teachers in the Government school system took a show of hands vote at a meeting held yesterday at the Ruth Seaton James Auditorium. But the teachers have rejected an all-out strike in favour of a one day general strike, to be followed by a series of rotating strikes.

Membership in the Amalgamated Bermuda Union of Teachers is believed to stand at approximately 660.

Last night union officials were mum on the results of the vote.

Ms Ellen Kate Horton, head of the A.B.U.T. negotiating team, would not comment. Sources say, however, that the tight-lips policy has been taken to give the union time to inform Government of its plans as a courtesy.

It will hand Government negotiators the required 21-day strike notice in writing today.

At last report, Government had offered pay increases ranging from 16 to 20 percent, depending upon experience, with an average of 18 percent.

The teachers, who have reached agreement with Government on a 12 percent increase in the second year, are said to be holding out for 24 percent.

Source insist, however, that pay is no longer the issue. "It's not only the money," said one teacher, who did not want to be named. "We're looking towards the future of the union."

Settlement would have been reached by this time, the source explained, if the other issues had been resolved. The union wants government to give its full-time negotiator unpaid leave of absence from his classroom duties.

Government, it is believed has agreed to that, but has not promised that the negotiator will return to the same job. Seniority would not be lost.

The union believes that the post of negotiator has become so demanding that it requires someone in the job full-time.

The union also wants an increase in paid maternity leave from nine to 12 weeks. Currently, teachers must leave the classroom when they are six months pregnant. By the time the child is born, one source said, the paid maternity leave has been used up.

A major issue appears to be the five percent differential that separates each pay level. There are 22 categories in the current pay scale, depending on qualifications and experience. Each category is paid five percent less than the one immediately above.

The union wants to change the differential to 4.5 percent, while Government has offered 4.75 percent.

With the A.B.U.T.'s proposed differential, those teachers at the bottom of the pay scale stand to gain a higher percentage increase.

The union believes that what they consider to be low pay for new teachers is causing them to leave the profession.

Last year, 16 teachers resigned to take up other careers.

The chief of state has sent several notes to the comptroller general, Gen Antonio Rojas. The note dealing with the La Gaiba affair states that "in response to your suggestions I wish to point out that it would be impossible to issue a supreme decree punishing those responsible for the illegal exploitation of semiprecious stones. It would have no legal basis, because any such punishments must be decided upon by the courts." It adds: "Therefore, in addition to the appropriate audit which you will have to make of the debit memorandums, today you will submit all information available to you to the office of the public prosecutor to provide basis for the trial." FOREIGN MINISTER ON COUNTRY'S PROBLEMS--Castries, 4 Dec (AFP)--In a speech before the OAS General Assembly here today, Bolivian Foreign Minister Gonzalo Romero said that Bolivia "is experiencing a period of transition to democratic institutionalization." "The government of President Torrelio Villa daily demonstrates its respect for the rights and dignity of human beings," he added, noting that "in my country, the national government, which is a union of the armed forces and the people, is involved in an internal battle to overcome the factors that stem from dependency and to give way to development." At the end of his speech he discussed the country's land-locked problem when he said: "We must refer to our already century-old problem of our forced geographical confinement. The solution of this problem has been postponed up until now within a delaying bilateralism [dilatorio bilateralismo] which, far from representing a means of positive negotiations for my country, has resulted in frustrations when not in unilateral arbitrary actions. According to the foreign minister, Bolivia's land-locked problem "could disrupt peace and harmony in the continent," if it is not solved. "Bolivia will enter into bilateral talks (with Chile) when an honest political will that recognizes our right and makes possible a fruitful dialogue is declared and demonstrated," he noted. The OAS Assembly will study, among other things, a report on the human rights situation in Bolivia. [Text] [PA061417 Paris AFP in Spanish 2329 GMT 4 Dec 81]

SARAIVA WARNS ABOUT INSTABILITY IN CENTRAL AMERICA

PY021643 Buenos Aires LATIN in Spanish 1644 GMT 25 Nov 81

[Text] Brasilia, 25 Nov (LATIN-REUTER)--Brazilian Foreign Minister Ramiro Saraiva Guerreiro has warned that the situation of instability affecting Central America can create serious international tension.

Saraiva Guerreiro talked to reporters last night before leaving for Great Britain today. From Great Britain he will go to Saint Lucia to attend the OAS General Assembly.

According to local diplomatic sources, the Central American crisis--not included on the OAS agenda--will probably be the main subject for discussion by the foreign ministers of the hemisphere.

Saraiva Guerreiro believes that the Central America situation is characterized by a phase of instability with considerable risks which could create serious tension at the international level.

This is a problem emerging from structural and political factors, said Saraiva when asked about U.S. Secretary of State Alexander Haig's charges of the Cubanization of Central America.

The Brazilian foreign minister said he is not familiar with the text of a draft resolution submitted to the United Nations prohibiting the sale of arms to El Salvador.

When he explained that supplying arms with subversive purpose is a violation of the international law, he said: We believe in the rule that a sovereign state has the right to purchase and receive arms from any country.

He added: If Nicaragua wants to purchase arms from Cuba, it has the right to do so whether this is politically advisable or not is another question.

He reiterated that the Brazilian position regarding El Salvador in any case, advocates the idea that this country find a moderate, democratic and pluralist solution to its internal problems without foreign intervention of any nature.

Asked about the Argentine political situation and its affect on bilateral relations, he said that these relations will not be affected by occasional changes in the internal affairs of that country.

He added: Our relations are based on balance of interests above internal situations or changes.

He said: All I know is that President Roberto Viola is on leave and that the interior minister has temporarily become interim president.

Saraiva Guerreiro will leave this capital today to start an official visit to Great Britain tomorrow, a visit labeled as political and aimed at evaluating bilateral relations.

UK MAINTAINS PROTECTIONIST MEASURES

PY040228 Sao Paulo FOLHA DE SAO PAULO in Portuguese 2 Dec 81 p 5

[Article by special envoy Flavio de Almeida Salles]

[Text] London--The British were inflexible yesterday maintaining their protectionist positions toward Brazilian textile products. And thus, in his talks with Secretary of State for Trade John Biffen, Foreign Minister Saraiva Guerreiro did not get any promise of liberalisation from Great Britain on this matter for the forthcoming meeting of the EEC Council of Ministers to be held on 6 December. In 1980, Brazil exported $360 million worth of textile products to the European market, and the EEC now wants for these exports to be "frozen" at the current levels.

The talk with Biffen and the meeting with Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher in the morning marked the end of the Brazilian foreign minister's visit to London. From Thatcher Saraiva Guerreiro received an unusual request: to explain how the Brazilian Government is succeeding in curbing inflation. And the diplomats who accompanied the minister at the meeting declined, later, to reveal the minister's answer.

Also on the final day in London, the foreign minister granted a press conference to approximately 20 British journalists and Brazilian correspondents to tell them that Brazil has no intention of purchasing nuclear submarines from Great Britain.

This morning the foreign minister will sign the nuclear cooperation agreement with Great Britain and will then leave for the island of Saint Lucia to participate in the OAS General Assembly.

Under the inspiration of Great Britain and France, a real "protectionist fever" began in Europe 2 years ago against products manufactured by Brazil, especially textiles and shoes, and also sugar.

It was established at that time that the increase of these imports would be limited to 6 percent yearly. Then, in 1980, the European market restricted the imports even more, and established that specific circumstances of crisis among the EEC member countries could lead to exceptions and to limiting imports even more.

Now, according to Brazilian diplomats, "they want these exceptions to become law and try to freeze Brazilian exports at the current levels, product by product, and country by country in the EEC."

The first instructions of the EEC Council of Ministers on the renewal of the multifiber agreement, which terminates on 31 December, were "hard and protectionist, anticipating the freezing of imports of textiles at the current levels" according to diplomatic sources.

But according to Saraiva Guerreiro, Biffen has not given "any hope that the British would give up their position in the multifiber negotiations."

Biffen told Saraiva Guerreiro that Great Britain is experiencing a moment of economic and social crisis and that he cannot allow competition considered unfavorable for the British industries. This is the reason for the "hard" position in the discussion of the agreement.

Saraiva Guerreiro feels that the British Government needs to study the problem in a global manner, taking into account that Brazil is an "excellent market for textile machines manufactured in Great Britain, without mentioning that, in specific packages, the British are doing excellent business with Brazil," according to diplomatic sources. And now--it was learned--the Brazilian Government must instruct its embassies in the FRG, the Netherlands and in Denmark--countries with more flexible positions regarding multifibers and within the EEC--to explain the positions and needs of Brazil.

The nuclear cooperation agreement that will be signed this morning by Brazil and Great Britain must safeguard the positions of each country toward the nuclear nonproliferation treaty, and its implementation will be subject to the safeguards of the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA).

The agreement provides for, among other items, cooperation in the management of intermediate and low-level radioactive waste, and of the reactor instruments.

NEWSPAPER REVIEWS KIRKPATRICK'S HUMAN RIGHTS POLICY

PY020229 Sao Paulo O ESTADO DE SAO PAULO in Portuguese 28 Nov 81 p 3

[Article from the "Notes and Information" page: "Perversion of Political Values"]

[Text] "Perversio optimi pessima," the old Latin saying reads. The worst perversion is perversion of the good. In addition, abuse of the highest ideals is the most detestable abuse.

Jeane Kirkpatrick, head of the U.S. delegation to the United Nations, has regretted the fact that the human rights issue has been "perverted by politicization." The practice adopted by persons and governments that "try to use human rights more as a political weapon than as a banner or goal" is indeed abominable. Kirkpatrick also criticized the United Nations for treating the human rights issue in a manner "very similar to the violence of selling protection" practiced by hoodlums. Within this line of thinking one can say that cynicism is abominable when the worst and most sophisticated violators of human rights--that have raised that practice to the dignity of "reason of state"--go as far as accusing others of committing that crime.

The idea or the policy of blocs does not make violation of human rights become a virtue in one case and a crime in another. What Miss Kirkpatrick means is that representatives of totalitarian governments like Hungary and the GDR, which are members of the world of Gulag concentration camps, have no right to accuse Latin American countries of violating human rights, because the Latin American countries are authoritarian or dictatorial, but not totalitarian. The U.S. ambassador regretted the fact that UN commissions had kept quiet when 3 million Cambodians were murdered by the Pot Pot regime, supported by Vietnam, and when Idi Amin Dada committed his most detestable crimes, and that they closed their eyes to the abominable abuses of Soviet psychiatric hospitals.

Obviously the Reagan administration is trying to correct the errors committed by the Carter administration, which in its human rights policy implemented a mistaken discrimination. It was severe and ruthless with abuses of our allies who were weak, and discreet regarding the systematic violations of our powerful friends and foes. And by the way, Ambassador Kirkpatrick is the author of the distinction between totalitarianism and authoritarianism, endorsed by the Reagan administration. In a press conference held before the trilateral commission in April 1981, Secretary of State Alexander Haig stated: "The United States is opposed to violation of human rights by either allies or foes, friends or enemies. We will not adopt a selective policy." But he recognized that discrimination can exist "as far as the source of violation is concerned" and regarding the possible impact of any protest.

The totalitarian model makes use of modern technology to impose its will concerning all aspects of the citizen's behavior. The totalitarian regimes have a myth (a creed or ideology) and demand total submission of the citizens to values they consider absolute. This is the reason for the inquisitorial intolerance of the totalitarian model which results in genocide, political purges and in concentration camps, or provokes the exodus of its citizens, whether inhabitants of the so-called popular democracies, or from Cuba, from Vietnam, or more recently from Afghanistan. The authoritarian regimes normally originate from the lack of political and economic development, from the fact that for this reason democracy has not struck deep-seated roots in their societies, roots that would be resistant to social, economic and political crises. The authoritarian regimes advocate supreme and unquestioned authority for those in power. But they do not want to possess the souls of their citizens and control all the manifestations of their lives. They demand unquestioned authority only in the political field. What distinguishes totalitarian regimes from the authoritarian ones is that the former are durable; they are not destroyed by the force of internal opposition; as Hitler's case shows, they fall only by the force of a lost war. The authoritarian regimes, regardless of how repugnant they may be, are of a transitory and unnatural nature. The civilian society, when strong and organized, can defeat them either democratically or through a revolution. They are, therefore, more susceptible to a change than the totalitarian regimes.

What Kirkpatrick means is that it is a "political perversion" when a totalitarian regime--considering itself a defender of human rights for belonging to the bloc of "freedom and peace"--condemns authoritarian regimes for crimes similar to what it commits. Worse yet is to condemn and receive plaudits for doing go.

'KIDNAPPED' CZECHOSLOVAKS CHOOSE TO RETURN HOME

PY020206 Paris AFP in Spanish 2300 GMT 1 Dec 81

[Text] Brasilia, 1 Dec (AFP)--It has been reported that the three Czechoslovaks who were prevented from leaving Brazil by the Brazilian police today after a denunciation that the Czechoslovak vice consul in Sao Paulo had forced them to return to their country, have expressed their free desire to return to their fatherland.

Romeu Tuma, chief of the Sao Paulo Department of Political and Social Order [DOPS], explained that Stanislav Kropachova has conveyed to DOPS his desire to leave Brazil because his visa for being away from Czechoslovakia was about to expire.

Both his wife Antonia and his son Karel have confirmed that desire, although the woman has apparently expressed privately that for sentimental reasons she would have liked to have remained with her mother, Maria Beloch, who was born in Czechoslovakia but naturalized in Brazil.

It was Maria Beloch who denounced Czechoslovak Vice Consul Ludvik Nemec for kidnapping the three members of her family so as to force them to return to their country.

Asked whether the three Czechoslovaks have expressed to the policy their real desire, Tuma answered: "It is not possible to fathom the soul of the people. I base myself on their testimony."

Tuma added that the questioning was carried out through an independent and impartial interpreter, a resident of Sao Paulo. Some Czechoslovak diplomats who were present at the DOPS office at the beginning of the interrogation were invited to leave to guarantee the free expression of the three persons.

The three members of this family will leave tonight for their country aboard the Czechoslovak ship Praha, anchored in the port of Santos near Sao Paulo. The police had delayed the departure of the ship until the events were cleared up.

A Brazilian police officer who had jumped aboard the Praha to retrieve the three Czechoslovaks stated that he was received cordially and that the captain assured him the ship would not leave unless the situation of his passengers were completely cleared up.

BOAT DESTROYED IN VITORIA--A passenger boat that provides daily services at the Vitoria Bay was practically destroyed today by a bomb. The explosion took place at 0230 at the boat station in the capital of Espirito Santo State. Only a watchman and a mechanic--who escaped unharmed--were at the station when the bomb exploded. In addition to the bomb that went off, the police found another bomb in the vicinity of the office of the president of the Municipal Assembly. In the face of this atmosphere, Governor Eurico Rezende sent telegrams to the ministers of justice, army and navy requesting operational and technical support for the investigations. Rezende also contacted Gen Otavio Medeiros, chief of the National Intelligence Service, who promised to send a team to Vitoria tomorrow to investigate the attack, the second this year in Vitoria. The first one took place approximately 3 months ago at the newspaper A TRIBUNA. [Text] [PY041301 Sao Paulo Radio Bandeirantes Network in Portuguese 0230 GMT 4 Dec 81]

FLOODS IN RIO DE JANEIRO--Rio de Janeiro, 4 Dec (AFP)--The Civil Defense Department has reported that 70 persons died, 300 were hurt and 2,000 were left homeless due to the floods and mud slides created by the torrential rains that have been falling uninterruptedly on the state of Rio de Janeiro since last Wednesday. 1981 AIRCRAFT EXPORTS--Sao Jose dos Campos (DAILY POST)--Despite economic hard times, especially internal sales efforts, Brazil's prime aviation manufacturer, Embraer, expects to export by the end of 1981 more airplanes than it shipped in 1978 and 1979 combined. Embraer will have exported some 50 Bandeirantes, Xingu, and Xavante aircraft for total sales of $100 million by 31 December. The United States remains the single most important market, according to Embraer, and 1982 could see the purchase of another 30 to 35 Embraer-made aircraft, especially if U.S. bank interest rates come down, as is expected. Another major export region for Embraer continues to be neighboring Latin American countries such as Paraguay, Chile, Argentina, and Ecuador. BATTALION FOR SINAI PEACE FORCE ESTABLISHED

PA270222 Paris AFP in Spanish 1535 GMT 24 Nov 81

[Text] Bogota, 24 Nov (AFP)--Colombia has formed a 790-man military force that will cooperate in the maintenance of peace in the Sinai beginning in April 1982.

The Defense Ministry today reported that Lt Col Bernardo Ramirez Lozano will command the "Colombia battalion" and that Maj Ariel Roldan Matelon will be second in command.

The commando company (riflemen) is made up of 640 soldiers, 120 noncommissioned officers and 30 officers of the infantry, the artillery, the cavalry, and the engineering and service units.

Colombia battalion No 3 will travel to the Middle East in early April when Israel begins the process of returning to Egypt the vast area that has been under its control since the Sinai war.

As can be recalled that war established the late Israeli Gen Moshe Dayan as a hero.

Defense Ministry sources report that the Colombian military force will stay no less than 1 year in the Sinai, during which time the Colombian treasury will pay for its maintenance.

The military force was formed because the government of Julio Cesar Turbay desires to contribute to peace in the world. It is confident that peace will be achieved in that area where the roar of cannons has been heard in the past few years.

It is recalled that during his visit to Colombia this year, Butrus Butrus Ghali, Egyptian minister of state for foreign affairs, asked the Colombian Government to participate in the Sinai force.

M-19, EPL GUERRILLAS ATTACK OIL PIPELINES

PA260330 Buenos Aires LATIN in Spanish 1632 GMT 25 Nov 81

[Text] Bogota, 25 Nov (LATIN-REUTER)--Guerrillas carried out attacks on an electric powerplant and an oil pipeline some 800 kilometers southeast of Bogota, the National Defense Ministry announced today.

Twenty guerrillas from the leftist 19 April Movement (M-19) damaged the plant that supplies energy to Orito and Puerto Asis and then opened the valves of the oil pipeline that links both towns, spilling 200 barrels of crude oil, the report added.

After the attack, military patrolling of the pipeline was ordered.

On Sunday, a guerrilla command from the People's Liberation Army (EPL) detonated a bomb in one section of the pipeline that runs between the Barrancabermeja oil center and Medellin, the second largest city in the country. The explosion caused $50,000 worth of damages.

The police report that a guerrilla group from the EPL killed landowner Tomas Hazard, kidnapped near Turbo, 700 kilometers to the northeast of Bogota.

Hazard had been kidnapped early in November and $60,000 had been asked for his release.

PVP'S MORA VALVERDE INTERVIEWED BY CUBAN JOURNALIST

Havana TRICONTINENTAL in Spanish No 77 Jul-Aug 81 pp 66-71

[Interview with Manuel Mora Valverde, secretary general of the PVP [Popular Vanguard Party [Costa Rican Communist Party]] by Hugo Ruis: "The Ruptured Frontiers"; place and date of interview not given]

> [Text] Interviewed by TRICONTINENTAL, Manuel Mora Valverde, secretary general of the PVP of Costa Rica, discusses lucidly and in depth the political crisis that is wracking U. S. imperialism today in Central America and the Caribbean. According to the Costa Rican leader, the frontiers of the U. S. "backyard" have been ruptured by the revolutionary struggle of the peoples, and because of this a marked tendency to return to the days of the "big stick" has become evident. His observations constitute a call to strengthen vigilance in the face of imperialism's aggressive manifestations in this area of the world.

We are at this point in time in the presence of a very serious political crisis that covers not only Central America but the entire Hispanic region. As regards Central America in particular, it can be stated that an undeniable crisis of revolutionary nature is spreading throughout the isthmus, whose most notable developments are shaped by two factors: One is the economic and social crisis being traversed here; the other is the fundamental interest being displayed by American imperialism throughout the area, particularly following the revolution in Nicaragua.

To understand the Central American situation, it is necessary to analyze, even though it be in broad outline, the reason why imperialism has a fundamental interest in preventing the control of the Caribbean and Central American zone from slipping out of its hands, and why this constitutes at this time one of the United States's main concerns.

Many of that countries political leaders have said--and what is more serious, it has been repeated by the Pentagon--that Central America and the Caribbean comprise a zone of vital importance to the security of the United States and that they are prepared to defend it by all the means at their disposal. A few years ago, the then President Nixon said that the Caribbean Sea should be transformed into a U. S. lake, and, to all intents and purposes, it was the old Roosevelt, the one of the "big stick," talking again. Throughout its history, the policy the United States has been oriented toward realizing that concept of its preeminence. It is a secret to no one that the imperialists have always, and without the least dissimulation, considered themselves something like the owners of the American continent and especially Central America and South America. And on this basis, they hold that they are obligated to defend the continent. Of course, when they talk of defending, it must be translated as ruling.

The American military argue that the Caribbean Sea is the key to the two great oceans--the Atlantic and the Pacific--that are, according to them, the maritime boundaries of the United States. Furthermore, they place an emphasis that never decreases on the importance of that narrow strip of land which is the Central American isthmus between the two great continental masses of Central America [as published] and South America. There, Panama is located, with its Canal Zone that enables passage from one ocean to the other. These, in sum, are the reasons argued for imparting a vital strategic importance to Central America and the Caribbean.

After all the defeats the United States has suffered in Vietnam, in the rest of Indochina and in Africa, and in the wake of the insecurity that unquestionably surrounds them in Europe, a pronounced tendency is evident on the part of the imperialists to consider that they must establish themselves firmly in Latin America. This is the real source of the importance the Central American and Caribbean zone has now taken on.

To control the Caribbean "lake," the chain of the Antilles must be secured above and Central America below, the two natural borders, so to speak, of that "lake." But the fact is that those Antilles, whose domination and acquisition have given rise to very long struggles in Cuba, the Dominican Republic and Jamaica that represent an entire chapter in the history of Latin America, have been put out of real reach with the existence of socialist Cuba. In the other islands, parties, movements and elements friendly to the United States may be installed, but as long a the Cuban Revolution remains in existence there can be no effective domination of the Antilles.

On the other frontier, which is Central America, the Americans have just lost Nicaragua, where the attempt to promote a solution to the Nicaraguan crisis that would conform to American interests failed. As will be recalled, Carter and the State Department collaborated on the objective of toppling Somoza and establishing in Nicaragua a more nearly liberal democratic regime that would preserve the National Guard, which was one of the favorite instruments of domination in Central America.

The result, however, was that not only did Somoza fall but the National Guard also fell, and, what was worse yet for the imperialist interests, that Guard was replaced by a people's army, arisen from the population, with an anti-imperialist and revolutionary character. And what is even more, a profound democratic revolution got under way, the aim of which is to liberate Nicaragua from its status as a semicolony of the United States and to transform the Nicaraguan people into masters of their own destiny.

The Nicaraguan process does not present any threat whatever to the security of the United States, contrary to what is being affirmed in official circles in Washington. Basically, the fact is that this type of revolution is disadvantageous both to the Pentagon and to the monopolies. And the problem is not confined merely to having lost Nicaragua, but rather goes beyond it to the fact that concurrently with the loss of Nicaragua the revolutionary developments in El Salvador emerged, which, to be sure, were neither a chance occurrence nor a consequence of the Nicaraguan phenomenon. The fact is that already, throughout Central America, a genuine revolutionary process was developing, to achieve democratic regimes that would put an end to exploitation by the big oligarchic landowners and by the big foreign monopolies that depend for support upon the satraps installed in power. The exploiting classes closely linked to imperialism are now aware the the Central American peoples are on a footing of struggle, are confronting the tyrants, and are exposing themselves to all the risks involved, firmly determined to fight back and resist.

It is beyond any question, therefore, that the Nicaraguan Revolution is the most serious blow imperialism has suffered so far this century since the Cuban Revolution. But not for the reasons being given by the imperialists to justify their actions. They argue that the revolutions in these countries are endangering their security, when the fact is that what is being endangered is imperialism's plan for domination in Latin America, which is tied to its plans for world domination. This is the source of that entire fallacy that Central America cannot be permitted to fall into the hands of the communists, when in reality what concerns them is that Central America might fall into the hands of its respective peoples. This too is the source of all those threats by Reagan to intervene militarily in El Salvador with his assault troops, and of all those plans to recover Nicaragua; for, they cannot resign themselves to accepting the victories of peoples.

There is also another thing that concerns the United States with respect to the Caribbean, which is that this zone is one of the world's richest oil basins. To date, oil is being extracted only in Venezuela, but actually the rest of the Caribbean remains practically untapped. I know, for example, that more or less 20 years ago a drilling operation carried out in the southern part of Costa Rica, in a zone called Talamanca, yielded oil of prime quality, according to certification by the technical experts. And what happened? The American company ordered those wells plugged and paid to silence the discovery. American policy in this area has consisted of drilling, finding oil, and plugging, keeping Caribbean oil as a reserve for the day they might lose the Middle Eastern oil. As has been seen, that oil has become a serious headache to them.

The importance the United States has always accorded to the Panama Canal Zone in its scheme to dominate the American continent must also be considered. Imperialism has set up in that enclave what it calls the Southern Command, which is a complete army, whose functions cover not only the Caribbean zone but also Central America. We know it to be a military complex equipped with rockets and nuclear submarine bases, which also has an extremely powerful and modern satellite communications system that even enables it to scan and track the Caribbean sea.

Having analyzed all the political, economic and military factors, the question is, "Would the United States go so far as to land troops in Central America?". Materially, they could do so; but the further question is, "Is it to its advantage to thus create a conflict of broader scope, that could have no other result than to unleash another Vietnam in the heart of Latin America?". It would be like touching off a revolutionary conflagration in all of Central America.

MEASURES TAKEN TO PREVENT ILLEGAL ENTRY OF NICARAGUANS

San Jose LA NACION in Spanish 28 Oct 81 p 8A

[Text] The members of the Public Forces, who, beginning today, will guard the northern border, have received special orders to prevent the illegal entry of Nicaraguans into Costa Rican territory, according to a statement yesterday by Minister of Public Security Arnulfo Carmona B.

In this way, he said, it is hoped to exercise strict control over the age-old problem of clandestine entry of persons from Nicaragua.

The lookout plan calls for the guarding of the border by 150 members of the Public Forces, who will be stationed at 24 points.

Units of the Civil Guard will patrol the border from Salinas Bay to the locality known as Santa Cecilia.

From that point, continuing through Upala and Los Chiles, to the Atlantic coast at Barra del Colorado, patrolling of the border will be the responsibility of the Rural Guard.

The patrolling of this rugged border zone will be done on foot, on horseback and by rowboat, for the most part. Assistance as needed will be provided by government small planes and helicopters.

Overflights Being Investigated

Minister Carmona also said that alleged overflights of Costa Rican territory by Nicaraguan aircraft, reported by inhabitants, are being investigated.

The minister pointed out, however, that most people in Guanacaste are uncertain as to the exact border and may therefore think the Nicaraguan aircraft are entering our airspace when actually they are inside their own territory.

He added that there are also problems with navigation and fishing in Salinas Bay, despite the fact that treaties between the two countries actually state that its resources may be exploited jointly.

To resolve this problem, a special buoy with several beacons will be installed there shortly..

Edgar Vega, our correspondent in the northern zone, has reported that in fact yesterday, at 8:30 a m, an unidentified plane flew in from the north and circled over the city of La Cruz.

He added that the plane also overflew Puerto Soley and was seen in the vicinity of Murcielago.

He said moreover that 4 days ago inhabitants of Las Vueltas reported that another plane overflew that zone.

In addition, during the night, spokesmen for the Rural Guard's communications center confirmed that an aircraft coming from Nicaragua was detected penetrating Costa Rican territory at different times. They stated that, beginning at approximately 7:00 pm, it overflew the zone of Los Chiles and surroundings at a high altitude that made it impossible to determine whether it was a helicopter, a small plane or a large plane. They added that Juan Santamaria Airport authorities stated they had not given any plane permission to enter.

COMMEMORATION OF 1956 UPRISING REPORTED

[Editorial Report] FL302218--Havana Domestic Television Service in Spanish at 2000 GMT on 30 November begins live color coverage from the former Moncada barracks parade grounds of the ceremony commemorating the 25th anniversary of the 30 November uprising in Santiago de Cuba. The featured speaker is Vilma Espin, alternate member of the Communist Party of Cuba Politburo.

As coverage begins, the cameras give an overall view of the crowd with the barracks in the background. A huge Cuban flag is draped across part of the facade topped by the numeral "26." Army Gen Raul Castro and Culture Minister Armando Hart as well as Vilma Espin are seen standing along with other Cuban officials near the speaker's podium while a color guard approaches. Once the guard is in place, the Cuban national anthem is played. An unidentified man reads a council of state resolution awarding the Clandestine Struggle Medal to a large number of unnamed former combatants and participants in the struggle. Raul Castro, Hart and Espin, among others, present the medals individually while recorded excerpts of old speeches, some by Fidel and Raul Castro, are heard over the loudspeakers interspersed with martial music.

At 2029 GMT the color guard marches out after which an unidentified man reports on the achievements of Santiago de Cuba Province this year in honor of the 30 November uprising anniversary.

Vilma Espin begins her speech at 2039 GMT. She relates her own feelings and experience in the uprising and eulogizes Frank Pais, who led the uprising. She praises the people of Santiago who are not only honoring those who took part in the clandestine struggle with a ceremony but also with their "ideological struggle against U.S. imperialism and the scum" during events stemming from the Peruvian Embassy takeover, their "combative attitude against the U.S. Government's threats" and their commitment to fulfill the province's economic goals for 1981 ahead of schedule. She calls on those present to renew these commitments for next year's anniversary and for the 30th anniversary of the uprising in 1986, and the crowd responds with prolonged applause and shouts of "yes." Pleased, she tells them that this is the best homage that can be paid to those who fell in Santiago. She also says that the party is proud of their achievements and attitude and knows that the people of Santiago will continue to win new victories for socialism and the fatherland. She also exhorts them to work harder to overcome the "deficiencies that still exist."

Espin conveys greetings and congratulations from Commander in Chief Fidel Castro, whom she says was sorry to miss the ceremony because of "business that could not be put off."

She goes on: "Comrades, we are all aware that we are living in tense and complex times. Our people are alert, on a war footing, determined to respond to any aggression from the enemy. The threats of the yankee rulers do not frighten us. We advance victoriously in building socialism in spite of them, in spite of their blockade, their attacks, their constant attempts to hamper and stop our process. These people who are building the future with their own hands, who are experiencing the most brilliant stage in their history, will never spare any sacrifice in the defense of their revolution. [Applause]

"The U.S. Government is frenziedly pursuing its warmongering policy. It cannot bear the triumphant march of the Salvadoran revolutionary movement; it speaks hysterically of attacking Nicaragua, liberated by the heroic struggle of Sandino's heirs; it spreads lies against our country; it threatens us with all kinds of aggressions. Let imperialism stop and reflect before attacking a nation that has written its history in the ink of generous blood and is ready to defend its sovereign soil as long as a single one of its sons is left standing. [Applause]"

She adds: "Let us repeat so that our shout will echo with the force of a hurricane in the ears of those who try to attack us: The Cuban people will live with their revolution or die to the last man and woman for their revolution. [Applause]"

Vilma Espin concludes her speech at 2117 GMT. Coverage ends at 2120 GMT with the singing of a patriotic song.

U.S. 'ARROGANT THREATS' AGAINST NICARAGUA SCORED

PA280311 Havana International Service in Spanish 2310 GMT 27 Nov 81

["Our America" commentary]

[Text] With shameless arrogance that exceeds all limits, high-ranking officials of Ronald Reagan's fascist government have publicly made new and more serious threats against the new Nicaragua which, linked to other facts, reveal the speed with which Washington is preparing a military aggression against the heroic land of Augusto Cesar Sandino.

In statements recently made to the ABC television network, U.S. Secretary of State Alexander Haig declared that his country is willing to act, along with the regimes of Central and South America, against the Sandinist revolution to prevent, he alleged, Nicaragua from becoming another Cuba.

Once again, Haig emphatically refused to rule out the possibility of U.S. military action against Nicaragua. Haig added that he believed it inadvisable to limit U.S. options regarding the Central American nation.

Simultaneously, and also in a statement to a U.S. television network, one of President Ronald Reagan's chief advisers, Edwin Meese, said that the possibility of a naval blockade against Nicaragua has not been ruled out. According to Meese, neither has the intervention of a third country other than the United States to overthrow the Sandinist government.

At the same time, Caspar Weinberger, the chief of the Pentagon, threatened to implement contingency plans to defend, he said, the vital interests of the United States in Central America.

Reinforcing the arrogant threats of these high-ranking officials of the U.S. Government the WASHINGTON POST revealed that President Reagan had met with his national security advisers to determine what action he will take next against Nicaragua.

Questioned on this, a White House official said that something is on the verge of being done to prevent Nicaragua from becoming another Cuba.

There are other unmistakable signs that U.S. imperialism is putting the final touches on its plans of aggression against Nicaragua. It is no coincidence that recently, provocations by the Honduran army have been intensified on the border. There is an increase of the training, in U.S. territory, of former Somozist guardsmen and counterrevolutionaries of Cuban origin, who are also preparing for an invasion of the largest of Central America's republics.

In reference to Haig's statement to the effect that the United States could act against the Sandinist revolution along with its allies in the area, it is timely to denounce that in line with the recommendations of the ultrareactionary Santa Fe committee, the Pentagon is trying to revive that defunct instrument of the cold war era, the Inter-American Reciprocal Assistance Treaty [TIAR]. To this end, members of the so-called Inter-American Defense Board, headed by U.S. Lt Gen (John McEllery), just made a trip to the countries of South America to make it known that hemispheric security is facing grave danger in Central America. Let us recall that in 1965, the United States covered its brutal aggression against the people of the Dominican Republic with the banner of the TIAR, for which action, as this time in connection with Nicaragua, Washington used the pretext that it was necessary to block the emergence of another Cuba in Latin America.

But the insolent yankee imperialists are wrong if they think they are going to frighten the heroic Nicaraguan people with these threats. These days in Managua commander of the revolution Tomas Borge has stressed that Nicaragua's defense forces, including a well-organized people's militia, are maintaining high combat morale, fraternity and discipline as well as the willingness to die for their fatherland.

In denouncing these aggressive U.S. plans at the UN Security Council, Nicaraguan Foreign Minister Miguel d'Escoto stressed that despite the gravity of these threats, Nicaragua is neither ready to let itself be blackmailed nor to beg that its rights be respected, since the slogan free fatherland or death, which encouraged the Sandinists during the war against Somozism, is very present today in all of the Nicaraguan people.

GDR YOUTH REPRESENTATIVE IN NUEVITAS INTERVIEWED

Havana JUVENTUD REBELDE in Spanish 6 Oct 81 p 3

[Article by Miguel Enrique]

[Text] There is a tradition of cooperation between the GDR and Cuba in various economic areas. One of the men assigned to keeping this tradition alive is Emil Krompholz, entrusted by the central committee of the German Free Youth (FDJ) with the task of coordinating the activities of the Friendship Brigades in two cement factories, the 26 July facility at Nuevitas and the Karl Marx plant at Cienfuegos.

He spoke with us about the cooperation between the FDJ and UJC [Union of Young Communists], and about his work in Cuba.

"The first Friendship Brigade arrived in Cuba in 1979 and worked in the sugar harvest in Matanzas. We maintained a permanent contingent of the Julio Antonio Mella Brigade in the WFDY and we worked on the construction of an ESBEC [Basic Secondary Farm School] and of the Che Guevara Pioneer Center.

"In 1975 an agreement was signed between the FDJ and UJC for the establishment of a brigade in Nuevitas, which worked there until 1979 maintaining and repairing the cement plant. We should note that close bonds grew between our peoples and our youth groups through this practical activity."

Krompholz made a special note of this last point by saying: "The contact with the Cuban comrades was mutually beneficial and went beyond working hours. Human relationships developed in a context of workers' fraternal life together, along with the people in general and the comrades of other brigades from socialist nations. A result of this beautiful experience was the International Friendship Club, created by the foreign experts and the UCJ comrades."

Krompholz arrived in Cuba on 1 October 1980 and immediately began working at the recently inaugurated plant in Cienfuegos. He explains: "We do not carry out our productive activities as an isolated group, but rather we form a part of the Cuban collectives. We work in eight distinct technical areas, beginning with the quarries, the ovens, the mills and finishing with the packaging of the cement. The Nuevitas brigade is named for Ernest Thaellmann, and the Cienfuegos brigade, with the approval of the UJC national committee, is named for Commander Camilo Cienfuegos."

Another important point is that the FDJ comrades participate in voluntary farm work and form part of a joint group with the Cubans, called the Second Party Congress Brigade. Also they have organized two training courses, one on welding and the other on instrumentation. Each member of the brigade trains several young people, acting as their guide and helping them improve at their work. This activity takes place not just during working hours but also at other times, and this leads to the development of wonderful human relationships.

The members of the FDJ Friendship Brigade are making visits to places of historic and cultural interest on the afternoons of 9 and 10 October and will be meeting with the Committees to Defend the Revolution in order to exchange ideas.

"Part of our mission is to gain an understanding of Cuban society, so that when we return to our country we can help others to know about Cuba," said Krompholz in concluding.

GUILLERMO GARCIA HONORS 'BARBADOS CRIME' DEAD

Havana GRANMA in Spanish 9 Oct 81 p 2

[Text of speech by revolutionary commander Guillermo Garcia, member of the Politburo of the party Central Committee and minister of transportation, during a ceremony commemorating the fifth anniversary of the Barbados crime, at the Jose Marti International Airport on 6 October 1981,"Year of the 20th Anniversary of Giron"]

[Text] Five years have passed since the detestable, monstrous, and infamous "Barbados crime."

We are gathered here today at the Jose Marti International Airport to remember our brothers who were cravenly assassinated. Deeply moved, we are gathered here with civil aviation workers, in this airport where they were to have arrived that 6 October.

All our people throughout the nation, each year for centuries, will eternally remember, condemn, and abhor that barbarous terrorist act committed against the Cuban Airlines plane in the area of Barbados.

We all recall that on that DC-8, Flight CU-455, there were, on their way back to Cuba, 57 humble and exemplary workers, students, and athletes who were modestly doing their duty to the country, among them two crews from Cuban Airlines; the captain of the plane who just in 1976 had received the honorable title of "National Labor Hero"; and other crew members who had completed internationalist missions; and the members of the Youth Fencing Team who were returning victorious and laden with medals after winning at the first places in the Central American and Caribbean Championship.

Returning with our young people were fishermen and other worthwhile comrades. Also aboard the plane were 11 Guyanese citizens, among them youths who were to enter our universities to begin studying medicine, and five self-sacrificing workers from the Democratic People's Republic of Korea, who were visiting the Caribbean countries on a friendship trip.

How can we imagine and describe the final minutes on that Cuban Airlines flight? And how can we imagine the last moments of those 73 helpless victims, trapped in a plane, held in by their seat belts, thousands of meters above the sea, who in a terrible moment were suddenly and cravenly hurt and shaken by two violent explosions, burned by the flames, choked by the smoke and the lack of oxygen, plunging without any possible hope toward a frightful death?

Everyone knows that these depraved international terrorists had bases in various parts of the United States and in the countries of the Caribbean basin.

Five years after the brutal "Barbados crime," the unburied bodies of the majority of our comrades, lost in the depths of the Caribbean, still cry out for justice.

Somehow the despicable murderers should pay with their lives for their crime. It is something even more important: the demand of history that the infamous crime not go unpunished.

It is indispensable that as well as the moral sanction of all our people and of mankind, the law should be applied and such brutal crimes should be punished so that they will never be repeated and so that those lives, which were snuffed out in their fullness, might save those of many other human beings who are potentially threatened by the practices of those mad agents of terrorism and international crime.

We expected every responsible government with any basic sense of justice and national honor, to know enough to put these reasons above any other considerations, whatever ideological distance might separate them from Cuba; however, 5 years have gone by, the Cuban people and all of mankind are certain of the guilt of the material and intellectual authors of the crime, and we have witnessed the disgusting machinations, tricks, delays, threats and pressures to free the authors of that revolting crime.

As Comrade Fidel has said, "There is no room for excuses or pretexts of any kind. Everyone knows that they were the saboteurs, everyone knew it from the beginning, and the evidence was irrefutable, the Venezuelan authorities know they are absolving the guilty. But we also knew months ago what Venezuela's intentions were with regard to these criminals. We knew the intention to free them. We knew and we know the measures planned to protect them once they were freed, and to what country they planned to send at least the principals and to what country they would send the one responsible for the dead: Chile, with whose government the person had and still has the best possible relations."

Graven upon our memory, we Cubans still bear the events of those October 1976 days, the work at sea to recover the bodies and parts of the Cuban Airlines plane, the meetings by representatives of Trinidad-Tobago, Guyana, Barbados, and Venezuela, investigations by experts and committees, the arrest of the guilty parties, and their transfer to Caracas.

We remember how pressure grew to protect the authors of that barbarous crime and how Carlos Andres Perez, then president of Venezuela, despite his well-known ideological differences with our revolution, acted responsibly and took the proper steps to halt and block the plans and pressures underway to protect those who committed the crime.

It is now clear that the Military Court prosecutor received instructions from higher up to ask that the murderers be found innocent; the same prosecutor who, months earlier, considering the evidence submitted by the civil court, asked for a 30-year sentence for the murderers, suddenly changed his mind and asked that charges be dismissed.

The people of Cuba and everyone know the tricks and maneuvers of the present leaders of the Venezuelan government. The military court prosecutor has been instructed to ask that charges be dropped, which makes their freedom nearly automatic.

But the fact that this crime has gone unpunished will forever be a blot on the Venezuelan armed forces, the government, and the country.

If those heartless international terrorists are really freed, our people will blame the military prosecutor, the judges, and mainly the government of Venezuela for the crime perpetrated on 6 October 1976.

It is not hard to understand the real cause of this provocation against Cuba. While the former Venezuelan government had its differences with Cuba within a framework of dignity and mutual respect, the present heads of government in Venezuela are in collusion with international reactionary forces, in order to encourage provocations, revive threats, exacerbate the blockade, and try to defame our country and to isolate it from the nations of the continent.

The Venezuelan government still has a chance to avoid the monstrosity of absolving and freeing these convicted and confessed cruel murderers.

The highest military court must still issue its decision on the crime, and a court martial must give the final verdict. We Cubans are awaiting that final decision of the court and, once and for all, of the authorities and government of Venezuela.

To free these murderers is tantamount to endangering the safety of diplomatic missions, officials, ships and planes, their crew and passengers, who might be threatened by cowardly and repulsive crimes.

This is proof for all of Latin America and the world of the shameless way that provocations and aggressions are perpetrated against our country. But that is not surprising, for, while the previous Venezuelan government had a policy of respect for the sovereignty of peoples and for Latin American solidarity, the current Christian-Democrat government of Venezuela supports the genocidal and bloodstained dictatorship of El Salvador, which has wiped out over 20,000 lives of their people in the last 2 years alone.

As Fidel has said, "We have nothing against the people of Venezuela; in their day the Venezuelan people unanimously condemned that crime, and today we are aware of their profound rejection of the monstrosity of absolving the criminals. Many political leaders, many Venezuelan public figures have strongly condemned the prosecutor's action as well as that of the court and the government. Whatever the facts and the provocations by the farsical and hypocritical Social-Christian lobby, we will always consider the Venezuelan people a noble and fraternal people."

Comrades, today at Jose Marti Airport we are commemorating the fifth anniversary of that horrible crime which cost the lives of 73 people.

We are assembled with relatives of the deceased, with their fellow athletes and sportsmen, with the students, with the fishing industry workers, with the civil aviation workers, with the comrade representatives of Democratic Korea and of Guyana, and at the same time, with all the people of Cuba. But how to remember our martyrs and those who died with them in that nameless crime? With every passing year, international condemnation of that dreadful deed will become stronger and deeper.

Crimes like the one in Barbados come only from the sick, cowardly and desperate mind of agents and terrorists who have been trained by imperialism. Imperialism teaches them to kill, trains them to commit all sorts of crimes, teaches them the techniques of crime, supports them, moves them about, and gives them the economic and material resources to plan and carry out the most sinister crimes.

Imperialism, its followers and lackeys and its hired killers, know quite well what to expect when they dare a frontal attack on the revolution; the counterrevolutionary gangs know it when they try to attack us or infiltrate our coasts. They know what happened at Escambray, they know about the defeat at Playa Giron. They know perfectly well what to expect when they confront the men and women of Cuba, weapons in hand.

But on the Cuban Airlines plane there was no struggle against armed men. They attacked young workers and students, completely disarmed, completely unaware of the aggression awaiting them. Thus, in a mad and cowardly way, they bombed the Cuban plane in mid-flight.

The Barbados crime is written on the history of the Caribbean as one of the most atrocious and infamous aggressions against our country.

And while that happened in 1976, today in 1981, just like yesterday, everyone knows that the CIA is behind the sinister new aggressions committed against our country by the dissemination of such diseases as hog fever, cane rust, blue tobacco mold, and just this year, dengue fever and hemorrhagic conjunctivitis.

Today Yankee imperialism is increasing and intensifying its subversion and interference and the CIA has been freed of all restrictions and is again using the infamous biological weapons. Today as in the past, Yankee imperialism resorts to violence, domination, blackmail and terror as truly fascist objectives.

Our people are not afraid of Yankee imperialism's threats. We become stronger and more aware in the face of each new aggression, brave and heroic soldiers and militia members opposing crime and terror.

Our young fencers, as Central American champions who did not go on to the Olympics, our pilots and crew members, our civil aviation heroes and all the Cubans who were slaughtered in such a cowardly way that day and whose bodies rest in the depths of the sea, will live forever in the memory, the affection and the admiration of our people.

As an everlasting monument to their memory and that of all who have died and will die for our revolution, we dedicate to them our strength and our work, and a fatherland ever more revolutionary, more socialist and more internationalist.

Virile and heroic, our people wept for their murdered sons and gave them the tribute of admiration and respect that they deserved. They turned sorrow into a will to fight, and their banner became the sacrifice of those who death had prevented from forging onward and carrying out what they had begun.

"It is not weeping I hear," said Marti, "nor supplicant hands I see, nor lowered heads listening--but upraised heads!..."

For our martyrs of Barbados, the daily homage of work and defense of our fishermen, our athletes: let every captain, every sailor, every stewardess be a selfless worker, disciplined and tireless in carrying out his duties in production, and a soldier of the revolution ever ready to go to the defense in our glorious territorial militias.

The imperialists, the CIA and their lackeys thought that terror would stop our people, our fishermen, our atheletes, or crews, that it would keep us out of the world's skies. They were wrong! Today, with a stronger will than ever, they have vowed to give their all for the revolution, and their only reply to aggression is PRODUCTION AND DEFENSE.

Pausing along the road toward building socialism to commemorate this sad anniversary with you, let our most fervent tribute to their memory be the performance of our sacred duty to the fatherland every day, the purest homage to those who loved, defended and died for the revolution.

May our martyrs live eternally in our people, our creative work and in the defense of the socialist revolution!

FATHERLAND OR DEATH!

WE WILL WIN!

CONSTRUCTION BRIGADE IN SRV COMPLETES HOSPITAL

Havana GRANMA in Spanish 9 Oct 81 p 1

[Article by Ernando Davalos]

[Text] On the same day as the inauguration of the Vietnam-Cuba Friendship Hospital in Dong Hoi, Socialist Republic of Vietnam (SRV), a group of internationalist Cuban builders met outside this modern center, which was erected with the help of Cuba.

Also present were members of the advance unit of the Cuban medical brigade which will work in the hospital and experts on electronic medicine who have come to the fraternal Vietnamese nation to put into service various items of equipment set up there. Along with the Cuban internationalists, the photograph shows Dr Sergio del Valle, member of the Politburo of our party and minister of public health, Israel Torres, executive director of the Caribe Union of Construction Enterprises (UNECA), and architect Emilio Uliaga, a UNECA official. These persons formed the Cuban delegation in attendance at the hospital inauguration ceremony.

The internationalist Cuban builders who are working in the SRV are part of the last units of the Vietnam-Cuba Friendship Group and are working with Vietnamese builders together in a brigade named for Nguyen Viet Xuan, a martyr of that fighting people. In reality, the antecedents of the presence of our builders lie in the historic Ho Chi Minh contingent which carried out a number of projects of special importance for the reconstruction of Vietnam after the war of liberation and the imperialist Yankee aggression.

The advance party of the medical brigade, which will ultimately have 26 members within a few months, are already working in Don Hoi, helping the new hospital begin slowly to offer the various services planned.

The technicians in electronic medicine, who arrived in the SRV along with the first health workers for Dong Hoi, are seven comrades who specialize in sterilization equipment, oxygen units, optics, vacuum units, machinery used in wards, stomatology, electronics and X-rays.

This is a new and beautiful expression of solidarity with the nation of our beloved Uncle Ho.

BRIEFS

COMMENTS ON HAIG'S MEXICAN VISIT--Hounded by constant statements against him and universal declarations that denounce his threats against Cuba and Nicaragua, yankee Secretary of State Alexander Haig received a request from Mexican Foreign Minister Jorge Castaneda in Mexico City, to tone down his pompous statements. That sound advice was given to Haig by Castaneda himself during Haig's 24-hour visit to the Mexican capital, which was characterized by extraordinary security measures to protect the yankee official from the anger of the people. Castaneda told reporters that Haig refused to promise that the United States would not take action against Cuba, Nicaragua and El Salvador, although he affirmed that [if that was the case] American soldiers would not be used. NIGERIAN AMBASSADOR'S CREDENTIALS--In a solemn ceremony, Carlos Rafael Rodriguez, vice president of the Councils of State and Ministers, has received His Excellency (Gilbert Chokumba Desier Oakali), who presented his credentials accrediting him as ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary of the Federal Republic of Nigeria. Participating in the ceremony was Comrade Isidoro Malmierca Peoli, minister of foreign relations. At the conclusion of the ceremony, the ambassador and his entourage went to the Plaza de la Revolucion and laid a floral wreath at the foot of the Jose Marti Monument. ETHIOPIA'S SUPPORT MESSAGE--Addis Ababa--Ethiopia, Libya and Democratic Yemen have reiterated their condemnation of U.S. military movements in Africa, the Middle East, Asia and Latin America, and reaffirmed their solidarity with Cuba in view of U.S. threats. The stand taken by the three countries is detailed in a message sent to Foreign Minister Isidoro Malmierca of Cuba, the country currently chairing the nonaligned movement, by Ethiopian Foreign Minister Felleke Gedle-Giorgis, who chairs the political committee of the Ethiopia-Libya-Democratic Yemen Friendship and Cooperation Treaty. The message informs the nonaligned movement chairman of the outcome of the meeting held in Addis Ababa by the foreign ministers of Ethiopia, Libya and South Yemen to discuss and adopt measures in view of the danger posed by the bright star military maneuvers. The foreign ministers carefully analyzed the situation in the Caribbean area, particularly yankee imperialism's interference, provocations and aggressions against Cuba. They strongly condemned the United States and reaffirmed their solidarity and full backing for the Cuban Government and people in their struggle against imperialism, the message adds. MIRET CHAIRS MEETING--Pedro Miret Prieto, member of Cuba's Communist Party Politburo, today presided at the opening session of the second national meeting on the manufacture and recovery of spare parts of the Construction Ministry [MICONS], which will last 2 days. Participating in the meeting, which is being held in Havana City, are representatives from all MICONS enterprises, who will discuss some 20 proposals of a total of 110 that have been submitted. The more than 3,000 workers working in that sector of the economy had saved more than 15 million pesos and manufactured more than 2 million spare parts by the end of September. MEDICAL CONGRESS--Sergio del Valle, member of the Politburo and minister of public health, presided over the inaugural session of the third national congress on internal medicine and the first meeting on intensive care which began yesterday and will close tomorrow at the Palace of Conventions. In both events, to be attended by over 300 doctors and specialists on internal medicine, the main topic of discussion will be emergency care [medicina de urgencia], which has also been the subject for exposition and debate of (?nine) round tables and symposiums and an equal number of lectures and meetings prior to the plenary session. Dr Jose Fernandez Mirabal, chairman of the organizing committee, emphasized at the opening session that the topic of emergency care was picked because of its relevance today as our nation finds itself threatened by yankee imperialism. CUBAN REFUGEES--Whether they are in the U.S. city of St Louis or in the district of the same name in Lima, Peru, the anti-socials of Cuban origin do not cease to create conflicts, participate in all kinds of crime and gain for themselves the hatred of the people. A group of town councilmen in the Peruvian capital have threatened to go on a hunger strike unless the Lima municipality ejects the anti-socials that are now occupying a recreational park named Tupac Amaru, where they are living in dirty and half-torn army tents. The park in the San Luis district has been turned into a source of public scandal, drug trafficking, prostitution and a place where goods stolen from the Lima metropolitan area invariably wind up. The honest and decent residents of San Luis district have, up to now, failed in their efforts to free themselves of this painful social cancer, and the hunger strike to be started by the town councilmen could spread like wildfire. In other parts, anti-socials of Cuban origin and dedicated to the trafficking of drugs in the United States could be involved in the murder of six young people, four boys and two girls, whose bodies were found Sunday morning in a luxurious Miami residence after an anonymous tip was received by the police. According to all indications, the young people were executed in the style used traditionally by the yankee mafia, who fight with flood and fire over the control of the lucrative drug traffic. PARLIAMENT, CHARLES DISCUSS ISSUE OF CUBAN SCHOLARSHIPS

Bridgetown ADVOCATE-NEWS in English 7 Nov 81 p 3

[Text]

ROSEAU, Dominica, Friday, (CANA) — The Dominica Parliament yesterday gave backing to a Government decision not to accept scholarships offered by Cuba, and its condemnation of Cuban interference in the island's internal affairs.

The Cuban Government had offered the scholarships to a political party here after the government refused them on the grounds that students were compelled to study Marxism-Leninism and in some cases military arts.

Government back-bencher Meshach Linton had introduced a resolution in Parliament on October 12 calling on Parliament to support the government's stand, as well as seeking backing from other Caribbean Community (CARICOM) countries in getting Cuba to reverse what the resolution termed "this unfriendly act."

In her contribution to the debate yesterday Prime Minister Eugenia Charles, who has the Foreign Affairs portfolio, charged that the Cuban government, by granting the scholarships despite an official rejection, was attempting to destabilise the country.

She said "Cuba can say what they like....it is the Cuban party and not the Cuban Government, nobody is being fooled by that disguise, who had offered the scholarships to the left-leaning Dominica Liberation Movement after they were rejected."

"The Cuban Government, I say, insisted not on advertising the scholarships available, but on picking out the people they wanted to give these scholarships to because they intended these people to come back and destabilise the country of Dominica."

Though I cannot disclose everything here as minister who is responsible for security, I can tell you that they are a security problem when they return to Dominica. Therefore we have to spend much more money on security as a result of scholarships being given to them."

Miss Charles said that on October 7, her administration had received a letter from the Cuban authorities about the scholarship issue, but that "at no time have they referred to the fact that we object to the interference in our internal affairs and flouting our sovereignty."

Miss Charles said Cuba had claimed that it practised a policy of solidarity assistance to under-developed countries struggling to eliminate the aftermath of the colonial regimes, regardless of the ideological differences that exist.

"They say in Cuba there are dozens of thousands of scholarship holders studying from all parts of the world," she said, reading the letter in Parliament, but asked: "Do the Dominican people want them?"

Miss Charles said the Cubans had claimed that by providing the scholarships, they were contributing to the development of sister Caribbean country.

Her Government's official response to the Cuban letter, said Miss Charles, was that it wanted "the assurance that the Cuban Communist Party has been made aware by the Cuban Government of the Dominica Government interpretation of the Cuban Communist action in offering scholarships in defiance of the Cuban Government submission that Dominica has the sovereign right to refuse scholarships."

"The same way Cuba is sovereign in Cuba, Dominica is sovereign in Dominica," she declared.

Parliament voted overwhelming to denounce the Cuban scholarship offers, with three opposition Parliamentarians, including a former government Minister Michael Douglas, abstaining.

INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION TO CUT UNEMPLOYMENT

Bridgetown ADVOCATE-NEWS in English 29 Oct 81 p 3

[Text]

ROSEAU, Dominica, Wednesday (CANA) — Pledging that unemployment on the island would be greatly reduced within the coming years, the Industrial Development Corporation (IDC) has embarked upon identifying specific projects with the hope of luring investors to the island.

The IDC, set up by the government toward the end of 1979, has been reorganised with prominent local businessman Phillip Nassief at its helm, in the hunt for jobs on this island, which has an agriculture-based economy.

"The idea of an IDC is to facilitate the investor so that he has a one stop office to which he can go rather than having to go to several ministries for fiscal incentives, concessions, work permits, which could be frustrating," Nassief has acknowledged.

Recommending the repatriation of a percentage of profits where there is foreign participation, and recommending industrial incentives such as income tax holidays, duty-free imports and exports are also among plans which the corporation hopes to pursue in order to stimulate industrial development here.

With industrial estates located near the islands two airstrips — at Melville Hall, north of here, and Canefield, just outside the capital — the IDC is looking into the possibility of providing factory buildings for potential investors at a cheap annual rate. It noted that factory buildings of up to 20 000 square feet are available.

The corporation, which has pledged to maintain a close relationship with the private sector has however indicated that in order to fulfil its promises of bringing investment to the country, there must be "a sound investment and industrial climate here."

The government, with the input of both the private sector and the trade unions here, is circulating a draft proposal with recommendations for establishing a healthy industrial climate, and thus affording a stable industrial relations atmosphere.

"We want to appeal to the unions to recognise that we need a period of industrial peace, that the strike weapon should not be exploited and we are also appealing to the private sector and to government," Nassief said.

He said that the corporation has been meeting with the trade unions and has expressed the wish for them to assist the corporation in providing much-needed jobs.

Mr. Nassief has noted that no type of investor would even venture to visit Dominica if he hears that such places like the banks and airport are on strike.

Mr. Nassief has noted that because of the smallness of the island, the corporation for the time being will concentrate on investments "with the greatest potential for job creation in the immediate future."

The sewing and electronic industries are the two main areas the IDC wants to promote initially.

"We have to be specific and look at clear objectives. We are a very small island with limited potential and with a number of constraints. What we have attempted to do is to identify specific targets," Nassief said.

"The first (ones) we think with the greatest potential for job-creation in the immediate future are the enclave industry, labour intensive export, assembly-type operation and specifically in that area we're are looking at the sewing industry, garment, sports goods, electronic assembly operations."

Other areas which the IDC hopes to get involved in will include, agro processing, timber related projects to include furniture and low cost housing, small business and energy intensive projects.

The hydro-electric generating plant damaged by hurricane David in 1979 is expected to resume operations soon, and Mr. Nassief has indicated that after electricity is transmitted to the island "we should be able to get attractive rates for industries, so that we can attract energy intensive industries."

On agriculture, Mr. Nassief said: "We have tried to be specific and try to identify specific crops we are hoping to look at what we have, what we know, and to see how we can expand and develop those agriculture crops.

"There is also the timber-related projects, furniture, low-cost housing. There are two timber operations at present and we expect that with drying facilities of local timber we can attract investment in furniture, low-cost housing."

But these projects, as the IDC chairman has noted, "will take some time. It usually takes a time-span of up to three years between promotion and job-creation."

Together with the Ministry of Education, the IDC has embarked "on a technical and vocational training programme so that when new industries are about to start here, there would be a core of trained workers."

Mr. Nassief said: "Our principal goal in the enclave industry is to attract industry that will have 100 per cent export outside the region. On the other hand, we are also looking at attracting industries...where the whole process will be completed in Dominica."

Although it has indicated its willingness in "setting up new industries either in full ownership or under joint venture arrangements with private local or foreign investors, the IDC has said that it wants no part in being directly involved in ventures requiring a substantial financial input.

Mr. Nassief said: "This is an area we want to avoid."

FARMERS UNION CHIEF, IN GRENADA, HITS CHARLES' FOREIGN POLICY

Bridgetown ADVOCATE-NEWS in English 7 Nov 81 p 3

[Text]

ST GEORGE'S, Grenada, Friday (CANA) — The President of the Dominica Farmers Union (DFU) Emile Thomas, has made a bitter attack here against the foreign policy of the Government of Prime Minister Eugenia Charles and its handling of the vital banana industry. He said the administration was a "puppet" of United States President Ronald Reagan.

Mr. Thomas came to Grenada to attend a farmers meeting. He charged that the Dominican leader was showing hostility to Grenada and Cuba and not looking after the crisis facing the banana industry in Dominica.

He told the farmers that the Prime Minister had failed to reply to a letter written by the Dominica Farmers Union requesting that her government come to the assistance of the industry in the face of problems such as falling prices on the British market.

He said the letter also called on the Dominica Government to seek alternative markets in the region for bananas and also establish a plant to produce banana flour.

Mr. Thomas charged said that while failing to reply to the letter, Miss Charles always found time to criticise the leftist regimes in both Cuba and Grenada, and in trying to stop Dominicans from accepting much-needed scholarships from Havana.

The Dominica Government has warned nationals against taking up scholarships offered by the Cuban Government, and officially rejected, because it said the courses included Marxism-Leninism and military training, and that the offer to third parties amounted to interference in the country's internal affairs.

Mr. Thomas has said that his island's administration was only playing lip-service to a request by the Dominica Banana Growers' Association to help the body out of its debt of over $21 million.

He said that the association had approached the Dominica Government for special assistance towards liquidating the debts, but had not received a reply. Mr. Thomas is returning to Dominica. He has been attending the first anniversary celebrations of the Productive Farmers Union of Grenada, as well as the inaugural meeting of a Farmers' Association of the Windward Islands.

BRIEFS

TRINIDAD AND TOBAGO ELECTION--Roseau, Dominica, Tuesday. (CANA)--The Dominica Government said today it hoped yesterday's landslide victory of the People's National Movement (PNM) in the Trinidad and Tobago general election would result in a continued close relationship with the Caribbean region. The government's wish is contained in a congratulatory message sent by [sic] Prime Minister George Chambers after his party was endorsed for its sixth consecutive term in office. The message which was released by the Ministry of External Affairs also said Dominica was looking forward to continue close association with the oil-rich republic to the benefit of its people of the region. Miss Charles who became the Caribbean's first woman Prime Minister following her party's landslide victory at the polls here in July last year also sent "special wishes" to the women elected during the election. The full text of the message reads: "Sincere congratulations on your election win, to you personally and to PNM as a whole. To the people of Trinidad and Tobago, we extend our best wishes, we look forward to continued close association to the benefit of our people and the people of the region. To the women who have elected special wishes are sent." Late last month, Dominica announced that it had signed a $12 million loan with Trinidad and Tobago for assistance in the fields of housing and agriculture. LOAN FOR CONSTRUCTION WORK--Roseau, Dominica, Wednesday (CANA)--The Dominica Government said yesterday that it had received loans totalling over US$4m in addition to a $1.75m grant for construction work on the island. Communications, Works and Tourism Minister Henry Dyer told reporters that the bulk of the money was coming from the Barbados-based Caribbean Development Bank (CDB), including a loan which had been approved since 1975. According to the minister, the money will be used for reconstruction work on the deep water harbour, destroyed by the fury of Hurricane David in August 1979, as well as the construction of a banana shed at the deep water harbour in Fond Cole, just outside Roseau. Mr Dyer said the CDB had approved a loan of US$3m to Dominica for the construction work on the deep water harbour, with the Dominica Government providing an additional US$401 000. The work will include construction of wharf fender systems, fills and slope protection as well as steel sheet pipewalls. The contract for the work was signed here last Friday between the Dominica Government and an American company, Misenier Marine Construction Incorporated of Florida. He said also that 10 feeder roads with a total coverage of 35 miles will be built from a loan of EC$3.8 million approved by the bank, and that a Puerto Rican company, Curran

Associates, will provide consultancy work for the project covering mainly the north, coastline and east sections of the island. A grant of EC$1.75 million has been made by the Canadian International Development Agency (CIDA) for the provision of steel structures to be used in the construction of the banana shed also destroyed by Hurricane David. Mr Dyer said that work on all the projects would begin very soon. [Text] [Bridgetown ADVOCATE-NEWS in English 12 Nov 81 p 3]

PACOREDO CALLS FOR UNITY AMONG LEFTIST GROUPS

Santo Domingo EL NACIONAL in Spanish 9 Nov 81 p 21

[Text] The Communist Party of the Dominican Republic (PACOREDO), in proposing unity among all groups which oppose "political retrogression," is not abandoning its Marxist-Leninist party spirit.

This was asserted in a communique from the secretary general of PACOREDO, Luis Pin-Montas.

The text of the statement signed by Montas is as follows:

"The unity policy of the Communist Party (PACOREDO) is based on the tasks which lie ahead for the Dominican revolution, on the correlation of forces in the struggle and even on the level of political awareness achieved among the people.

"Since that is the situation, it is not at all strange that the unity, or alliance, policy of the Communist Party (PACOREDO) should have as its highest goal the development of the struggle and not conciliation or compromise and that--in accordance with variations in the correlation of forces in the struggle and the attitudes of the various political groups which seek to take over the party's unity policy, as well as with variations in the tactical or strategic tasks of the revolution and the party--that policy is also subject to modification and change. Everything depends on the situation in general and even on the attitudes of actual or potential allies in the political field, for example.

"At this particular time, when we are proposing the task of grouping forces for the struggle against imperialism and native reaction, raising as our banner the struggle against political retrogression, we are seeking the unity or alliance of all those sectors which are interested in opposing the reactionaries and wish to avoid a return to the Yankee-Balaguerist past.

"Convinced that there are very broad sectors interested objectively in the struggle against political regression, we are aware of the popularity of the watchword coined by the party. Our duty as a political vanguard is, above all, to group those broad sectors of the people which are interested in closing the door to any attempt at political regression or backsliding.

"And it is at those sectors in the first place and above all, that our policy and our tactics in the struggle are directed.

"The popular content, in fact, is defined by the sector to which it is disseminated and by which it is received, because while the working and popular masses in general are the first to welcome and defend democratic freedoms, while struggling to expand them, there are also political sectors and personalities who understand the need to oppose reaction and who fight against political retrogression. There is no reason, then, to underestimate the possibility of establishing certain pacts, alliances or agreements with those groups.

"This is the case with very diverse political forces, and for each one or each bloc of them, different pacts, attitudes, agreements and relations are required.

"This, in effect, is what we have been doing.

"But we must emphasize that for us these steps are not the basic or most important question: that place will continue to be occupied by the popular masses.

"It is true, for example, that we are forced to consider pacts with other political forces, but we cannot believe that this will be true of all of them, nor will it be a permanent, much less indefinite, relationship with those with whom we do achieve a certain degree of unity.

"For example, the pact or alliance we had until recently was Hector Aristy's 24 April movement and with the Democratic Union, as well, clearly, as those we have with MORENURE [New Republic Revolutionary Movement].

"The 24 April movement and the Democratic Union did not want to take the responsibility of political agreements with the party, and they tried to force their political ideas on us; those ideas were developing along the lines of the current anticommunist campaign and the campaign against democratic freedoms.

"In view of that, the most sensible course of action was to press for and to implement plans to make those ties serve the revolution, rather than cheap politicking, which was what would have happened if we had not reacted in time. That was the basis of the joint proposal made to the PRD [Dominican Revolutionary Party]. But it happens that they did not want to take responsibility for the agreements and began to act like 'crazy kids.'

"Therefore it is best to recognize under the circumstances that the wisest thing is for each group to follow its own path, and let it be the process that either unites us again or causes us to remain separate.

"In view of this one need not suppose that it is a matter of life or death, or anything like that. Because if one has a clear understanding of the matter, rather than a rightist position suitable to a democrat-bourgeois, one knows that for us the most important thing is for the masses to make our watchword their own through our independent work among them and through our tireless political labor.

"Perhaps there are people who have an interpretation which is capriciously contrary to our own, but it should be observed that they will always have to operate without the masses as their center of activity against political regression and with concepts which believe in the 'supreme' role of leaders and personalities in the political struggle.

"They confuse a united front with pacts with all the political forces, however minimal and insignificant these may be. There are also those who argue that they have their own concept of the front, different from the party's. All this is natural; that is why the ideological struggle must be permanently launched.

"Because that is, indeed, pure rubbish.

"The political hegemony of the party and the revolutionaries will be confirmed by their work among the people, the masses, who are the principle scenario of our political activity.

"Day by day we must strengthen the revolutionary idea that to establish any kind of unity, pact or alliance, the participants must want unity and must use not only words, but deeds, to comply without reservation with unanimous agreements.

"At the same time, it must remain clear that we were ready to come to an agreement with those who do not want to struggle and do not pretend to defend what has been established by common agreement, at least on the political level.

"It is most important that that be understood and that any sort of democrat-bourgeois idea in that regard be scrapped.

"In summary, we will synthesize those problems as follows:

-- "The meaning of the watchword of struggle against political retrogression is popular, democratic, anti-imperialist and antireaction.

-- "Therefore, the reason for grouping forces around the slogan of the struggle against retrogression is, above all, to group the popular masses, and not any political groups in particular, against retrogression.

"The basic meaning of the watchword is not the alliance or pact with other political forces, but the going out and working among the people, so that they become unified at the mass level, oppose the reactionaries and make an effort to deepen, broaden and expand their democratic victories.

-- "We are an independent force, tied to the masses through our independent policy.

-- "Our political line, our programmatic points of view and our tactics in the struggle are what give us prestige and effectiveness.

"Being on the side of the masses, we place them at the center of our activity on the basis of our ideological and programmatic platform.

-- "If today our ties with the masses are stronger, it is due basically and essentially to that concept, applied and carried out with correct style and methods.

-- "It is unwise to base our hope for the development of the line of the masses on the existence of a pact or alliance with other political forces rather than on our own forces, on our organization and its sound line.

-- "It is also important to clarify conditions for pacts and alliances.

-- "To establish unity it is necessary that the participants want unity and be willing to comply with agreements which are made under that unity.

"And let it not be thought that fighting for unity we have lost our party spirit or our Marxist-Leninist dignity."

LEFTIST ORGANIZATIONS STATE REASON FOR NOT MERGING

Santo Domingo LISTIN DIARIO in Spanish 2 Nov 81 p 8

[Excerpts] Three leftist political organizations denied yesterday that they have agreed to merge with other parties for the upcoming elections, as was reported recently.

The statement issued by the UPA [Anti-imperialist Patriotic Union], the PTD [Dominican Workers Party] and the MPD [Dominican Popular Movement], in which the report was denied, is as follows:

"The Patriotic Union, the Dominican Popular Movement and the Dominican Workers Party, in view of the story published on page 3 of LISTIN DIARIO on the 30 of this month under the headline, "Seven Leftist Organizations Aligned for Elections," wishes to state:

1. That that report was made in a tendentious manner designed to create difficulties within the seven organizations mentioned;

2. That the meetings held by the organizations mentioned in the story (UPA, PED [PTD?], MPD, NCT [Communist Nucleus of Workers], PS [Socialist Party], MST [Socialist Workers Movement], PCT [Communist Labor Party]) do not plan any election merger;

3. That in view of this, nothing has been discussed to date with respect to candidacies;

4. That those meetings were not held on the initiative of the UPA and the PTD, but, very much to the contrary, are the result of joint unity efforts;

5. That those meetings have not taken up the matter of the PLD [Dominican Liberation Party]. We of the MPD, UPA and PTD understand that the manner of presentation of the report to which we are replying was a provocative action, and we suspect that it was ordered by sectors which are enemies of the Dominican revolution interested in keeping the revolutionary groups divided.

Finally, the UPA, MPD and PTD reiterate once again their determination to fight for unity among Dominican revolutionaries, and on that premise they will denounce all those who try to place obtacles in the way of that just aspiration of the Dominican people.

CALL FOR FORMATION OF DEMOCRATIC PATRIOTIC FRONT

Santo Domingo LISTIN DIARIO in Spanish 7 Nov 81 p 9

[Text] The undersigned political parties and democratic organizations of the Dominican Republic, aware that in the next general elections in May, 1982 there will be no polarization between the Reform Party and the Dominican Revolutionary Party, but that rather, on the contrary, the country's voters, who have always achieved a state of law, will tend to be fragmented, endangering that democratic unity which is needed today more than ever--since the Dominican Revolutionary Party has demonstrated that it is willing to remain in power not only by electoral decision, but by any means--have decided to make the following political proposal:

CONSIDERING: That the continuance in power of the Dominican Revolutionary Party would be an economic catastrophe of enormous magnitude, in which all public and private freedoms would be destroyed and which would bring industry and trade to ruin, and that as a result of the ruin our workers and peasants would remain in a state of poverty from which there is no exit;

CONSIDERING: That the country's present plight is not auspicious for even the legitimate aspirations of the many persons who are fit to run for the highest elective offices in the nation, but that the fatherland demands, today more than ever, a renunciation of all personal ambition, because the current state of misgovernment in the republic is placing it in danger of death;

CONSIDERING: That whatever the voting power of all the democratic parties, including the Reform Party, with whose political activities our search for a state of law is being renewed, it will not, if fragmented, have any option to power; and that the Dominican Revolutionary Party has tried very skillfully to make the electorate and the democratic opposition parties believe that its 11th national convention will be divided;

CONSIDERING: That the economy is the backbone of the nation and that in the immediate past it was quite robust, while in the years of government by the PRD it has been declining dangerously because of wretched public administration and the inability to implement a government program which benefits all Dominicans;

CONSIDERING: That the Dominican Revolutionary Party is becoming ever more dangerous because its secretary general, who is trying to take over all the power in that party, has international commitments with political forces which have proven to be destabilizing for the democratic governments of our America; and that that party, in addition to its lack of administrative ability as demonstrated in its years of misgovernment to date, proposes to turn the country's foreign policy over to the decisions of the Central Executive Committee of the PRD (in other words, to the secrtary general of the party), thus usurping the functions of the Executive Branch as granted by the provisions of the constitution;

CONSIDERING: That our economy is on the verge of total collapse because of indiscriminate loans made from an undefined economic policy, which have proved too burdensome for Dominican families and ruined the purchasing power of the country's small middle class and of the Dominican proletariat;

CONSIDERING: That the Dominican Revolutionary Party, from its position of power, has continually ignored the constitution and laws of the republic in actions of the presidency and all government agencies, and that that political conduct is endangering our state of law and our democratic institutions, which cost years of bloody struggle and a very large measure of sacrifice and patriotism;

CONSIDERING: That the country requires, on all social levels, that the government be in hands which are not only suitable and patriotic, but also capable, and that political and administrative ability has been absent from the decisions of the PRD during the years it has been in power:

BE IT RESOLVED: To request Dr Joaquin Balaguer, chairman of the Reform Party, and Francisco Augusto Lora, chairman of the Movement for Democratic Integration, to join with the undersigned parties to form a patriotic and truly democratic front, for the following reasons:

1. That democracy and the state of law in our country, which are in danger today, must not be lost for lack of patriotic resolve and democratic unity at the polls on 16 May 1982.

2. That the Democratic Patriotic Front, composed of all opposition parties for the purpose of serving, and concerned only for the essential interest of the Dominican people, constitutes an organization capable of achieving victory in the elections and thus of being able to form the most exemplary government in our history.

3. We propose this Democratic Patriotic Front because we understand that it is the only political resource which at this time can rescue the republic from economic ruin and from the ominous state of present government policy, which is casting a shadow over the destiny of every free man and over the homes of all democratic Dominicans.

4. We believe that formation of the Democratic Patriotic Front could culminate in political agreements which might encourage and facilitate the Democratic Unity candidacies of Dr Joaquin Balaguer, for president, and Francisco Augusto Lora, for vice president, since broad sectors of the people consider them the most capable political leaders today for encouraging democratic stability and improving the nation's economic health, provided the government team they select is composed of men of recognized moral integrity who are interested in the well-being of our people.

In times of great danger to our nationhood, when foreign forces occupied our national territory and our economy lay ruined, as it does today, and there was no assurance that we would continue to be a free and independent nation, with a democratic system which would ensure all citizens a state of law, Dr Joaquin Balaguer and Francisco Augusto Lora, undertaking an almost impossible task, helped to rescue our humbled national pride, encouraged public freedoms and made an effort to encourage progress for Dominican families.

PAPER CALLS FOR OAS COMMISSION TO INVESTIGATE SALVADORAN CONFLICT

Santo Domingo EL NACIONAL in Spanish 4 Nov 81 p 8

[Editorial: "The Civil War in El Salvador"]

[Text] While every day the number of our brothers who fall victims to the most cruel and dreadful civil was in El Savador increases, one can also see a further cooling of our sensitivity to the barbarousness which has been unleashed on the martyred brother nation.

The news we receive from the theater of the tragic events sno longer awakens in us the horror and sadness we experienced when Archbishop Romero was murdered on the steps of the altar.

We have become familiar with the tragedy.

To what do we owe this growing insensitivity which is coming over us and which will eventually lead to the point where El Salvador and what is taking place there means nothing to us, a situation in which the fratricidal war no longer catches our attention?

To our way of thinking, it is because of the absence of reliable information. It is, in the final analysis, an armed confrontation of the extreme right, in the service of the landholding oligarchy, with the extreme left, under orders from the Kremlin?

Is Napoleon Duarte's government a truly popular government, or is Napoleon Duarte a tool of the armed forces disguised as a social democrat?

If on this and other similar levels we do not have all the facts, we can be even less sure that all the news we receive from Salvadoran sources is true.

The news reports are all contradictory. The armed forces of that country say that the rebels massacre the people who do not join them, while the church, on some occasions--such as yesterday--charges, through its archbishop, Arturo Rivera, that the soldiers kill innocent civilains to point them our as guerrilla fighters killed in combat.

In the midst of this confusion, of this hullabaloo of conflicting reports, we are disoriented, and we would like to find a news source which can bring us the truth, or something as near to it as possible.

The only institution, as we see it, which could create a commission to carry out a minute and exhaustive investigation into the situation, so that America and the world might be informed, is the Organization of American States.

The OAS has formed such commissions on other occasions: for example in the case of El Salvador and Honduras, and in the case of Somóza against the Sandinists. What is it waiting for now? Perhaps the Dominican foreign office could encourage, in OAS headquarters, the formation of such a commission. It would do a service to the democratic peace of America.

CLOSING OF 'MI RADIO' CALLED UNJUSTIFIED

Santo Domingo EL NACIONAL in Spanish 8 Nov 81 p 8

[Editorial: "Unjustified"]

[Text] Yesterday afternoon the government ordered the closing of the local radio station, "Mi Radio."

That is a mistake, by any standards. In a way it revives an expedient we had thought was laid to rest under an authentic government of law: the closing of an electronic social communications medium by simple administrative directive. "Mi Radio" is noted for the presentation of a series of new programs and commentaries critical of the government of President Antonio Guzman and of the official party, the Dominican Revolutionary Party (PRD), Another characteristic of that radio station is its marked anticommunist stand.

One may or may not agree with the way commentaries and news are presented on "Mi Radio." EL NACIONAL itself has been the victim of bitter espressions of opinion by commentators who work for that station.

We cannot for that reason, however, identify ourselves with the simple administrative measure which has ordered the closing of "Mi Radio." EL NACIONAL believes in principles and defends them.

Do the government authorities believe that laws, especially the so-called Law of Expression and Dissemination of Thought, are being violated on "Mi Radio?" Then let those who are considered responsible be given a trial, and let it be a legally constituted court which applies the existing laws after public, oral and contradictory opinions are aired.

EL NACIONAL believes that democracy has mechanisms to defend the system. We are not among those who deny the communists, for example, the right to free expression, claiming that in leftist totalitarian regimes there is no freedom of expression. If we deny the communists the right, under penalty of law, to express themselves, how are we different from them or from their governments in various parts of the world?

During Dr Joaquin Balaguer's administration, radio stations and air waves were closed by simple administrative rulings. The PRD and its chief leaders, including its secretary general, Dr Jose Francisco Pena Gomez, were victims of arbitrary measures because of their work for the opposition, even to the extent of being forbidden, by order of [the Ministry of] Telecommunications, the use of the electronic social communications media.

Telecommunications, on thos occasions, invoked its "organic law," which was established for questions of a technical nature and included, in a capricious manner, the power to censor the free broadcast of thought. At the beginning of Mr Guzman's administration, paradoxically, Telecommunications called upon the same arguments used by officials of the Balaguer regime to close radio stations in La Romana and Higuey, as well as "Mi Radio." Those officials forgot that they were victimizing others with the same weapons that had been unjustly applied to them. EL NACIONAL believes that all the social communications media and all citizens should respect the authorities and each other. But EL NACIONAL, faithful to its principles, cannot overlook any excess: nobody can take the law into his own hands, not even those who govern.

The Law of Expression and Dissemination of Thought is clear and precise: anyone who violates it must be brought to justice, and it is a court which must decide the punishment in the case, after proving the guilt of the accused.

President Guzman would do well, then, to review the interdict against "Mi Radio," even though some of his advisers and counsellors may be annoyed by the criticisms directed toward them or which may directed toward the chief of state or his administration by that station.

President Guzman does not miss any opportunity to tell how his constitutional government is contributing to the institutionalization of the country. The fact that a social communications medium has been closed by simple administrative dictim does poor service to that institutionalization.

FINANCE MINISTER PREDICTS SLIGHT 1981 BUDGET DECREASE

San Salvador EL MUNDO in Spanish 23 Oct 81 p 3

[Text] The minister of finance, Dr Jorge Eduardo Tenorio, has informed EL MUNDO that the nation's general expenditures budget for next year will be slightly less than this year's, which totals 1.988 billion colones.

The minister said the government has tried to reduce it by a small percentage, by something less than 5 percent of the figure previously quoted, if possible. He added that this budget decrease "is in line with the general policy of austerity being pressed by the government and with the real economic situation of the country."

"That policy," he said, "is to reduce the deficit as much as possible, without prejudice, however, to the maintenance of an adequate employment level in the public sector and a sufficient flow of public investment."

He affirmed that the budget reductions will be applied without discrimination; that is, they will affect all the ministries. The policy of not creating new positions and of freezing those that for one reason or another become vacant will be enforced, Dr Tenorio explained.

He also said El Salvador's balance of payments deficit at this time totals 450 million colones, which he maintains "is low under the circumstances in which the country is now living."

As causes of this situation, he cited the flight of capital, the price drop in the products the country exports, the immoderate rise in energy raw materials prices, the internal political convulsion and other adverse circumstances.

The finance minister stated that the balance of payments deficit will be kept low "thanks to the government's policy of austerity and the Salvadoran people's spirit of sacrifice."

JUNTA RESTATES DECISION NOT TO NEGOTIATE WITH GUERRILLAS

San Salvador EL MUNDO in Spanish 23 Oct 81 p 3

[Text] The Government Junta last night reaffirmed that it will not negotiate with armed groups and that it maintains its decision to hold elections next year.

In this regard, the Secretariat of Information issued the following statement:

"The Revolutionary Government Junta states to national and international public opinion:

"That during the stay of American Senator Christopher Dodd in our country last week, at no time in the talks held with him was any consideration in the least given to the possibility of negotiating a solution to the Salvadoran crisis with organized armed sectors, nor even to that of establishing a private informal dialogue with such sectors.

"In all the contacts had with Senator Dodd, it was held that the electoral process is the appropriate instrument for achieving a peaceful and democratic solution, whose fundamental requisite is interparty dialogue, in which all legally registered parties can participate, with no discrimination whatever of an ideological and political nature.

"It was also stated to Mr Dodd that the Salvadoran Revolutionary Government's position is that of neither negotiating nor proposing bases for dialogue with the armed groups of the FMLN [Farabundo Marti National Liberation Front], or with any other sector of similar nature, to reach agreements behind the people's backs.

"Therefore, any information that may be circulated the sense of which is contrary to this statement which is being issued domestically and internationally may be a willful distortion or tergiversation of the facts. The Revolutionary Government restates its unbreakable determination to deploy its utmost efforts, together with the people and their Armed Forces, to ensure the holding of free elections in El Salvador next year, in order to thus lay the groundwork for democracy and peace.

ACES SEEKS JUNTA AID IN CURING COFFEE INDUSTRY'S ILLS

San Salvador EL MUNDO in Spanish 23 Oct 81 p 2

[Text] In a release issued late yesterday, the ACES [Coffee Growers Association of El Salvador] asked the authorities who have not responded to the growers' requests for assistance in resolving the problem of the coffee industry to "work for the benefit of the Salvadoran people without demagoguery."

The ACES release says:

"Once again the ACES reiterates to the governmental authorities the need to work for the benefit of the Salvadoran people without demagoguery and especially with respect to everything that can mean an improvement in the Salvadoran economy which is undergoing such buffeting in these difficult times while attempts are being made to establish systems that it is hoped will bring about immediately beneficial changes in the various aspects of national life.

"It is beyond our comprehension that in such a physically small country such as ours the communications arteries, which have cost the general collectivity so much, can be so neglected. The situation demands that we have the courage needed to recognize that the Public Works authorities are inoperative; that they seek solely, through publicity, to confuse the people, offering them hopes of something that never materializes. We have said on many occasions that all the communications arteries are in abominable condition, but the said Public Works authorities have remained indifferent to our call; and instead of getting on with the repair of at least the vicinal roads that communicate with large human settlements, and despite the fact that many of the country's schools have been shut down for lack of access, halting the process of integral development of the country, they talk of vast and costly future projects involving greater public debt.

"The coffee crop is about to be harvested and not a single communications artery has been repaired as yet. It is to be supposed that the government authorities are the representatives of the people. We understand that the situation is difficult, but the least that can be done to maintain the little that is left is to ensure that the communications arteries are in usable condition so as not to cause more anguish, and that productions costs are kept down to a minimum so as to make it possible to live resignedly through this period in our nation's history--the more so since the measures the Salvadoran people are enduring have been imposed by that very government, which must therefore mitigate their effects through tangible efforts that enable the Salvadoran citizen to seek his own subsistence by way of productive work.

"Mr Minister of Public Works: Set all hands en masse to the job of repairing the communications arteries. Thus can the image it is being sought to convey of our country be quickly justified. If the minister of foreign trade actually said in an interview published in the magazine WORLD COFFEE & TEA on page 44 of the June issue, "In a country where the growing and processing of coffee account for 60 percent of its foreign exchange and 25 percent of its total labor force---," then more specific and responsible action is called for, toward ensuring that the forthcoming crop is harvested under the best possible conditions by improving the access roads throughout the Republic. PRIME MINISTER BISHOP'S COMMENTS ON MILITARY SUPPORT

U.S. Military Aid to Barbados

FL262246 Bridgetown CANA in English 2235 GMT 26 Nov 81

[Article by Alister Hughes]

[Text] St Georges, Grenada, 26 Nov (CANA)--Grenada Prime Minister Maurice Bishop says the United States expects to sell Barbados 5 million dollars (U.S.) in arms this year and another 2 million dollars worth in 1982. Bishop's statement last night came as he addressed the closing session of a week-long international conference in solidarity with the Grenada revolution of March 1979.

The Grenada leader said his information comes from a document entitled "Security Assistance Program," which is the U.S. Congressional presentation dealing with the foreign military sales financing program, the economic support fund, the military assistance program, the international military education and training program and peace-keeping operations. The prime minister said the definition of "Eastern Caribbean" in the document covers all the English-speaking islands from (?St Thomas) to St Vincent, including Barbados but excluding Grenada, and it proposes that 5.5 million dollars (U.S.) of arms be sold to these islands in 1982.

The proposal for Jamaica is sales of 1 million dollars next year with an estimate of over 1.5 million dollars in 1981. The document contains arguments as to why military and economic support should be given to some of these islands, Bishop said, and he read excerpts in this connection relative to Barbados.

According to the document read by Bishop, the United States has a major interest in assuring that the nations of Eastern Caribbean are politically stable, are free from undue outside influence and maintain their generally high standards of democratic practice and human rights performance. The document says Barbados serves as a model for the region and has supported U.S. global and regional interests, including the promotion of human rights and regional cooperation. The assistance proposed for Barbados, the document says, will promote U.S. interests in Barbados and demonstrate U.S. support for, among other things, the island's willingness to initiate, on a regional basis, a modest but solid security program in concert with and complementary to that of the United States.

The program is positive indication of our commitment to regional stability in the light of continuing Cuban support for the radical government of Grenada, the document says. Bishop said the United States was not trying to hide what its intentions were. They are coming out very openly and saying that they have this right to do what they want in our region, he said, to get in to a big arms build up in the region, to promote countries they feel will support them and to try to use those countries to isolate countries like Grenada.

Part-Time Revolutionary Militia

FL271935 Bridgetown CANA in English 1720 GMT 27 Nov 81

[Text] St Georges, Grenada, 27 Nov (CANA)--Grenadians have come to understand that it is necessary to be armed in order to defend their homeland and that a people's revolutionary militia is both a practical matter and a matter of principle. Prime Minister Maurice Bishop expressed this thought in his address which brought the solidarity with Grenada conference to a close last night.

It is a practical matter, he said, because the island could never afford a large standing army and because, "when they come for us," it will be in the thousands and, apart from the full-time standing army, what is needed is a part-time revolutionary militia. "It is also a matter of principle," Bishop said, "because we have come to understand better and better that one of the lessons we can extract from the experience of other revolutionary processes in this region is that sometimes thay have failed because their people were not armed and they had to rely on their standing armies. And the same standing armies they were relying on were the same armies which got involved in coup d'etats.

Bishop's New Jewel Movement (NJM) seized power in a revolution on 13 March 1979.

The prime minister said he has an answer for those who ask him whether the People's Revolutionary Government (PRG), is not afraid to arm the people and whether, at some point, the people might not use their arms against the government. "When, on revolution morning, 46 of us went down to the radio station, after charging the barracks and routing Gairy's 'green beast army'," he said, "our lives were on the line and the reason our people responded and came out to our call is because they trust, respect and know our party and the leadership of this country." Bishop said that what the people knew about the NJM and its leadership in 1979, they know a million times better in 1981.

Bishop said the conference reminded Grenadians of the struggle that Libyans have had to make in recent months. "Imperialism, using its twin-sister of the media, has been trying to portray over the past 3 months that the most dangerous and wanted man in the world is Mu'ammar al-Qadhdhafi," Bishop said.

Bishop said that the action by the imperialists was because Mr al-Qadhdhafi had supported national liberation struggles. "The Libyan leader now finds that his country and people are openly villified and his planes are subject to being down when they are flying over their own sovereign territory," he said.

Mr Bishop continued: "The past few days have also reminded us in a very positive and forceful way that we do have solutions (to the struggles) and that one common solution is unity, the international unity of our people and the external unity of all forces interested in peace, democracy, social progress and national liberation."

The prime minister said the conference had also brought to mind the struggles of Namibia, Vietnam, Ethiopia, Cuba and Nicaragua. He reminded the delegates, "there are solutions to these struggles."

PEACE GROUP CALLS FOR U.S.-SOVIET TALKS TO END ARMS RACE

Bridgetown ADVOCATE-NEWS in English 29 Oct 81 p 7

[Text]

St. Georges, Grenada Wednesday, (CANA) — The Grenada Peace Council (GPC), has called on the super powers to bring an end to the arms race in an effort to promote world peace.

The GPC has suggested that both the United States and the Soviet Union should begin negotiations on halting the stock-piling of nuclear weapons towards a means of "total" disarmament.

The GPC made the call in a statement issued today under a programme to mark World Peace Week as designated by the World Peace Council which is being observed this week by member countries of the organisation.

The statement said that the arms race does not only increase the danger of war but the forces and funds which it consumes could save millions of children from poverty, hunger, disease and death.

"The reality and feasibility of disarmament are confirmed by the successes achieved in the past decade, the agreements signed and the talks being held on the various questions convincingly show that this is a fully attainable goal", it added.

The GPC was particularly hostile to the decision by the United States Administration of President Ronald Reagan to produce the neutron bomb.

The statement said that while millions of people throughout the world are demanding a lasting agreement on disarmament the Reagan Administration had agreed to produce the neutron bomb which destroys life but leaves behind very little or no damage to property.

"The worldwide storm of protest against this decision by the United States Administration to manufacture the neutron bomb is the only appropriate and pertinent answer to the U.S. Administrations warmongers," the Council said.

The statement went on: "The Grenada Peace Council also calls on the people of the Caribbean, and in Grenada in particular, to strongly voice their opinions against the neutron bomb and the need for disarmament.

"We are convinced that the combined efforts of not only the governments and organisations but also of all the people no matter where they live and work and will certainly assist in preparing the foundations upon which the cause of peace, justice and human dignity will superfluously triumph", it said.

MINISTRY OF AGRICULTURE TEAM IN MEXICO FOR FERTILIZER STUDY

St Georges FREE WEST INDIAN in English 31 Oct 81 p 7

[Text] A two-man team from the Ministry of Agriculture left for Mexico last Tuesday to examine its methods of producing fertilisers and to see if they can be implemented here.

According to Minister of Agriculture George Louison, this came as a result of a follow-up visit he paid to Mexico, having gone there earlier this month with Prime Minister Maurice Bishop.

He had discussions with his Mexican counterparts on the possibility of providing Grenada with fertilisers and fertiliser-mixing plants.

The two Lesley Cruick-shank and Lester Nelson, will spend one week in Mexico.

Another of the concrete results of the visit was the establishment of a mixed commission which will meet annually to examine cooperation on economic and social levels, and a joint working party to look at trade between the two countries.

Bro Louison viewed with the Mexicans the possibility of establishing air links, and exchanging tourists, training Grenadians in air traffic control to ensure the smooth functioning of the international airport, and Mexico's helping with the packaging of some of Grenada's fruits and vegetables.

As a result of PM Bishop's earlier visit, a team of Mexican geologists was already here, looking at the country's rock formations, to see if they contain oil.

Bro. Louison commented that these negotiations with Mexico represent an important step the Revolution has taken to develop co-operation and ties of friendship with a country that has shown its historic position in fighting on the side of poor people in the region struggling for liberation, and in showing kindness and sympathy for countries building their own processes. In particular, the discussions in agriculture, he said directly relate to the PRG's attempts to expand production and find new ways to assist farmers.

The negotiations are further linked, he said, with the PRG's pledge to expand markets and encourage countries in the region to come closer and participate in Grenada's trade.

He saw these negotiations as part of the south-to-south cooperation, where more developed countries in a better financial position, can help build the economies of less fortunate ones.

Bro. Louison while in Mexico, spoke on the initiation of the New Jewel Movement (NJM) into yet another anti-imperialist, democratic organisation--the Permanent Conference of Latin American Progressive Parties, (COPPAL).

COPPAL, an organisation fighting for the genuine development of countries, has representatives of 26 political parties in the Caribbean and Latin America. NJM and the People's National Party of Jamaica are the only members from the English-speaking Caribbean.

LOCAL, CUBAN WORKERS VOLUNTEER LABOR FOR AIRPORT CONSTRUCTION

St Georges FREE WEST INDIAN in English 31 Oct 81 p 5

[Text] Workers constructing the international airport at Point Salines contributed $245,000 through voluntary work, during their three-week "ideological journey of work" in memory of two fallen leaders of the Cuban Revolution, Che Guevara and Camilio Cienfuegos.

This came out at a rally to end the "journey" last Wednesday, the 21st anniversary of Camilio's disappearance in an aircraft, and to bid farewell to the first 28 Cubans who will be returning home, having worked at the airport for nearly two years.

The "journey" began on October 8, 14th anniversary of Che's murder in Bolivia, and during it, the workers put in 15,841 volunteer hours, working an extra hour every day and half-day on Sundays.

Cuban workers volunteered 14,290, hours and Grenadians 551. There are about 410 Grenadians working at the airport site, the cement storehouse in Grand Anse, the quarry in Mt. Hartman, and rebuilding the housing settlement in Calliste. Of these, 250 participated in the "journey," about 80 actively, said John Rullow, Grenadian personnel control officer.

Cuban doctors, teachers and workers in other areas such as economic collaboration, also put in 720 hours.

Under a billboard that read, "Camilio, Che their combatant example guides us," and sharing a podium with Prime Minister Maurice Bishop; Minister of Communications, Works and Labour General Hudson Austin; former Works Minister, now Minister of National Mobilisation Selwyn Strachan; and Cuban Ambassador Julian Rizo, Eduard de la Osa, chief of Cuban personnel, told the hundreds of workers present of their achievements during the "journey."

They moved 10,018 cubic metres of earth on the runway; blasted 2,437 linear metres of holes; blew up 9,105 cubic metres of earth; produced 171 cubic metres of concrete, making 21 slabs; produced and spread out 425 metric tons of asphalt mixture; produced 388 cubic metres of stone in the mill; prepared 80 covers for hardening the concrete slabs; repacked and moved cement for the batching plant and improved conditions in the dining-barracks and kitchen.

Moreover, they had no accidents.

To hand-claps and calls, the outstanding workers in each category climbed the podium to shake hands with the leaders and collect a certificate.

Five Grenadians got awards: mechanic Terrence Wilson, laboratory assistant Peter Joseph; batching plant operator Martin Hinds; tractor and drill operator George Benjamin and truck drive Enthan Joseph.

Also receiving certificates of appreciation were the 28 departing Cubans, who arrived on December 6, 1979, on the ship "Palm Islands" with 93 pieces of equipment to start the airport.

The "journey" has speeded up work on the airport, said project coordinator Bob Evans. The concrete touchdown turning area of the runway is about complete and workers have started paving the runway with asphalt.

They are now laying the mould for the parking apron, and should start casting concrete there next week.

Dredging of Hardy Bay has finished and pipes are now being laid, to start backfilling the Bay with sand, tomorrow. Three dykes have been constructed across the bay to retain the sand.

Meanwhile, a team from Plessey Electronics in England is here, to negotiate for navigation and communication aids and fire-fighting equipment.

FOREIGN POLICY NOT TO BLAME FOR TOURIST INDUSTRY DECLINE

Bridgetown ADVOCATE-NEWS in English 6 Nov 81 p 9

[Text] ST. GEORGE'S, Grenada, Thursday (CANA) — The state-owned "Radio Free Grenada" has supported claims by the island's leftist government that the conduct of its foreign policy was not to be blamed for the decline of the island's tourist industry.

The station said last night that the decline of the tourist trade in Grenada was not a result of the Cuban presence here, but due to economic recession in the major western industrialised countries.

It added that Grenada was not the only island in the Caribbean to have a drop in the number of cruise ship arrivals, but that other major tourist destinations such as Jamaica, Barbados, the Bahamas and Puerto Rico were also affected.

It noted that despite a decline in the tourist industry here, the island had been able to maintain a relatively balanced situation in relation to other Caribbean islands, while being faced by "the most difficult and dangerous political circumstances," under which it has ever been forced to operate.

The optimistic view of problems resulting in the decline of the island's tourism sector is in contrast with a report on the state of the tourism industry in the Spice Isle, submitted earlier in the year to government by the Grenada Chamber of Commerce and the Grenada Hotel's Association.

The report said in part that repeat visitors to Grenada had declined by 65 per cent and that the decrease in the cruise liner trade was estimated to cost the island US$1.5 million.

The report said that the decline in tourism was due to international speeches made by the island's leftist government.

It said too that the conduct of its foreign relations, its voting pattern in the United Nations and its dependence on Cuba, were equally relevent to the decline.

However, the radio said that a major factor responsible for the decline in tourism was the lack of an international airport, as shown in a recent survey conducted by the Grenada Tourist Board.

It also said that the industry had been subjected to a massive propaganda campaign which was launched by the United States against the Maurice Bishop Regime.

Bishop's Goverment came to power in a March 1979 armed uprising against the Eric Gairy Regime.

The radio reported that although the island's tourism industry had been on the decline in the past two years, the government was taking steps to improve the industry, including the establishment of an inter-line desk at Grantley Adams International Airport in Barbados.

It said too that while Grenada could not refer to any "drastic improvement" in the tourist trade during the last year, the situation could not be described as disastrous.

In spite of the drop in the number of tourists travelling to the island, the fact remained that the average length of stayover visitors to Grenada has been rising this year, it said.

Total earnings from the industry during the first nine months of the year indicated that the yearend figure would surpass that received last year.

The radio suggested that what is needed to boost tourism was increased "dynamism" among private sector hoteliers in Grenada so that the area of international marketing could be further developed.

There should be joint marketing activities between government and private hoteliers' it said.

BRIEFS

SOLIDARITY CONFERENCE PLANS--St Georges, Grenada, Oct 24 (From our correspondent) The People's Revolutionary Government will host an "International solidarity conference" in order to counter what has been called "pressures from United States imperialism in particular and other forces who would like to see the process in Grenada turned back." Speaking to reporters in Grenada today, Minister of Mobilisation, Selwyn Strachan, said invitations have already been issued for the conference which will take place at the Conference Centre on Grendanse Beach from November 23-25. Strachan said invitations to the conference have already been accepted by several organisations in the United States including the Black United Front and Grenada-Friendship groups which exist in Washington, Detroit, Philadelphia, New York and cities. The Minister declined to name "certain individuals" from North America who, he said, would come to the conference, but said Dr Neville Duncan of the University of the West Indies would be one of the participants. Among other representatives at the conference, Strachan said, would be personnel from the People's National Party of Jamaica, the Working People's Party of Guyana, the South West Africa Peoples' Organisation of Nambia, the African National Congress, the Patriotic Front of Zimbabwe, the Polasario Front of the Sahara Arab Democratic Republic, the Palestine Liberation Organization, the Governments of Ethiopia, Nigeria, Iran, Syria, Libya and the British Labour Party, the Socialist Party of France and other parties of Socialist International. CUBAN TECHNICAL TEAM--St George's, Grenada--A five-man team of technical experts from Cuba has arrived here for talks with the Grenada government on a wide range of areas, the Cuban embassy in Grenada has announced. A release said that the delegation will hold discussions with government officials on the location of sites for the setting up of a number of projects including an ice plant, a pre-fabricated cement plant, sporting facilities and a depot. The embassy said the visit is a follow-up to a technical and cooperation agreement signed between Grenada and Cuba last month. The agreement involves cooperation between the two countries in areas such as education, health, housing, agriculture, agro-industry, and the construction of Grenada's international airport, at Point Saline. Cuba has been providing assistance to Grenada's ruling New Jewel Movement (NJM), which came to power here in a March 1979, armed revolution, in areas such as fisheries and project construction. The team leaves during the week. (CANA) [Text] [Bridgetown SUNDAY SUN in English 1 Nov 81 p 9]

VICE PRESIDENT DESCRIBES NEW LABOR RECRUITMENT AGENCY

Georgetown GUYANA CHRONICLE in English 27 Oct 81 p 24

[Text]

The Government of Guyana is about to establish a Central Regional Manpower Agency to co-ordinate labour recruitment and placement in the public sector and replace the existing Labour Exchange Bureau.

This announcement was made by Vice President, Hamilton Green at the weekend when he addressed graduates of the 22nd Intake Pioneers at Kimbia Agricultural Production Centre some 120 kilometres up the Berbice River.

The occasion was witnessed by a number of special invitees including Cde Desmond Roberts former Director General and Guyana's Military Attache at the Guyana Embassy in Brazil, his wife, and senior officers of the Disciplined Services.

Cde Green explained that the new agency will be the single body to determine who goes where and what jobs are available. And in support of a commitment by Prime Minister Ptolemy Reid at a similar ceremony held last year at Papaya Training Centre, Cde Green emphasised that graduate pioneers will continue to enjoy clear priority in job opportunities. He advised them to use the training they received to help create new jobs and enterprises, make themselves self-reliant and help others. "Get on with the job," he urged, "set the example wherever you go, become leaders and help build Guyana with your own hands".

He advised them also against falling into the rut of everyday life or adopting the legacy of lack of self-confidence. Instead they should stand tall and maintain their dignity, he said.

Earlier in his address, the Vice President expressed satisfaction that one of the three platoons on parade was carried by a woman soldier -- 2Lt. Audrey Telford. He considered it of particular interest to him since, he said he has a constitutional responsibility for women.

Cde Green remarked that the display of drills reminded him of his days in the Volunteer Force. He noted that the drills were done to the tune of the Guyana National Service theme song, "I want to build," which symbolises the strength and determination of the organisation.

"I want to build" and "Not a blade of grass" have special meanings to him, he added.

Cde Green also told graduates, special invitees, GNS representatives and others present that the GNS was established to occupy an important position in the history of Guyana and the Third World, and not as an excuse to set up 'another army.' He pointed out that if the latter was necessary, the Government of Guyana would have expanded the Army instead or increase the numbers in the Police Force.

Speaking on the need for restructure the world economic order, Vice-President Green said the world is in chaos and is experiencing its worst economic recession in 40 years. "Millions are unemployed" he said, adding that the figure for England alone might reach three million mark by year-end.

The Vice-President then spoke on the need to change old ideas as a means of helping the nation move from the state of political independence to social and economic freedom and development. He however explained that while a change of attitude was necessary and urgent, some concepts handed down from the pre-Independence era could be retained and adhered to. (GNA)

BURNHAM AT PRESS CONFERENCE REVIEWS CANCUN CONFERENCE

Georgetown SUNDAY CHRONICLE in English 1 Nov 81 pp 1, 2

[Text] President Forbes Burnham said yesterday he feels justified in expressing the hope that one abiding result of the Cancun Summit "will be an improvement in the political climate for cooperation between North and South, and for constructive action in the years ahead."

He told a Press conference: "I think that the real achievement of Cancun was tow-fold:

"First, it provided an opportunity for some of the influential leaders of the world to come together, share ideas on the critical issues affecting the world economy and understand one another's points of view; and, second, it facilitated a consensus on the need for practical approaches to the solution of the identified problems."

In response to a question, the President added that, generally, there was a serious appreciation of the problems of the countries of the North by those of the South.

He identified countries like Japan, Austria, West Germany and Sweden which offered to write off debts as "outstanding" in this area.

But he pointed out that such appreciation did not come "out of bleeding hearts" but out of "self-interest."

"I returned last Saturday from Cancun, Mexico, where having been invited to participate, I attended the International Meeting on Cooperation and Development held on the 22nd and 23rd of this month. Altogether eight industrialised and fourteen developing States took part in the Meeting.

"Guyana was the only English-speaking Caribbean country represented at that Summit and while technically we could not speak for any other country, the concerns of the region as a whole, and of Caricom in particular, were always uppermost in our minds.

"The meeting was held against a background of a deteriorating International Economic Situation--one of deepening crisis adversely affecting both developed and developing countries. The crisis compelled recognition of the true nature of the interdependence of the world's economies and an acceptance of the need for solutions based on the principle of mutual benefit.

"Equally important was the fact that, despite the persistence of many developing and developed countries, efforts at the wider international level to launch a Global Round of Negotiations had not yet borne fruit.

"In a sense, these were old issues identified for urgent solution by the Brandt Commission of which a distinguished Guyanese, Shridath Ramphal, Secretary-General of the Commonwealth, and our former Foreign Minister, was an active and leading member.

"The Cancun Summit was, by prior agreement, to be political in character and informal in nature. Its objective was seen as providing an opportunity for leaders at the highest political level to have an exchange of views on major issues relating to development with a view to facilitating agreement with regard to the Global Round of Negotiations, and giving positive political impetus to efforts in various forums for International Economic Cooperation.

"As you know, there was no formal agenda. However, it had been agreed that the Meeting would proceed within a framework of discussions on The Future of International Cooperation for Development and the Reactivation of the World Economy including areas such as food security and agricultural development; commodities trade and industrialisation; energy; and monetary and financial issues.

"Prior to the Meeting, it had also been agreed that there would be no official communique but that the two Co-chairmen would issue a joint Press statement giving a summary of the discussions and conclusions. A copy of this has, I understand, been made available to you.

"The Summit also offered an opportunity for me to meet with a number of Heads. Apart from consultations with my Commonwealth colleagues, whom you will recall, I had the pleasure of meeting recently at Melbourne, I had discussions with the President of the United States of America, the President of France, the Prime Minister of China, the President of the Presidency of the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, the President of Algeria, and, of course, President Portillo of Mexico.

"I also participated in a number of T.V. and Press interviews which highlighted the issues taken up at Cancun and, in a more general sense, Guyana's foreign relations.

"As you yourselves may by now appreciate, the discussions at the Cancun Summit were characterised by seriousness, candour and cordiality.

"All the leaders at Cancun whether from developed or developing states recognised that, on the question of food and energy, crisis proportions had been reached. Indeed, in the summary presented by the Co-chairmen of the conference it was stated that "Persistent and widespread manifestations of hunger are incompatible with the level of development attained by the world economy and, in particular, with existing food production capacity."

"On the opening day I spoke briefly on what Guyana saw as the essential objectives to be pursued. I understand that you all have copies of my remarks.

"During the subsequent exchanges, I spoke on other matters including one of special concern to us, namely, energy. What I said essentially was this, that the issue required immediate attention because it was seriously inhibiting the growth opportunities of many countries, especially the least developed ones, and contributing to the recessionary trend in the world economy.

"I suggested that action on this matter should include immediate intensification of oil exploration in developing countries, financial and other support for the development of new and renewable sources of energy, especially hydroelectricity, and the preparation of a World Energy Plan to promote energy production and efficient distribution and utilisation.

"As you will expect, I drew attention to our vast hydroelectric potential and our current efforts to develop this, not only because of the critical role of such energy resources for our own development, but also because of our long standing policy of making the resources of Guyana available for the development of the region.

"A most important matter discussed at Cancun was the question of the Global Round of Negotiations. You may remember that last year at the United Nations, agreement was not possible because of the positions taken then by the United States of America, Great Britain and the Federal Republic of Germany.

"In Cancun, as you will see from the summary of the Co-chairmen, all the Heads of State and Government confirmed the desirability of supporting at the United Nations, with a sense of urgency, a consensus to launch the Global Negotiations on a basis to be mutually agreed and in circumstances offering the prospect of meaningful progress. Some countries, however, insisted that the competence of the specialised agencies should not be affected.

"It is clear, therefore, that there are still differences relating to the Global Round of Negotiations; but I hope that the spirit which characterised the discussions on this issue will have a positive effect at the United Nations where, in the weeks ahead, the search will be undertaken for agreement on the early launching of the Global Round.

"You may legitimately ask whether Cancun was a success. I would answer that few international conferences succeed in an absolute sense, more particularly where as in the case of Cancun the subject involved fundamental issues and divergent points of view.

"It should also be remembered that Cancun was political in character and was not intended to negotiate solutions to the pressing problems which were discussed. Rather, its purpose was, to secure a general acknowledgement of the grave and critical nature of these problems, and to enable the participants to reach a firm political decision to promote and facilitate processes leading to the urgent solution of those problems.

"I think that the real achievement of Cancun was two-fold. First, it provided an opportunity for some of the influential leaders of the world to come together, share ideas on the critical issues affecting the world economy and understand one another's points of view; and, second, it facilitated a consensus on the need for practical approaches to the solution of the identified problems.

"Finally, I feel justified in expressing the hope that one abiding result of Cancun will be an improvement in the political climate for co-operation between North and South for constructive action in the years ahead.

VISITING CUBAN DEPUTY FOREIGN MINISTER AT PRESS CONFERENCE

Kingston THE DAILY GLEANER in English 12 Nov 81 p 1

[Text]

GEORGETOWN, Guyana, Nov. 10 (CANA-Reuter):

CUBAN DEPUTY FOREIGN Minister Ricardo Alarcon said yesterday that Cuba as part and parcel of the Caribbean was committed to building relations of mutual help with the rest of the region and that the recent break-off by Jamaica of its relations with Cuba would not affect the island's friendly ties with other Caribbean nations.

The Deputy Foreign Minister, accompanied by the head of the Caribbean section in the Cuban Freign Affairs Ministry Nelson Restano, was addressing a press conference du ing a two-day visit to Guyana, the first leg of a tour that takes him today to Suriname, then on to Trinidad and Tobago, Barbados, Grenada and Saint Lucia.

Questioned about the Jamaican government charge that Cuba was harbouring three wanted criminals, Deputy Minister Alarcon said that despite the matter being aired weeks before in the Jamaican parliament, it was only the day before Jamaica broke off relations, that the first diplomatic note on the matter was received by Cuba, in which the Seaga government demanded the return of three men, allegedly in Cuba under different names but off ering no proof or clues that might help in finding them.

"The note said they were in Cuba and included an ultimatum that they should be back in Jamaica in 24 hours", said Alarcon.

"As fdr as we know, the men are not in Cuba and we have never given them any status there", he added.

Minister Alarcon said that the speed with which Jamaica closed its emdassy in Havana and the tone of its diplomatic note indicated that the decision to break off relations had been taken before the matter was raised with Cuba. "The issue was only an excuse when Seaga had suggested to break relations", said Alarcon.

The Cuban Deputy Minister also charged that the United States government was behind a series of press articles in the U.S. accusing Cuba of military involvement in Central America, and threatening military action against Cuba.

On the issue of the recent decision taken in Dominica that students will not be allowed to take up scholarships in Cuba, Alarcon said, "I feel sorry for the Dominican youngsters who will not be able to further their studies in Cuba, in one of the areas we can co-operate with other Caribbean countries. Bu if the Dominica government will not prmit this, it is their decision".

The Cuban Minister also reiterated that Cuba fully supported Guyana's right to territorial integrity in the face of the Venezuelan border claim.

"We do not agree with the Venezuelan claim over a boundary that has been legally established and we oppose the recent expansionist approach of Caracas", he said.

ACTING PRESIDENT REID SENDS CONGRATULATIONS TO USSR

Georgetown GUYANA CHRONICLE in English 7 Nov 81 p 1

[Text]

ACTING President Cde. Ptolemy Reid has expressed the hope that the bonds of friendship and co-operation between Guyana and the Soviet Union will be strengthened as the two countries continue their struggle to build a better future for their peoples.

In a message despatched to Soviet President Leonid I. Brezhnev, to mark the 64th anniversary of the Great October Socialist Revolution, Cde. Reid also referred to the friendly ties which have developed steadily between Guyana and the Soviet Union. These relations, he said, have contributed to a fruitful and beneficial co-operation between the two countries.

In his message, Cde. Reid said:

"It is with pleasure that I send warm fraternal greetings and heartiest congratulations on my behalf, and on behalf of the party, government and people of Guyana, to you, the Communist party of the Soviet Union, the government and people of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics on the occasion of the 64th anniversary of the Great October Socialist Revolution.

"Since the establishment of diplomatic relations between the USSR and Guyana, our two countries have steadily developed friendly ties based on sovereign equality respect and understanding. These relations have contributed to a fruitful and beneficial co-operation between the two countries.

"I wish to express the hope that these bonds of friendship and co-operation will be further strengthened as we continue our struggle to build a better future for our peoples.

"May I take this opportunity of extending to you my best wishes for your good health and for the continued prosperity and progress of the Soviet Union."

The USSR will celebrate the 64th anniversary of the Great October Socialist revolution today.

Guyana and the Soviet Union established diplomatic relations on December 17, 1970.

PPP CHARACTERIZES CANCUN AS 'WASTE OF TIME,' RAPS U.S.

Georgetown MIRROR in English 25 Oct 81 p 1

[Text] Describing the Cancun Summit as one of sharks and sardines, the People's Progressive Party, in a press statement, has analysed the Summit meeting and exposed its shortcomings and inadequacies. The statement reads:—

The recently convened Heads of State Summit at Cancun in Mexico is a waste of time and energy (and financial resources) by those leaders from the Third World who fervently believe that measures to help the suffering Third World economies would emerge from it. The People's Progressive Party has no illusions over the outcome. It would be negative. The conference is the summit version of the jaded "North-South Dialogue" in which imperialism has no intention of giving up its ruthless exploitation of the Third World.

It is significant that the socialist countries did not attend the Summit, partly because of the deliberate exclusion of Cuba by US pressure and partly because of the remote possibility of any real workable solutions emerging from it. As if to undeline the disparate tendencies gathered there, there is to be no communique. What the summit conference entails is an exchange of views between exploiters and exploited.

The restructuring of international relations, particularly economic relations is a current demand of the Third World and is quite natural in view of built-in imbalances. There has been significant lack of progress in the implementation of UN decisions on the establishment of a New International Economic Order, (NIEO) chiefly because of stubborn opposition from the imperialists (the North). The USA has actually demanded tougher lending terms to the Third World from the IMF and the World Bank in the interest of transnationals.

The socialist countries support the N.I.E.O, and are advocating a global approach to economic relations and not narrow meetings as exemplified by Cancun, where only 22 countries participated. There are about 120 Third World countries today represented in the United Nations. With only such a small participation Cancun can hardly be said to be logical or representative.

The PPP feels that the way to a solution of the problems facing the non-socialist world, is for those countries to break out of the ambit of old pro-imperialist policies; an end to the world-wide imperialist-inspired arms race; global security and detente; the vast sums freed thus from bloated arms budgets, should be invested in economic development projects. These very points were made in the Willy Brant Commission Report on the deeping crisis of capitalism.

BATTLE LINES DEMARCATED

The peoples of the world have to wage their own struggle against the monopolies in order to liberate themselves from capitalism, and place their countries on the road to socialist orientation. Imperialism will not concede this liberation without a fierce fight. Mere dialogue at Summit level can only serve to further demarcate battle lines.

The embattled capitalist system is currently in the throes of its worst recession since the crash of 1929 which brought to power fascist regimes in Europe and Japan and triggered world war two. Most capitalist states today experience growing huge balance of payments deficits. The Third World alone however pays US$125 billion per annum in tribute to the developed capitalist states. This type of booty would not be given up at Cancun through "dialogue". The USA alone between 1970-78 invested US$8.7 billion in the Third World (the South) but obtained a fabulous US$39.7 billion in profits.

Imperialism has also imposed a number of protectionist measures against imports from the Third World, while simultaneously seeking to batter down Third World defences by various means. Earlier in the year there was an imperialist economic Summit in Ottawa, Canada. It is also to be recalled that 31 of the world's poorest countries participated in a summit in Paris, during the deliberations of which the USA voted down a proposal to establish a World Energy Bank. The US delegation urged the Third World states to rely more on their own resources and not to look outside for too much help.

DOUBLE TALK

As far as the PPP is concerned, this is a lot of double talk, for the same US imperialists moved viciously against Jagan in Guyana, Manley in Jamaica, and Allende in Chile when those leaders of the said countries tried to transform their economies to "rely on their own resources."

The reasons for the failure of the Cancun North-South Summit could be traced to the same reasons for the failure of the UN Development Decades. Within the capitalist-imperialist sphere, the rich states are getting richer while the poor ones are getting poorer. Within the capitalist states themselves the rich elite groups are getting richer while the impoverished masses continue to get poorer. Cancun does not have the necessary revolutionary machinery to tackle this basic class problem. It is a Summit of sharks and sardines.

JAGAN CRITICIZES U.S. CARIBBEAN MEDDLING

FL261920 Bridgetown CANA in English 1823 GMT 26 Nov 81

[Text] St Georges, Grenada, 26 Nov (CANA)--The leader of Guyana's opposition Peoples Progressive Party (PPP), Dr Cheddi Jagan, feels that Caribbean governments should speak out "with one voice" against the policies being pursued by the United States in the region. Dr Jagan said the Reagan administration was adopting "big-stick interventionist methods" in the Caribbean. He said that the threat of military aggression by Washington was affecting the peace and security of the Caribbean.

Dr Jagan, delegate at a solidarity-with-Grenada conference, which ended last night, also urged that mass organizations should together condemn the aggressive U.S. policies, despite their political, ideological or religious differences. Such a course of action was necessary, he said, to ensure that Caribbean states are allowed to determine their own processes free from external interference or pressure from foreign forces. The threat of U.S. military intervention was real, and being manifested in troop maneuvers in the area.

He charged the U.S. with signing an agreement with the Dominican Republic to intervene in Haiti in the event of "revolutionary struggle" by opponents of the Duvalier regime.

According to the Guyanese ex-premier, the U.S. was hysterical over certain developments taking place in the area such as the revolutionary process in Cuba, Grenada, Nicaragua, Guatemala and El Salvador. He was also critical of the U.S.-backed Caribbean basin initiative (involving Mexico, Canada and Venezuela) aimed at directing more development assistance to the region.

Dr Jagan did not believe that the United States was interested in the genuine development of the region. Washington was concerned only because of the revolutionary processes taking place.

Political instability was resulting from the poor conditions of workers in the Caribbean and Latin America which he felt would lead to an intensification of the class struggle and political struggles. The United States was to use the aid scheme with a view to stopping the process of change. "This will fail because what is being proposed is the old Puerto Rican model which advocated the free enterprise system and that the countries of the area must attract foreign capital by creating an investment climate."

"What is being proposed now in the context of the Cuban revolution, the Grenada revolution and the Nicaraguan revolution is another attempt to shore up the situation, but the medicine...has already failed, and this one will fail too," he said.

Dr Jagan was also critical of the decision of the Jamaican Government of Prime Minister Edward Seaga to break diplomatic relations with Cuba in the face of charges from Kingston that Havana was harboring three wanted Jamaican gunmen, and he said the move was instigated by the United States. Washington was trying to create a "reactionary axis" in the Caribbean involving Barbados, St Vincent, St Lucia, Dominica and Jamaica.

He also said the move by Jamaica was a setback to the report of the so-called group of wise men on a strategy for CARICOM in the decade of the 80's.

TIMBER IMPREGNATION PLANT--The preservation of tropical South American hardwoods for general construction purposes can now be pioneered by Guyana. This would be possible, as the country's first timber impregnation plant was commissioned on Saturday by Minister of National Development Robert Corbin. With this plant, in Kingston, Georgetown, most of the country's lesser known species of wood can be tested, allowing a great scope for research in this area. Training and commercial business will be carried out at the plant. Sawmillers will now be able to take various species of wood, affected by pests and the elements, for tests and treatment. Minister Corbin said that the plant was a significant step for the development of the timber industry in Guyana. "We are witnessing development before our eyes. This plant...will ensure that there is a greater utilisation of our natural resource...," because Government was always interested in self-reliance, Cde Corbin said. The plant will assist in the nation's housing drive and other related developmental areas, he declared. At the official ceremony were Forestry Minister, Fitz Carmichael, FAO Representative in Guyana, Dr Evan Bolle-Jones, and other officials of the Government and members of the Diplomatic Corps. CONGRATULATIONS TO ANTIGUA--In a congratulatory message to Prime Minister, Vere Bird of Antigua-Barbuda on the occasion of that country's attainment of independence Sunday, Acting President, Cde Ptolemy Reid said: "On the occasion of the attainment of independence, I send, on behalf of the government and people of Guyana, and on my own behalf, fraternal and warmest congratulations to you and to the government and people of Antigua. Today, the people of Antigua have won a significant victory, not only for their own country, but for the rest of the Caribbean and the Third World in securing political control over their destiny. "I look forward to working with you bilaterally and in regional and multilateral fields, for the progress and advancement of the people of our two countries and our region." MESSAGE TO PANAMA--President Forbes Burnham has sent a congratulatory message to his Panamanian counterpart, President Aristides Royo, on the occasion of that country's National Day. The text of the message reads: "May I extend, on this your National Day, warm congratulations to you and the Panamanian people, on my own behalf, and on behalf of the Government and people of Guyana. I have noted with admiration the steps your people have taken to achieve and safeguard their goal. May the admirable tenets of the Non-Aligned Movement, which have brought our two countries closer together, continue to inspire our two peoples to co-operate more meaningfully for our mutual benefit. May I wish you continued good health and success in your challenging task as leader of the Panamanian people." Panama celebrates its National Day today. UNION-PNC TIES--The Postal and Telecommunication Workers Union is to seek affiliation to the ruling People's National Congress party. President of the Union Cde Selwyn Felix said that the decision was taken during the four-day Fourth Biennial Conference of the union which was held at Kuru Kuru, Cooperative College, Linden Highway. The President said that the conference delegates empowered the Executive Council of the organisation to start discussions with the General Secretary of the PNC within one month. Cde Felix said that his union is to write the General Secretary of the PNC asking that a date be fixed for the first meeting. [Text] [Georgetown GUYANA CHRONICLE in English 3 Nov 81 p 3]

GREETINGS TO DOMINICA--Acting President Cde Ptolemy Reid has despatched a message to the President of the Commonwealth of Dominica, Mr Aurelius Marie on the occasion of that country's National Day which was being observed yesterday. In his message Cde Reid said: It is with great pleasure that I send warmest greetings and heartiest congratulations on behalf of the government and people of Guyana and on my own behalf to you, the government and people of the Commonwealth of Dominica on the occasion of your third anniversary of independence. He also expressed the hope that "the existing friendly relations between our two countries be further strengthened as we strive together for the realisation of the common aspirations of our peoples." Cde Reid added: "Please accept my best wishes for your excellency's good health and personal well being." Guyana and Dominica, two Caribbean Community Member states established relations on November 3, 1978, the day on which Dominica gained its independence from Britain. Guyana's High Commissioner to the Commonwealth of Dominica is Harold Sahadeo, who is also High Commissioner to the Eastern Caribbean Cde Sahadeo is resident in Georgetown. PPP ON JAMAICA-CUBA BREAK--Georgetown, Guyana, Nov. 9 (CANA)--The official Opposition People's Progressive Party (PPP) in Guyana says Jamaica's decision to end diplomatic relations with Cuba was a dis-service to the Caribbean and had been engineered by Washington. The move was "an infamous act hatched in Washington" and a "severe blow to the concept of Caribbean unity which at present is fragile," the leftist PPP said in a week-end statement. The Jamaica Government ended diplomatic relations with Cuba on October 29 amid charges that Cuba was giving refuge to three wanted Jamaican criminals and had refused to return the men. The Cubans have dismissed the Jamaican reasons for the step. The PPP said that the Jamaican Government's action must be seen in the same light as the suspension of diplomatic relations with Cuba by Costa Rica, Colombia and Venezuela, and was part of the United States Government's plans to isolate and attack the Cuban revolution. "Once again, as in the early 1960's, Caribbean leaders are falling victim to U.S. cold war pressures and betraying the Caribbean peoples' aspirations for economic and social progress," the PPP statement said. The PPP said it rejected the ruling PNC government's view "that Jamaica is a sovereign state free to take its own position" adding that, "after all Jamaica is a member of the Caribbean Community and what Jamaica does can affect the whole Caribbean." PNC COMMITTEE ELECTIONS--Seven top cadres of the ruling People's National Congress were last Sunday elected to the Party's Central Executive committee at the first post-Congress three-day meeting of the party's General Council. The seven, five of whom hold top government positions, are Desmond Hoyte, a Vice-President in the government, Shirley Field-Ridley, also first Vice Chairman of the WRSM, Ranji Chandsingh, a senior Government Minister, Robert Williams, Harun Rashid and Sallahuddin, all Government Ministers, and Ganesh Singh, an educator. The elections were held in accordance with the constitution of the party which requires the election of seven Central Executive members at the first General Council meeting following each Congress. The election of the seven followed those of the principal officers of the party at the Fourth Biennial Congress, held during last August. On the final day of the August 22-29 Congress, President Forbes Burnham was returned as Party Leader. Party Chairman, Cammie Ramsaroop, Senior Vice Chairman, Robert Corbin, Junior Vice Chairman Steve Naraine, Assistant General Secretary, Urmia Johnson, treasurer, Hyacinth Godette, and co-treasurer John Joaquim were all returned to office. Prime Minister Ptolemy Reid was reappointed Deputy Leader and General Secretary by Party Leader Burnham in keeping with the latter's constitutional power. GROUPS TO FRANCE--Trade and economic cooperation between France and Guyana will be intensified this month when two teams of Guyanese officials visit the French Republic later this month. They will continue discussions started recently between French President Francois Mitterrand and Guyana's President Forbes Burnham at Cancun, Mexico. One team will leave on November 5 to discuss bauxite specifically with the relevant Minister in the French Cabinet. A larger team will leave during the fourth week of this month for talks on Trade and Economic Cooperation. President Burnham, who made the disclosure yesterday at his Press conference, said he and his French counterpart held in-depth discussions about economic cooperation during their meeting in Mexico. President Burnham also had a "one to one" meeting with United States President Ronald Reagan during his stay in Cancun. Reporting on these brief discussions yesterday, President Burnham said they talked about the development of Guyana, its potential for hydro-carbon and hydro-electricity, mineralogical wealth which could be exploited by increased power supply and the Venezuela question. President Burnham said he reiterated his view that the economic development and prosperity of the Caribbean has to be predicated on Guyana's prosperity. President Burnham said that because of his Government's positive policy, Guyana had gone pa the stage of self-sufficiency in food but wanted to help other Caricom countries who were importing a few billion US dollars in food. FIRING OF GUYSTAC OFFICIAL--Georgetown, Guyana, Monday (CANA)--Ossie Baptist, the Executive Vice-President of the Guyana State Corporation (GUYSTAC), a major group of government-owned companies, has been dismissed by Guyanese President Forbes Burnham, an official announcement said. The weekend Official Gazette carried a notice signed by the head of the Presidential Secretariat saying that Mr Burnham had approved the dismissal of Mr Baptist with effect from September 21. When Mr Baptist did not return from a trip to Britain to recruit staff for GUYSTAC, the CATHOLIC STANDARD newspaper reported that he sent in his resignation from abroad but that it had not been accepted. The official release gave no reason for the dismissal. David Yankara, another GUYSTAC Vice-President, has been appointed Acting Executive Vice-President of the corporation. BAUXITE WORKERS' VICTORY--The week of industrial action against management of the Kwakwani section of Guymine has ended with agreement to pay bauxite workers incentive money due to them since last year. The Kwakwani bauxite workers embarked on a go-slow on Friday, October 16 at the failure to meet their demands for incentive payment held back since last year and not included, as was expected, in their October 14 pay packet. The go-slow moved into a full work stoppage before final agreement was reached. It is now understood that payments will be made during early November. Another pay row is in the offing as it is understood that the 10% pay increase due to workers for the period January to June this year has not yet been paid, although sugar workers have now received this amount. Bauxite workers say that pay increases are absolutely necessary if they are to maintain their present standards of living. The high cost of living has adversely affected the purchasing power of the dollar, and they suffer, as well, from acute shortages of essential goods. Also, poor social services means that they have to dig deeper into their pockets. [Text] [Georgetown MIRROR in English 25 Oct 81 p 1]

SUGAR PRODUCTION PROBLEMS--Georgetown, Guyana, Tuesday (CANA)--Guyana's sugar production last week fell well below expectations, and management has blamed unsatisfactory turnout of sugar cane workers and work stoppages on several estates. The Guyana Sugar Corporation said production was only 8,310 tons which was 77 percent of the target set by the corporation. The year's production of sugar in Guyana now stands at 245,000 tons, chasing a target of 316,000 tons with eight weeks of production to come. By passing the 240,000 ton mark last week, the corporation said, workers became eligible for two days' extra incentive pay, but this would be paid only to workers achieving the required attendance qualification at the end of the crop. Commenting that the annual sugar target is now in jeopardy, the opposition MIRROR newspaper said that factories were not working well because of poor maintenance, which resulted in many breakdowns, affecting production. The paper suggested that at present rate of production, even a revised annual target of 300,000 tons may not be reached. [Text] [Bridgetown ADVOCATE-NEWS in English 11 Nov 81 p 3]

DETAILS OF COOPERATION TALKS WITH NORWAY REPORTED

Kingston THE SUNDAY GLEANER in English 8 Nov 81 pp 1,2

[Text] Economic cooperation between Jamaica and Norway in a number of areas was further discussed in Oslo last week when a meeting of the Joint Commission for the two countries was held.

Maritime transportation, trade relations, negotiations in respect to oil, gas, cement and alumina, as well as the status of multi-lateral and bi-lateral programmes were on the agenda of the meeting.

Jamaica's Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Foreign Affairs and Foreign Trade, the Rt. Hon. Hugh Shearer, gave the principal address at the meeting on behalf of Jamaica.

Noting that this meeting should have taken place earlier this year but "certain events" had prevented this, Mr Shearer told the Norwegian Minister of Commerce and Shipping, Mr Arne Skauge: "This fourth meeting of the Jamaica/Norway Joint Commission is the first for me, representing a new Government of Jamaica; and the first for you, representing a Government of Norway."

Mr Shearer said that against this background, he wished to discuss "the important matter of economic cooperation between our two countries, which is the prime concern of our Joint Commission."

"Our cooperation programme," he continued, "has covered mainly the fields of energy, shipping and training; we have received assistance from Norwegian experts under the Consultancy Fund arrangements; and in the field of industrial cooperation, we have had close and detailed consultations on alumina and cement.

Broad Objectives

"You will wish to know that these activities have been assigned a high priority by the present Jamaican Government.

"As I indicated earlier, the broad objectives of our economic policy are to increase our export earnings and to reduce unemployment. In order to achieve these objectives, we must restore and expand our productive capability. The sectors I have mentioned are crucial to this.

"I also wish to affirm to you that the Government which I represent attaches the highest importance to cooperation between our two countries; and I wish further to affirm that it will be our wish, and in particular it will be my wish, to see our cooperation expanded and strengthened over the years.

"The agenda for our meeting provides us with a good opportunity to work towards this, as we discuss the subjects of maritime transportation, trade, oil and gas, cement, alumina, training, status of current multi-lateral and bilateral programmes, and financial questions."

Marked Increase

Speaking for Norway, Mr Skauge said he was happy to report that bilateral trade between the two countries has shown "a marked increase" both on the export side and on the import side during the last year and a half.

"Traditionally, the trade between our two countries has been concentrated on just a few items," the Minister said.

"I feel that this situation does not reflect the full trade potential which exists between our two countries. In the case of your exports to Norway, I think that the possibilities of GSP-preference could be better exploited.

'Norimpod'

"Interested Jamaican exporters will be assisted by NORIMPOD, our office for promoting imports from developing countries, in establishing contacts with Norwegian agents and importers.

"Until now, NORIMPOD has received relatively few requests from Jamaica. This meeting of the joint Commission should provide a good opportunity to discuss the possibilities for expanding our scope of trade."

Mr Skauge said Norway appreciated the Jamaican desire to develop a national merchant marine and was willing to assist Jamaica in achieving this objective.

"Norway is very interested in participating in establishing a modern Jamaican fishing industry. We have an internationally recognised position in the field and can deliver a full range of goods and services--from fishing vessels and equipment to integrated conservation plants and training," he said.

Soft Loans

"I would also like to mention the existence of various financing schemes administered by NORAD, the Norwegian Agency for International Development.

"Under these schemes, Norwegian companies, in close cooperation with the host country, may obtain financial assistance and soft loans for feasibility studies, building of infra-structure and commercial projects.

"One of the stipulations for obtaining such aid is that the project will stimulate the development process of the receiving country."

SEAGA URGES PUBLIC SUPPORT FOR SECURITY FORCES

Kingston THE DAILY GLEANER in English 9 Nov 81 p 15

[Text] The government does not condone acts of brutality by members of the security Forces, but will not condemn the force as a body by the misconduct of a few, Prime Minister, the Rt. Hon. Edward Seaga, has said.

Giving a review of the performance of the government after one year in office on Tuesday in the House of Representatives the Prime Minister said: "We must continue to give the Security Forces our full co-operation while weeding out those who disgrace its performance."

"The government inherited a demoralised and under-equipped security force which has a major reason for the high crime rate last year.

Morale

Since that time, the morale of the security forces has been greatly elevated, firstly because they are no longer the subject of abuse by those in authority. The physical conditions of the police stations are being refurbished and imporved after having been left to deteriorate into unlivable conditions. The strength and training of the forces have been increased to meet the growing sophistication of the criminal element in the country.

When this government took over, almost 50% of the police fleet was immobile. To correct this, urgent repairs have been carried out and new vehicles acquired to improve mobility. Crime detecting equipment has also been provided to moderinise the force. Vehicles and radio equipment have been ordered for the Jamaica Defence Force to signficantly improve the capabilities of the Jamaica Defence Force. The first shipment of vehicles for the security forces is expected shortly with a succession of shipments to follow.

Apprehension

As a result of these immediate improvements, there has been a high incidence of apprhension of wanted criminals and subversives, as well as the recovery of large caches of weapons. violent crimes of murder and shooting have been reduced by approximately 50% between January and October in comparison with the same period last year. As a result, confidence has returned to the security forces, greater co-operation is being experienced from residents in the communities and there is a reduced climate of fear and tensio islandwide.

Nonetheless, much public concern still exists in areas where crime persists and where the security forces abuse their authority in acts of brutality. The government does not condone acts of brutality by members of the force, but will not condemn the force as a body by the misconduct of a few: We must continue to give the security forces our full co-operation while weeding out those who disgrace its performance.

Repair

To further improve the quality of justice, meaningful attention was given this year to the repair and refurbishing of the courts, the physical conditions of which could only be described as primitive. Expenditure is proceeding on 14 Resident Magistrate's and the Supreme Court building. The condition of the Resident Magistrates courts had reached crisis proportions as no funds had been provided since 1977 for this purpose.

The public will also be pleased to know that a management study has now been completed on the Registrar General's Department. The The back log of arrears in this department go back, unbelievably, to 1976. This study will be the basis of a complete reorganisation of the department.

PAPER CASTIGATES PNP DECISION TO SEND DELEGATION TO CUBA

Kingston THE DAILY GLEANER in English 10 Nov 81 p 6

[Editorial: "Act of Folly?"]

[Text] At the worst, the PNP decision to send a party delegation to Cuba, under Vice-President P. J. Patterson on Wednesday can be viewed as an act of treachery, and at best as an act of misguided folly.

Mr. Patterson has referred quite correctly to the unprecedented move in Jamaica's case of breaking off diplomatic relations with any country. The PNP's proposed act is also unprecedented not only in Jamaica but also in the world. For we cannot recall any Opposition Party in any democratic country which has behaved in the way the PNP proposes to do. The Government acts for the whole country and in a democracy its activities are open to questioning by all and sundry whether in Parliament, the Press or elsewhere. Indeed opposition to the decision is inevitable in a democracy, but opposition must be contained within the Jamaican process.

The PNP does not see it that way. Behaving as if it is still the Government, or at least a Government in exile, it has decided to go to Cuba to thank that country for its aid, to assure it of the PNP's solidarity, and to seek to reassure Jamaican students there. With the greatest respect for the PNP and its leadership, we must point out that the PNP now can speak only for the PNP, and not for the country; so it cannot convey Jamaica's thanks to the Cuban Government nor can it reassure Jamaican students there of anything.

We note that though the PNP had announced that Leader of the Opposition Mr. Michael Manley would have broken his lecture tour of the US and Canada in order to return to Jamaica by Sunday, November 1 Mr. Manley returned only on November 8. Perhaps he had realised that his lecture tour was better for his party's image than the proposed visit to Cuba by a PNP delegation which is of doubtful loyalty to Jamaica, and an act of folly.

We hope it is not too late for otherwise reasonable men such as Mr. Patterson to realise the shallowness of the proposed PNP visit to Cuba as well as its possibly being interpreted as an act of treachery to the Government of Jamaica and to the majority of the people. We would propose instead that the PNP should concentrate on the debate in Parliament on the matter, a debate which Mr. Spaulding's censure motion against Dr. Duncan makes highly probable today. It is through skilful handling in the debate that the PNP can point out what it obviously feels is an indefensible act by the Government.

EDITORIAL DISCUSSES PNP POSITION ON CONTINUED CUBA TIES

Kingston THE DAILY GLEANER in English 2 Nov 81 p 6

[Editorial: "Party Over Country"]

[Text]

In Dominica, the left leaning Dominica Liberation Movement Alliance has decided to defy the Dominican Government and to accept Cuban offers of scholarships on a party to party basis. This follows the Government's decision not to accept Cuban Scholarships because as the Government claimed whatever the field of study, students are compelled to study the doctrine of Marxism-Leninism and in some cases the military arts.

In Jamaica, the left leaning PNP has decided to defy the Government's decision to break off relations with Cuba and is to send a "top level PNP delegation to Cuba to consolidate relations" presumably between the PNP and the Cuban Communist Party which runs Cuba.

It would seem to us that the PNP would have been better advised to hew to the line of the Chairman of the Party, Mr. Dudley Thompson who questioned the procedure taken by the JLP Government in breaking off relationships. Mr. Thompson said the Government had taken a precipitous and drastic step and expressed the view that the Government should have first stated its grouses to Cuba and requested the cooperation of the Government of Cuba before handing that Government an ultimatum. And there is some merit in Mr. Thompson's complaint, though the Prime Minister had indicated in Parliament that the Cuban Embassy was more than aware of the gravity of charges against the three wanted men and also the allegations made in Parliament that they were in Cuba.

The PNP Chairman also questioned the nature of the evidence on which the Government acted, and said that the Prime Minister had not given the people any evidence to suggest that the three men were in Cuba. The evidence given to Parliament was the transcript of the tape and the word of the Prime Minister that policemen had sworn to its authenticity and to the authenticity of the voice of Anthony Brown on the tape. It seems that the Leader of the Opposition and the Chairman of the PNP should have been taken into the confidence of the Government and be permitted to share the evidence, though Dr. Duncan's hurried defence of Mr. Paul Burke and Mr. Manley's own defence of Mr. Burke once the affair became known, may have made it difficult for any such move to be made. Difficult, but not impossible in our view. For on a matter of such gravity it is necessary that bi-partisan consultation be carried out.

What has added to the difficulty in the way of consultation appears to be the conviction of the Government that some leaders of the PNP are involved in a conspiracy with Cuba to keep the three criminals in safety in Cuba, and thus thwart the ends of justice.

This is a very grave allegation, for it could involve the crime of treason to the state. Hence it must not be made lightly and without solid evidence. We believe it incumbent on the Government to explain in Parliament what is the iceberg of evidence; the tip of which the Prime Minister claimed the harbouring of the three criminals to be. We believe it incumbent also on the Government to proceed with despatch to bring charges against those deemed to be guilty of crimes against the state, so that guilt or innocence can be established in the Courts.

For it cannot be right that people who are not in Parliament continue to be accused in Parliament by innuendo rather than direct allegations.

As for the Opposition, we would advise them to see their role as the Chairman appears to see it, as questioning the actions of the Government in Jamaica, and in terms of Jamaican interests and not follow the General Secretary and allow their alliance with the Communist Party of Cuba to push them into an open act of defiance of their own Government on a matter of international affairs, the security of their country and Jamaica's national dignity.

It seemed strange to us indeed that the General Secretary on Thursday gave the Party's "condemnation" of the decision before the Party met in emergency session — presumably as it turned out to be — to rubber stamp the Secretary's very strongly worded reaction to his Government's decision in respect of a foreign State.

While the Government must always act with probity on the basis of incontrovertible evidence, and not seek to score political points cheaply, the Opposition must beware that it does not confirm any suspicion that it is prepared to put the party and the interests of a foreign state before the country's.

SEAGA BLASTS PNP FOR STAND ON ISSUE OF CUBA RELATIONS

Kingston THE DAILY GLEANER in English 3 Nov 81 pp 1, 12

[Text]

The Cuban authorities did not send home the three wanted criminals as they had been asked because if they had done so they would be admitting to their guilt, Prime Minister Edward Seaga charged on Sunday night.

Addressing thousands at a Jamaica Labour Party election anniversary rally at South Parade in downtown Kingston, Mr. Seaga said the Cuban authorities instead had used their "stoogies here, the PNP to offer excuses."

One member of the PNP had said that the Government's charge about the wanted criminals in Cuba who were training for political action and subversion here was not true while another member of the PNP had said that if it was true it was only criminals who were being dealt with.

Likening the PNP as "twins in bed" with the Cuban authorities, Mr. Seaga said that anything one did the other did likewise, if one sneezed the other caught cold.

Mr. Seaga charged that the Cuban Government had "knowingly, willingly and deliberately given haven to those elements (the wanted men) and allowed them to stay in Cuba out of reach of Jamaican justice. What is more they did it in defiance of Jamaican authority." Mr. Seaga wanted to know what kind of patriotism the PNP had in their heart that they could take up for a set of foreigners "against your own people."

DEROULET AFFAIR

Mr. Seaga said that when the American Ambassador (Vincent deRoulet) was made persona non grata, "I had raised no objection." The Ambassador had said something which was considered offensive and Manley had taken action.

"I gave my country at that time, the encouragement that it had to stand up to anyone who tried to abuse us and our sovereignity but these puppets now don't consider their country above the responsibilities they should have and the patriotic duty that they should perform as Jamaican."

"They consider their allegiance to some foreign Government to stand higher in the scale of priorities and order. We must ask ourselves what kind of connection exists between the PNP and the Cuban authorities."

IN THIS YEAR, ALONE, 51 PNP leaders, officials and other ranking supporters, had visited Cuba, making 61 trips and spending over 200 days there Mr. Seaga said. Asking what was going on over there and what were the PNP members up to Mr. Seaga said that whenever he went to the United States or Venezuela or Mr. Shearer went to Germany, investments were brought back. "I always go to promote Jamaica."

When anybody from the PNP visited Cuba and returned nobody knew what they had gone and done. When they returned they could not open their mouth. They could not tell the truth about their trips to Cuba, Mr. Seaga said, because if they did it would "finalise and finish their political prospects in this country."

Mr. Seaga made these comments as he reviewed the decision to give the Cuban Embassy officials marching orders in connection with the wanted men incident.

The review came as the Prime Minister drew the meeting's attention to what he termed the threat from outside. This threat and two others originating inside the country, should be recognised by the people and be guarded against, he said. The other two threats, he identified as, the attitude to work which came from inside the people, and an attitude which came from the belief that the country could continue to borrow its way out of trouble.

In reviewing the events which led to officials of the Cuban Embassy being ordered out of the country, Mr. Seaga said that he and the Government, after the elections, had done everything to maintain friendly relations with Cuba. "We did not abuse them neither did we go on record and tell the world about all the things that they were doing."

CUBAN PROGRAMMES HERE WERE ASSESSED and those not needed were terminated. "This was all done in a proper fashion and not on the basis of a Jamaican Government which had any vengeance in its heart, because when I took the oath of office I said I would not conduct a Government with malice to anyone."

For a while the Cubans conducted themselves in such a fashion "that we thought they were learning from past mistakes." As time passed, however, "we began to realise that the business of training Jamaicans for political action and subversion was beginning to occur again."

In doing this the Cuban authorities were once again establishing linkages and contact with the Opposition, and there was more than one (Opposition) party involved.

RATION CARD

Mr. Seaga said that the Government was not in a position to do anything with the information which it had been receiving until it constituted the kind of information which could be put before the people. The tape and the letters were that type of information.

Mr. Seaga said that in Cuba no man could exist for one day without the Government knowing about it. Everybody had to have a registration card, and a ration card to get food and these were issued by the Government.

Furthermore, Mr. Seaga said, the wanted criminals were not unknown but men whose faces appeared dozens of time in the papers and on television with handsome rewards for information leading to their capture. "The Cuban authorities could never have said that they don't know who they are."

Mr. Seaga then dealt with what he described as the Cuban Government's arrogance in the matter and their deliberately harbouring the men. He said that as soon as he had returned home, from the Far East he had launched investigations into the finding of the tape and letters. As a result of this and what was happening "we could no longer sit by and watch another country arrogantly displaying its defiance of our sovereignity, arrogantly treating us as if we were some colonials, arrogantly believing that we were like the PNP and Manley still in power, and arrogantly displaying the nakedness of their authority to take men that are wanted here in Jamaica for political activities of a criminal nature and hold them in safe-keeping until the day come that could unleash them on us."

Mr. Seaga then related how he gave the Cuban authorities 24 hours to return the men and how he subsequently had to order the Embassy staff to leave.

In summing up, he mentioned the point about the Cuban authorities not sending home the men because they would be admitting their guilt if they had done so.

SEAGA ADDRESSES JLP, WARNS ANYONE WHO TAMPERS WITH ECONOMY

Kingston THE DAILY GLEANER in English 4 Nov 81 pp 1, 17

[Text]

Prime Minister Edward Seaga said on Sunday night that if anyone dared to try and destroy the process of economic recovery, then "they are going to answer to me the way the Cubans answer."

"I am prepared to be lenient. I am prepared to operate on the basis of a relaxed regime. I am prepared to give every man his due, holding malice towards none, but if you tamper with the prospects of economic recovery of this country, you are going to find that while I may carry honey like a bee, I can sting like a wasp."

Mr. Seaga was addressing thousands of cheering Jamaica Labour Party supporters at the party's election anniversary celebrations at South Parade in downtown Kingston.

PRIOR TO THE WARNING, Mr. Seaga said that the country was poised to enter the second year of struggle after eight years of suffering and disaster to bring economic recovery to Jamaica — something which had already started.

Listing areas such as construction, tourism, agriculture, bauxite and mining, which were poised to move, Mr. Seaga said that if anybody tried to thwart this they would not only have to answer to the Government, but also the people.

In a wide-ranging speech, lasting just over an hour, Mr. Seaga defended the first year of office, outlined the incident which led to officials of the Cuban Embassy being sent home, mentioned threats to economic recovery and gave an overview of the Government's strategy over the next three years.

Dealing with 'deliverance', Mr. Seaga said that some people were saying that it had not come, while others were saying that it had come for them. Stating that this might be valid in some cases, Mr. Seaga launched into the "five acts of deliverance" which he said had rescued the country.

The first one, he said, was the return of food on shop-shelves, something which had been achieved in five weeks by the JLP Government, ending five years of the shops being without food. The situation, he said, had reached such a state that during the campaign, the one-in-three shops not closed was open only at the window because the shopkeeper was ashamed for anyone to see inside.

Mr. Seaga recalled that on taking over the reins of office, and with Christmas approaching, there was only two weeks supply of food, rice, meal and meat and there was no money to buy anymore.

However in another two weeks, four commercial banks had provided the government with $40 million worth of credit so that food, spare parts and raw materials could be purchased.

Mr. Seaga said that when he heard people talking about "not feeling deliverance", he had to say that it was a mistake. "What we should have done is let the country experience the last Christmas without food and with thousands losing their jobs, then nobody would have to take my word for it, but everyone would have the grim memory of it."

Instead, Mr. Seaga said, the JLP Government while less than two months in power, had ensured that everyone had the happiest Christmas in many years. "What would have been the position if the PNP were in power?" he asked.

IF THE PNP HAD WON man would be "nyaming man" because nobody would be lending them money, the government itself would have had to abandon large sections of the budget...all we get from Manley were debts, bad cheques, closing companies and a Government which did not have enough credibility to raise a dollar overseas."

INVESTMENTS

Turning to the second act of deliverance, Mr. Seaga said that this was the acquisition of new investments to provide new jobs. He said that under eight years of PNP rule there was hardly any new investment; and unemployment affecting mainly the young, had moved from 180,000 to 300,000.

Since the JLP Government, "something has happened beyond my wildest expectations." There had been 470 new applications made to the Government about new investments totalling over $1,000 million, due to the confidence investors now had in the country.

Whereas the PNP Government had for five years been operating in "fits and starts" and were unable to provide things like linen for hospitals, desks for schools, and to fix the potholes, it had taken the JLP Government five months to finance a new budget which could make the economy run smoothly.

The third act of deliverance, Mr. Seaga said, was to stabilize the movement in the cost of living from a situation under the PNP where price increase were "staggering, uncontrollable and unbearable."

Last year alone, the cost of living had increased by 28 per cent compared to a four per cent movement under the JLP, an achievement which no other democratic country in the world had attained. This was done in only one year, he said.

THE FOURTH ACT OF DELIVERANCE, Mr. Seaga said, was the saving of the freedoms and rights of the country. Asking the gathering to imagine what JBC and the API would be like if the PNP had won the elections, Mr. Seaga said news in these media would have been stifled. The people would not have been able to know why they could get no work or food: they would be told instead that it was the work of wicked imperialists.

UNDER CONTROL

The GLEANER, he said, would also have been brought under control and the excuse of a shortage of foreign exchange would have been used to prevent the paper from importing newsprint. This would be so as the PNP Government, supported by others, moved to transform Jamaica into a Cuban-type society.

The final act of deliverance, Mr. Seaga said, was the bringing back of hope and the freeing of tensions in the country, which came about four hours after the JLP had triumphed at the polls.

Commenting that he did not want to give a one-sided picture and give the feeling that everything has been accomplished, Mr. Seaga said that he was aware of three areas of disappointment amongst the people: (1) there was not enough money in circulation; 2) the complaint that small businesses had been neglected, and 3) job opportunities.

Concerning the low supply of money in circulation, Mr. Seaga said that this had been done deliberately. There was less money in circulation now than last year because the Government was stabilising the cost of living.

Mr. Seaga said that at the time of the JLP coming to power, too much money was in circulation in relation to the level of production. If money supply had not been restricted, the cost of living would have increased even more. "We had to match the level of production of goods".

With production on the rise once more, the money supply would be stepped up, Mr. Seaga said and brought loud applause when he disclosed that the money supply for this Christmas would be more than for the last Christmas "All sound and sensible financing". Mr. Seaga reported also that already the Christmas Work programme was being prepared.

THE BIG MAN

Regarding the complaint of neglect of small enterprises, Mr. Seaga said that this complaint had led the PNP to say that the JLP was looking after the big man's interest, but this was not so.

He said that because the JLP took over a bankrupt economy, with no new investment coming in, the Government had to concentrate in this area in order to get the economy moving.

Mr. Seaga promised that next year the Government was going to look after small enterprises and handicrafts as well as agriculture to bring deliverance to these sectors of the economy.

Dealing with job opportunities, Mr. Seaga mentioned that it was a long process involved in getting factories going and creating employment. This was not helped by the PNP Government which had left no factories for investors to use.

"All the things involved take time," Mr. Seaga said, but by year three there should be something to hold on to. Thousands of jobs would be coming, but in the meanwhile he understood the feeling that "things hard."

He told the gathering to look next year for the boom in the construction industry as thousands and thousands of square feet of buildings had been approved for construction. "This would create impact among most of you in the towns," he said.

Regarding the rural areas, and youth who live in the hills, Mr. Seaga said that they would be involved in planting some twenty crops which studies have shown give a high yield. In the meanwhile before this programme got off the ground the Government would be going into extensive roadwork right across the island to create employment.

AGAINST THREATS

Turning to threats which he said, the people must guard against, Mr. Seaga stated that the first two originated from inside the country, "in the minds and hearts of the people".

Declaring that "there was doubt as to whether deliverance could be sustained," Mr. Seaga said that the people need to know that they had to work and earn. "The country cannot continue to borrow its way out of trouble. Brothers and sisters we did it last year, we can do it another year or two but by the time year three finishes, we had better be in a position to show that we are people who can work and earn because when that time comes, people who lend us money will say we have no good intention."

The Government, Mr. Seaga said, could only do so much. It was up to "you to do the rest when people get work and don't work you are failing our effort."

Mr. Seaga also said he was dissatisfied with the Relief Employment Programme although more effort and discipline had gone into it. The country could no longer afford to have a situation where a group of people came to work, two worked and eight did not. People would now be given specific responsibilities.

Regarding the final threat — that from outside, which was to the security of the country, Mr. Seaga referred to the "Cuban Affair", which he said was not a step which the Government had taken lightly.

After a lengthy review of the matter, Mr. Seaga said that the country was poised to have massive investment and the only thing which could prevent it was if those people who didn't want to see the country prosper do something to terrify the investors.

Mr. Seaga then detailed sectors of the economy which were poised to move and said that if anyone tried to prevent this from happening then they would have to deal with not just the Government but the people.

"I want to put these things on the record, for after a year of work for which we can be truly proud — proud that we are poised for another year to undo the eight years of suffering, the eight years of disaster, proud as we are to move into the second year of struggle in such a fashion as to bring economic recovery to Jamaica, if anyone dares to try to destroy that, they are going to answer to me the way the Cubans answered."

"I am prepared to be lenient. I am prepared to operate on a basis of a relaxed regime. I am prepared to give every man his due, holding malice towards none but if you tamper with the prospects of economic recovery of this country, you are going to find that while I may carry honey like a bee I can sting like a wasp."

The Prime Minister thanked the gathering for such a large turnout which, he said, was a vote of confidence to continue to build the economy. He thanked them and the country for the support that his Government had received and the role that everyone had played to turn around the economy. He appealed for "the prayers, the work and the effort to continue to restore the economy... and by the Almighty's will we shall succeed."

BRIEFS

ALUMINUM, BAUXITE EXPORTS--Alumina exports rose by 4.6 per cent, exports of unprocessed bauxite dropped 8.6 per cent and total bauxite disposed of was 100,000 tonnes less in the third quarter of this year compared to the same period last year. A Jamaica Bauxite Institute release yesterday also said that fourth quarter figures are expected to show slippage in the face of soft world demand for aluminium. The JBI release said: "Despite continued buoyancy in its alumina exports, Jamaica's bauxite production suffered a decline in the third quarter as the world recession in aluminium markets worked its way back to the local industry. Total bauxite disposed of was 3 million (metric) tonnes in the third quarter as against 3.1 million tonnes in the corresponding period of 1980. Nevertheless the cumulative figure for the year to date was still running 3 percent ahead--9.1 million tonnes as compared with 8.9 million tonnes recorded for the first nine months of last year. Exports of unprocessed bauxite (all of which goes to the United States) dropped 8.6 percent in the third quarter for the year to date, shipments amounted to 4.4 million tonnes as against 4.5 million tonnes in the first three quarters of 1980--a decline of 2.7 percent. Alumina exports were 638,000 tonnes in the third quarter, a 4.6 percent rise. The nine-month figure was 1.9 million tonnes, 9.1 per cent more than the 1.8 million tonnes shipped between January and September of 1980. Fourth quarter figures are expected to show further slippage given the continuing softness of world aluminium demand." [Text] [Kingston THE DAILY GLEANER in English 7 Nov 81 p 1]

SEAGA MESSAGE TO BREZHNEV--The following congratulatory message from the Rt Hon E.P.G. Seaga, Prime Minister of Jamaica, has been transmitted to Mr Leonid Brezhnev, Chairman of Presidium of the Supreme Soviet on November 7, the 64th anniversary of the Socialist Revolution. "The Government and people of Jamaica join me in extending warm congratulations and best wishes on the celebration of the sixty-fourth anniversary of the Great October Socialist Revolution. It is our sincere desire that you will succeed in your efforts to achieve your national objectives and we look forward to the continued friendship and cooperation between our two countries." MESSAGES TO CHAMBERS--Congratulations have been sent from around the Caribbean to Trinidad's Prime Minister George Chambers, following his runaway victory in Monday's general election. Jamaica's Prime Minister Edward Seaga said yesterday: "On behalf of the Government and people of Jamaica, please accept my warm congratulations on your overwhelming victory. Once again the people have reinforced the strength of political modernation in the Caribbean. I look forward to working closely with you and your Government for the good of both our countries and the region as a whole." People's National Party president and Leader of the Opposition, Michael Manley, yesterday sent the following message: "Warmest congratulations on your magnificent victory. This is a resounding vote of confidence in the PNM in general and your leadership in particular. It is also a tribute to the monumental contribution of the late Dr Eric Williams to the national life of Trinidad and Tobago and to the wider Caribbean. We look forward to ever stronger bonds of friendship between Trinidad and Tobago and Jamaica within the framework of the Caribbean Integration Movement." SENATE APPOINTMENT--Mr Derrick Charles Smith, 37, business executive, has been appointed a member of the Senate. The appointment completes the 13-member Government team in the Upper House. Mr Smith is the outgoing president of the West Indies Jaycees. His appointment was delayed until this time to allow him to complete his term of office to the stage of selection of his successor, an API release states. The election was held in September. Mr Smith, also a past president of the Jaycees of Jamaica, is marketing director and assistant general manager of Rapid Sheffield Company Limited. He was educated at Calabar High School and the College of Arts, Science and Technology. [Text] [Kingston THE DAILY GLEANER in English 31 Oct 81 p 1]

PNP MAGAZINE--The People's National Party (P.N.P.), in association with the National Workers Union, (N.W.U.) will be producing a monthly magazine to be distributed island wide starting the end of November. Contents of the Magazine will be geared toward the P.N.P. and to give a constant update on its role as an Opposition. Some 10,000 copies are expected to be circulated in the first issue. This was disclosed by former Information Minister in the P.N.P. Government, Mr Arnold Bertram, at a press briefing held at a private home in Montego Bay on Wednesday, October 28. The press briefing, attended by P.N.P. Executives, Dr D.K. Duncan, Mrs Beverly Manley, and Mr Ralph Brown, was one in a series of "rap sessions" to be held with the press. It is hoped that from such a session the public would be kept up to date with the party's activities, Dr Duncan said. A name was not yet decided on for the magazine, and it would no way affect the production of the Union's monthly magazine, Mr Bertram said. The monthly publication, he said, was one of the many objectives decided on by the Party in its effort to prepare itself for state power again. The alignment of the Party with the Union, he noted, was a clear demonstration of the Party's commitment to the working class. The magazine is to be financed by advertisements and sales he said. RELIGIOUS DIVERSIONIST CAMPAIGN ANALYZED

Managua EL NUEVO DIARIO in Spanish 4 Nov 81 p 2

[Article by the CEPA, (Center for Education and Agrarian Promotion) staff: "Religious Diversionism in the Sandinist Revolution"]

[Text] 1. A Definition

Ideological diversionism in the religious field means the distortion of the evangelical meaning of Christianity and slander about the Sandinist revolutionary plan, with the objective of putting Christian people in opposition to the revolution and allying them with the imperialist plan.

Manipulation of the religious beliefs of the Nicaraguan people has been a constant weapon of the counterrevolution since the victory of 19 July 1979 due to the great Christian faith of Nicaraguans and the power of persuasion the bishops and members of religious organizations have over the people.

2. Those Who Are Carrying It Out

First, since 1968 (Rockefeller report) Yankee imperialism has been preparing a strategy to neutralize Christian sectors committed to the struggles for liberation of the Latin American people. It has been carrying out this strategy through massive propaganda, infiltration into the churches, threats and the assassination of thousands of Christians, religious and lay.

Second, the local traitorous middle class has found a favorable spot in the churches to express its opposition to the revolutionary process, covering it with the cloak of "defense of religious beliefs."

Finally, confused sectors in the churches have lent themselves to this ideological deversionism for several reasons: a clever campaign of conversion carried out by the middle class since 1979 through its prior theological training of a traditional nature (abstract, spiritualistic, ritualistic) and also influenced by the anticommunist and anti-Sandinist preaching in which Somoza and imperialism have been engaged for decades.

3. Their Objectives

a) To eliminate international support for the Sandinist Popular Revolution [RPS] by depicting it as repressive of popular religious beliefs.

b) To diminish the people's participation in the tasks of the revolutionary process by trying to place Christianity in opposition to revolution.

c) To divide the revolutionary vanguard, the FSLN [Sandinist National Liberation Front], from the masses.

d) To attract greater support for their pro-imperialist middle-class plan.

4. Tactics Being Used

a) They are presenting the National Reconstruction Government [GRN] as a totalitarian power which does not permit freedom of expression (for example, it does not permit the establishment of a "Catholic" TV channel) and prohibits Christian teaching in the schools while permitting the reading of Marxist texts; it sends students to forest-clearing operations, to help teach illiterates and to perform other tasks without consulting their parents (division of the sacred family tradition!) and, in addition, attacks Christian peace by arming the people in militias.

b) They are depicting the FSLN as an atheist Marzist group which is subtly trying to implant atheism in Nicaragua. In their opinion, the FSLN would be a new controlling group which incites to hatred, violence and fighting among the social classes, thus dividing the Nicaraguan family as a whole. Moreover, the FSLN would allegedly be trying to divide the Catholic church through infiltrated groups seeking to create a confrontation between the people and thier bishops.

c) They are distorting the original message of Jesus by promoting a spiritualistic religious practice (liberation should be only spiritual), fatalism (only God and the saints will resolve our problems), ritualistic (merely prayers and processions), resignation (in face of exploitation, one should turn the other cheek) and beyond our earthly existence (the important thing is the afterlife). In short, they are preaching a Christianity far removed from the commitment to Nicaragua's poor. These reactionary sectors fill their mouths with the word "God," but in their daily life, in accumulating wealth from the labor of the workers, the middle class is showing that its God is the fetish of money and that they are atheists with regard to the God of the poor: Christ.

d) They are accusing the monks and priest committed to the tasks of the revolution of being part of a communist master plan of infiltration into the churches. They are trying to effect a total separation between the religious representative and the politician. They are repressing dedicated Christian sectors, forbidding their participation in mass organizations and in the tasks of the revolution, trying to prohibit their work in the Sandinist state, controlling their pastoral plans and decorations and, in the end, expelling from the country anyone who does not submissively obey their ecclesiastical authorities. In these tasks the Creation has the collaboration of the directorate of the CELAM (Latin American Bishops Council), which has unleashed a campaign throughout the continent to "save the Nicaraguan Church from the clutches of communism." Here we should mention the strong defense of the undisputed authority of the bishop by the middle class one he has won over to its plan.

5. Conclusions

We shall not go into great detail with regard to the falsity and distortion of the arguments put forth by the reactionary forces in their diversionist campaign; we shall just call attention to three basic points:

a) Concerning the revolutionary process, there are hundreds of examples of the Christian nature of the Sandinist government. Is not the crusade against illiteracy a case of love of one's neighbor? Is not the law of grace exemplified in pardon and mercy, in the exemptions and liberties decreed on many occasions? Is not the incarnation of Jesus exemplified by limitless giving to the poor, by the conduct of so many Sandinist heroes and martyrs? Is not giving life in abundance, as the Gospel asks, the objective of the health campaigns? Does not the law of agrarian reform coincide with Genesis where it says that the fruits of production are for the enjoyment of all men and not of just a few who monopolize them? Are not confession and evangelical repentance displayed in the public self-criticism the revolutionary leaders have repeatedly made in recognizing their errors? Is nothing accomplished with the norm of giving shelter to the poor in accordance with the law of intervening distribution? Thus, we could go on citing impressive proofs of the Christian inspiration of this revolution without contending that all is now perfect or, obviously, that we have now brought the Kingdom of Heaven to Nicaragua.

b) With regard to the FSLN, we should remember that Christians at all levels are serving in its ranks, that it has always recognized religious freedom as an "inalienable right of all people," that it believes "it is possible to be a believer and revolutionary at the same time," that it respects religious celebrations and is trying to attack vice and corruption inherited from the Somoza era, and that it has no intention of meddling in the internal questions of churches. (See "FSLN Declaration on Religion.") It should also be remembered that class struggle is an objective fact of reality and that the FSLN did not instigate hatred and violence but, rather, has demonstrated a spirit of exemplary prudence and patience in face of provocations mady by the reaction.

c) With regard to the Christian message, we should remember the words of Father Gaspar Garcia Laviana when he said: "My faith and adherence to the Catholic Church obligate me to take an active part in the revolutionary process with the FSLN, for the liberation of an oppressed people is an integral part of the total redemption of Christ." A Christian is defined by his concrete efforts to aid in the liberation--both material and spiritual--of the poor (Matthew 23-27). The Church should renounce temptations for material power and interpret its authority as a service to the exploited who represent Jesus historically resurrected.

ROLE OF FAMILY IN SANDINIST REVOLUTION EXPLAINED

Managua EL NUEVO DIARIO in Spanish 4 Nov 81 p 2

[Article by Julian Grajales Duval]

[Text] Middle-class minority groups, Christians and laymen; red, purple, and green, are now showing concern over all they did not do when the reins of government were in their hands, when they were teeming with wealth and monopolizing property. And when the popular majority alone was subject to exploitation.

Anticommunists by nature, pro-imperialists be identity and community of interests, sociologists of the middle class and political schemers, especially those of LA PRENSA and Radio Del Galope, in their systematic campaign against the process of the Sandinist Popular Revolution [RPS], the FSLN [Sandinist National Liberation Front] and the forces working for change, they do not refrain from the use and abuse of freedom of expression which they say does not exist; of thriving on accusing Sandinism, the "totalitarians" and "communists" of being responsible for the dissolution and destruction of the Nicaraguan family.

First, I must warn that when there is reference to their falsehoods, middle-class people become angry and consider themselves slandered. It so happens that in Chile, when the social Christian, Dr Eduardo Frei Montalva, with the support of the monopolies, "won" election to the party represented by Dr Salvador Allende Gousen (in 1964), one of the principal "cute little tricks" with which they were frightening the Chilean people was the accusation that "the communists would destroy the family." After what happened in that country, can there be any doubt that this was part of a campaign arranged by the CIA? Compared with what is happening here, it is too much of a coincidence.

They are now accusing the popular and democratic revolution, Sandinism, of "destroying the family." I believe it must be acknowledged that the middle-class gentlemen are right to a certain extent; this cannot be denied. What is happening is that they are refusing to accept the irreversibility and dialectics of the social economic change which began on 19 July and, consequently, believe that everything will change.

Although the revolution is accused of destroying the family "model" which the middle class had formed in a very narrow and deformed way, it is not an accusation which dishonors the revolution, since, in fact, the middle-class gentlemen are recognizing that the revolution is a means of transforming the anachronism.

Now and forever the family is and will continue to be the basic and very first cell of the social structure: At the time of the triumph of the revolution in Nicaragua, the family existed as an institution, divided, hurt, psychologically damaged and uncultured. To a large extent, the family was based on a natural union and the responsibility of the wife; that family did not count on a guarantee from state institutions to assure the children's future; on the contrary, it was faced with a hostile, selfish and unjust system.

There was a historic period in the formation of our society when sexual activity was unlimited and natural, which made it possible for the area's settlers to increase in population and start families. Surely that is the way the "pure and exclusive middle-class families, civilized and Christian," got started.

The family of the middle-class "model" is based on the supremacy of the husband in relation to the wife and children. The basis of that family is the mother who brings forth life; but in the relationship of capitalist production, she was only an appendage of private property who was inherited.

The family received education or examples in the style of middle-class morals. That is to say, in the relationships of that society, what prevailed was interest, utility and payment in cash. In that environment the family paid more attention to respect from the children; veneration of the parents was hampered by selfishness, infamy, envy, hatred, misbehavior and ingratitude. These were deeply rooted moral deficiencies, which the revolution is diminishing.

Under the middle-class system the family offered no bond of human unity; the children abandoned the home; fathers left the mothers and their offspring. Thousands of mothers left or threw their children out because they did not have the necessary means to support them or a stable home, in addition to lack of education; in no way could this be considered an organized family. But, according to middle-class sociologists, that is the family which has been destroyed or is being destroyed by Sandinist revolution. It is a vile and strange accusation.

We know that the Nicaraguan family was faced with a complex gamut of social economic deficiencies, originated in the relationships of capitalist society. Most of the families did not own the home in which they lived and, our of necessity, converted the dwelling into a business. The shortage inherited by the revolution exceeded 300,000 dwellings; in the 2 years of the revolutionary government construction has amounted to 25 percent of what the Somoza regime had accomplished in 22 years. Of 15 projects realized by the revolution, 7 were carried out in the cities and 8 in the rural area; the favored families are those who are working in mines, on banana and coffee plantations, in cotton, livestock and other activities. There is no doubt that those families have found a way to become united. The decree of intervention in "clandestine real-estate developments," 90 in the country, helped more than 200,000 inhabitants, some 40,000 proletarian families organized in the ONRI [National Office of Real Estate Development]

The deficiency of the capitalist system, which defends family integrity in accordance with its "model," is extraordinary; much can be said about the inadequacies in public health, transportation and education; there was more than 60 percent illiteracy in general and the revolution has reduced this to 12 percent; similar progress has been made in labor, wages, business and other sectors.

Under the Somoza regime unemployment was more than 28 percent of the active work force which varied between 600,000 and 700,000 workers out of a national population of 2.5 million. Within a sea of destruction of the war of liberation, the plunder of tyranny, the imperialist blockade and the counterrevolutionary siege, the Sandinist revoltution has reduced unemployment to a level of 17.5 percent, and the population is more than 2.6 million. There is no question that the family has been benefited.

The unity and family integrity idealized by the middle class in one where, due to the privations and denials of democracy, sons and daughters were obliged to sell trinkets in the streets, on buses, at markets and at stadiums and could, therefore, not attend school; it is obvious that the state's superstructure did not have the necessary institutions.

Then, how could a family be integrated unicellularly and socially, if insurmountable contradictions of society force it to disintegrate? Unjust feudal relations interlaced with capitalists stifled the peasant family and forced it into a nomadic life; then the Agrarian Reform Law gave it the assurance of stability, location and the irreversible possibility of its installation and proliferation.

Of course, when the members of the middle class speak of family integrity, they begin with the subjective criterion of a privileged minority which has an abundance of the things they took from the majority; and this was done through the existence of property arrangements which served to guarantee exploitation of man by man. The middle-class concept of that family is so sublime that ideologists have sanctified and mystified it to the extreme and have enthroned it in the "Heavenly Kingdom."

That is why they accuse us of destroying the "model" of the middle-class family. Thus, this is our "crime." Let the people, those families "disintegrated" by the revolution, pass judgment on the Sandinists, revolutionary Christians, democrats, independents and Marxist-Leninists.

The family integrated under the revolutionary administration is a guarantee of the integral unity of Nicaraguan society. As a historical social category it is experiencing another phase in the ascent which will lead it to its final realization.

NONTRADITIONAL EXPORTS DECREASE BY 40 PERCENT

Managua BARRICADA in Spanish 11 Nov 81 p 7

[Text] Managua, 9 Nov (ANN)--Approximately $60 million worth of nontraditional products were exported by Nicaragua this year, according to information released today by James Zablah, director of economy of the Ministry of Foreign Trade (MICE).

Export products considered "nontraditional" are those which normally have not constituted significant categories for the country's economy but which at present are gaining importance because of the policy of diversification and markets being promoted by the National Reconstruction Government.

Zablah added that this year exports of nontraditional products experienced a decrease of 40 percent compared to the total exported in prior years, due to a series of factors which impacted negatively on the country's export capacity.

Among these factors, the director of MICE mentioned the suspension of exports of textile products, one of the strongest categories, in order to earmark them to meet the needs of the domestic market. Other factors were the large number of factories destroyed during the recent war of national liberation, the shortage of foreign exchange, the decapitalization of factories and labor problems.

What is more, Zablah also cited the problems inherent in the Central American Common Market as a factor which impacted upon the decrease in exports, particularly the political conflict in El Salvador, one of the largest buyers of Nicaraguan and Costa Rican products which took measures to decrease imports because of the economic crisis afflicting that country.

To recover the export levels, the Ministries of Foreign Trade and Industries and the Central Bank are coordinating their activities to give priority to export categories which represent the major source of revenues for Nicaragua and to find new markets, outside the Central American region.

Another measure taken was the decree issued by the National Reconstruction Government, which nationalized all exports of nontraditional products, by means of which the state is able to have greater control over foreign exchange entering the country and to earmark this exchange more effectively for the promotion of the country's export and industrialization development programs.

Among the nontraditional export products are polyvinyl chloride, oils and lubricants, toxaphene, soluble coffee and cottonseed cake and seed, all of which bring in a total of about $50 million.

Other nontraditional products are caustic soda, rums, linters, handicrafts, seafood, gold products, pottery and other articles, 90 percent of which are produced by state enterpirses.

SANDINIST, HUNGARIAN YOUTH GROUPS MEET

Managua BARRICADA in Spanish 14 Nov 81 p 5

[Text] The Government of Nicaragua should not underestimate statements made by members of the Reagan administration about possible military intervention and should take immediate, concrete steps to face up to such intervention, according to the secretary general of the Hungarian Communist Youth Union, Dr Sandor Nagy. The leader of the Hungarian youth group--who has been visiting our country for several days--said that it is no "surprise that we condemn the policy of President Ronald Reagan, who has developed "the irrational theory of a possible limited nuclear war in Europe." He also said that U.S. policy is characterized by bringing military tension to all parts of the world and gave as an example threats against Cuba and Nicaragua made by high-ranking officials on several occasions. Dr Sandor Nagy, who on behalf of the Hungarian Communist Youth Union had signed a statement with the 19 July Sandinist Youth Group in which the policy positions of both youth groups--oriented in their struggle toward peace and international disarmament--are set forth. The statement was signed on behalf of the 19 July Sandinist Youth group by Father Fernando Cardenal, member of the Executive Committee. In this statement, not only is the warmongering policy of imperialism condemned but there is also an expression of solidarity with peoples of the world who are struggling for their liberation and those struggling to consolidate the freedom they have won. Dr Sandor Nagy announced that in the next few months both youth groups will sign a cooperation agreement covering several areas. He also said that his group would publicize in his country the advances and achievements of the Sandinist Popular Revolution. The Hungarian leader had a talk with Companero Carlos Carrion, member of the National Secretariat of the FSLN [Sandinist National Liberation Front] and the Executive Committee of the 19 July Sandinist Youth group and visited several of the country's departments. He will return to his country today, together with Istvan Posta, vice secretary of the Department of International Relations, who accompanied him on his trip.

EEC AID TO GOVERNMENT--The European Economic Community (EEC) has donated to the National Reconstruction Government $30 million worth of food, technical resources and other aid, according to statements made by Plinio Palmerini, secretary of foreign relations of that international organization, at a press conference held yesterday. EEC aid during the 2 and a half years of popular revolution has been very generous and is being well handled by the government, Palmerini added and then added it is possible that aid will be greater in the future. EEC aid, apart from the agreements or bilateral aid from member countries of the EEC, is oriented toward food and agricultural programs, which are the fundamental basis of the country's development, and also toward education and literacy. At present, 10 EEC technicians are available to the Nicaraguan Government to be used as it sees fit, he said, adding that the delegates visiting Nicaragua met for 4 days to evaluate implementation of the Nicaraguan-EEC program. Present at the press conference were Michell Levante, head of the delegation; Michell Caillonnet; Sipke Broumer; the vice minister of agricultural-livestock development and agrarian reform, Salvado Mayorga, who said that work is being done on the formation of a fund for cooperatives in the amount of 60 million cordobas, which is part of the aid for the present year. He added that the government is planning to buy products in EEC countries next year and that the Carlos Fonseca project in Waslala was begun with a balancing item of 15 million cordobas which will be definitely presented to the EEC in the middle of next year. REPORT ON AID RECEIVED--Cuba, Mexico, the Soviet Union and Libya have been the foremost suppliers of aid to Nicaragua since the victory of the Sandinist Revolution, according to a UN report. The document recalls the resolution adopted by the General Assembly in December 1980 in which, recognizing the difficult economic situation in Nicaragua it once again appealed to governments and international organizations to continue and increase the aid granted to that country. A detailed account of the responses made to this appeal includes donations received in money and specie amounting to $190 million and bilateral loans of $519 million for the period 1979-1981. The United States, the wealthiest country in the West, is noteworthy for not having appeared on either of the two lists, while the European Economic Community made significant donations. Since 1981, when, in spite of a renewed appeal from the General Assembly, contributions from most of the Western countries decreased sharply, the principal donors have been Cuba, the German Democratic Republic, the Soviet Union, Argentina and Mexico. Libya contributed $100 million; the Soviet Union, $73.5 million; and Mexico, $37.5 million; followed by Venezuela, the GDR and Bulgaria. For the entire period, 1979-1981, Cuba, with

$42.5 million and Mexico with $39.5 million are at the head of the list of donor countries, while Libya, the Soviet Union, Mexico and the GDR granted the largest credits. The report also gives an account of the aid approved and programmed for the period 1979-1983 by several UN organizations for a total of $126.6 million. PRESIDENT REASSERTS RESPECT FOR TREATIES

PY020011 Lima EL COMERCIO in Spanish 23 Nov 81 p A1

[Text] Peruvian President Fernando Belaunde reasserted yesterday that Peru respects all international treaties and categorically stated that it opposes any arms race "since it obviously affects the economy of all nations."

Within this context he said that it is not proper for Ecuador to budget--as some press reports have stated--expenses "based on a hypothetical aggressiveness which Peru does not have."

Asked about press agency reports that state that Ecuador continues to purchase more arms for fear of an eventual conflict with Peru, he said: "Peru respects all treaties and it will not violate any border established by a treaty."

During the usual press conference he holds on Sundays, Belaunde said he had no knowledge of an incursion into Peruvian territory by armed Bolivian soldiers as has been charged by Senator Roger Caceres Velasquez (FNTC) [Peasants and Workers National Front].

He added: "Incidents of citizens lacking the proper papers who trespass on either side of the border may happen along any border, but Peruvian-Bolivian friendship is beyond any incident of this nature."

Asked about the reason for the meeting he held at 0900 at Government House with Peruvian Army Commander Otto Elespuru, he said that it was a routine meeting.

"We discussed issues of concern, but it was not an urgent meeting," said President Belaunde in another part of the press conference he held in one of the interior patios of Government House.

TERRORISTS ATTACK MICROWAVE STATION NEAR AYACUCHO

PY261633 Paris AFP in Spanish 1530 GMT 26 Nov 81

[Text] Lima, 26 Nov (AFP)--A group of terrorists last night attacked a microwave station of the National Telecommunications Enterprise (ENTEL-Peru) located in Ayacucho where the antenna of a local radio station was blown up the day before. This attack was part of a wave of terrorist actions throughout the nation.

The attack on the microwave station, 60 km from Ayacucho in the center-south of the country took place at 2330 local time (0130 GMT) and was heard by Gerardo Arauco, head of the station, through the radio link between the station and the town office. Arauco told a reporter for one of the local dailies that he heard screams for help and several shots.

Arauco added that after he heard the screams, communications broke down and the emergency light came on on the board. Once the events were reported to them, local government officials sent heavily armed reinforcements to the station which is located in Acci, 60 km southeast of Ayacucho. The five provinces of Ayacucho Department have been under a state of emergency for 2 months now because of successive terrorist attacks.

So far there is no information about the results of the attack on the microwave station or the fate of its guards, four civil guardsmen, and a few employees.

Neither is there information about the reinforcements sent because communications between the microwave station, the city of Ayacucho and Lima have been cut off.

MORE DYNAMITE ATTACKS REGISTERED IN AYACUCHO

PY222207 Paris AFP in Spanish 1943 GMT 22 Nov 81

[Text] Lima, 22 Nov (AFP)--It was disclosed here today that five new dynamite attacks took place yesterday, Saturday, in Ayacucho, located in south-central Peru. A state of emergency has been maintained there for 1 and 1/2 months to combat the outbreak of (?violence). In addition, a young physician has disappeared in this area.

The curfew in the mentioned zone, where five provinces of the department were declared in a state of emergency on 12 October due to the attack against a police station in which two civilians and one policeman died, had been reduced by 1 hour only 24 hours ago.

The dynamite attacks in Ayacucho, where a curfew was in force from 2200 until 0500 (0300 to 1000 GMT) and which had been reduced by 1 hour on Friday because tranquillity had been reestablished, were carried out in various neighborhoods at 5-minute intervals. They caused alarm among the people and some material damages.

The first dynamite stick exploded in the garden of an estate where 20 families live. It only broke several window panes. The second one exploded near Apurimac Bridge which is near the cemetery. Another dynamite stick exploded in the middle of the road of another neighborhood of this city while the other two took place in the [words indistinct] private stadium [coliseo cerrado] of Caracas City and the stadium of Cumana City.

The daily EL DIARIO reports on the disappearnace of physician Hildebrando Quintana. He was carrying out graduation training service in Vilcashuaman. He has been missing since 9 November after having been arrested on charges of being an alleged terrorist but who was later released by the police.

The police have disclosed that in Catoche Town, Cajamarca Department, 859 north of Lima, they have discovered the largest terrorist arsenal comprising 10,500 dynamite sticks, a 1,000-meter-long fuse roll and other explosive devices which had been stolen from a Transport Ministry depot. In connection with this arsenal the police have already arrested three persons whose identities have not been released.

EXPLOSION DESTROYS MINING CENTER--Lima, 4 Dec (AFP)--The mining center of Carahuacra in La Oroya, 180 km toward the center-south of Peru [from Lima], was practically destroyed last Wednesday by the explosion of 9,700 sticks of dynamite. There were no casualties because the workers were timely evacuated, it was reported here today. The accident which totally destroyed the installations at the mining center, where 500 workers and their families live, was caused by the chain explosion of a stockpile of dynamite, apparently set off by an overheated stove. The report adds that only a few people were injured, and they have been evacuated to a nearby hospital. It was also reported that the police have begun an investigation to determine the exact causes of the accident. [Text] [PY041711 Paris AFP in Spanish 1802 GMT 4 Dec 81]

INDUSTRIALIST'S HOUSE DYNAMITED--Lima, 4 Dec (AFP)--A powerful dynamite charge early this morning caused serious damage to the residence of industrialist Karel Hartinger, located in the San Isidro District of Lima. It did not harm any of the 10 inhabitants of the house, however. The bombing, which is the first to have been carried out against private property, caused heavy damage to the lot and to furniture and to windows in homes within a one block radius. During the past 48 hours, two attacks occurred in Huarez in Ancash Department, 400 km northeast of Lima, against a high-tension tower and the regional telecommunications office, causing blackouts in that city and in Carhuaz, Recuay and Ticapampa. This brings the number of attacks against metal high-tension towers to 13. [Text] [PY042314 Paris AFP in Spanish 1805 GMT 4 Dec 81]

ARMED FORCES APPROVAL RULED OUT--Lima, 3 Dec (AFP)--The Peruvian Senate has excluded the armed forces joint command from participation in the approval of contracts for petroleum exploration and exploitation in the country. Last night the senate approved an amendment of the petroleum contracting law; the amendment does not stipulate the approval of the high military command and other state organizations as a condition for the approval of such contracts. The amendment stipulates that the state enterprise Petroperu--which controls hydrocarbons on behalf of the state--may negotiate or renegotiate petroleum contracts with the approval of the Council of Ministers after the energy and mines, economy, finance and trade, war, navy and aeronautics ministers, the Central Reserve Bank and the comptroller general of the republic have given their opinions. The former decree-law, promulgated by the past military government in 1979, demanded a favorable opinion by the consulted organizations. The participation of the joint command in these preliminary consultations has been replaced by that of the Aeronautics Ministry. Last April a contract with the U.S. company Superior Oil was delayed because of objections made by the joint command, made up of the highest officers of the three forces. SOVIET DELEGATE CALLS FOR WORLD PEACE--Lima, 24 Nov (AFP)--Antanas Barkauskas, deputy chairman of the Supreme Soviet today called for all nations to prevent World War III which would wipe out mankind. Barkauskas today arrived in Lima heading an eight-member delegation of the Supreme Soviet and indicated that USSR President [as received] Leonid Brezhnev is taking effective steps toward the maintenance of peace, as evidenced by his trip to the FRG. Barkauskas pointed out that the Soviet leader will hold disarmament talks with the United States soon and pointed out that currently there is military balance between the two superpowers but the firming up of this balance would depend on the accords between the two nations. He recalled that the Nazis had unleashed the last war which killed 50 million people and stressed that new Hitlers must be prevented from causing another war, a nuclear one this time, which would wipe out mankind. The delegation, which was met by the chairmen of the Chamber of Deputies and the Senate, Luis Percovich and Javier Alva respectively, Lima Mayor Eduardo Orrego, and other officials, will stay in Peru for 5 days and will then travel to Ecuador. BANKING STRIKE BEGINS--Lima, 27 Nov (AFP)--The 1,000 Peruvian banking employees began today a general 48-hour strike in support of their colleagues of the Central Reserve Bank, which issues the national currency. This strike will end on Monday afternoon. The strike is still on by the 2,500 workers of the railway line that links Lima with the center of the country. This strike began 10 days ago over salary disputes and, according to the state enterprise, it has caused losses of 500 million soles ($1 million). Likewise, no solution has been found to the strike by municipal public sanitation workers of this capital--despite its having been suspended yesterday after 11 days--for the municipal officials have refused to reinstate 450 dismissed workers. The object of the banking strike is to force the Central Bank to revoke the posting to other public institutions--while retaining all their benefits--of 69 out of the 1,600 employees who work there. The Central Bank reported that this measure is due to a restructuring process started last February in keeping with the annual budget law. [Text] [PY011041 Paris AFP in Spanish 1744 GMT 27 Nov 81]

POLICE CAPTURE TERRORIST COMMANDO--Lima, 2 Dec (AFP)--The police of Huancayo, capital of the region, reported today the capture of a terrorist commando that perpetrated 152 attacks in the central region of the country. The police explained that the group that was detained and 200 other activists, most of whom belong to the extremist movement Shining Path, had caused damage worth 550 million soles ($1.1 million). The police also reported that Raul Juan de Dios Rojas, head of the command, had been union leader of the state mining complex Centro-Min, Ex Cerro de Pasco. The police also blamed the extremists of having killed a policeman and of blowing with dynamite high-tension power line towers, public establishments, the railroad and commercial establishments. It was also learned that the police yesterday frustrated the blowing up of the television repeating station in Cusco Department, in southeastern Peru, by deactivating in time a charge of 15 sticks of dynamite. LIMA HIGH TENSION TOWER DESTROYED--Lima, 26 Nov (LATIN-REUTER)--Three large neighborhoods in the outskirts of this capital were left without electricity for several hours today when unidentified persons blew up a high tension tower only 24 hours after another similar attack left Lima and two other cities in darkness. According to an official report, the attack took place at 0645 GMT when a group of people detonated an explosive device in a tower of the distribution line that carries electricity to southern Lima in the districts of Atocomgo, Villa Maria del Triumfo and Ciudad de Dios. Early yesterday unidentified persons blew up a gigantic tower in Huancayo, in the Central Andes, leaving that province, this capital of 5 million people and Huaral without electricity. With this attack a total of 15 have been perpetrated since 28 July 1980 when democracy was reestablished in Peru when Fernando Belaunde Terry assumed the presidency. OPPOSITION LABOUR PARTY POLICIES ON SUGAR, LEADERSHIP HIT

Basseterre THE DEMOCRAT in English 31 Oct 81 p 5

[Text] According to a report published by the Opposition Labour Party here, its parent body the Labour Union at its recently held 42nd Annual Conference resolved to demand a big increase in wages for sugar workers next year.

If this is true, it must surely be regarded as the height of inconsistency and irresponsibility, and it highlights once again the fundamental and conflicting differences in the respective aims of these two strange bedfellows.

Not so long ago, the Labour Party was proclaiming that the sugar industry is on the verge of collapse. For narrow political reasons, the Party predicted a $40 million overdraft for NACO by the year 1982. Whatever the deficit may be, it is certain that the wage bill accounts for the greatest part of it.

Yet although NACO's wage bill has increased by more than 100% in the last four (4) years, the same persons who were recently warning about imminent financial collapse, now seem bent as Union leaders on pushing the sugar industry over the brink.

We understand that for the second year running Lee Moore as Labour Union President objected strenuously to a motion from one section which seeks to resolve that if the Union President were ever to become Premier he must automatically step down as Union President.

News has reached us that when this motion was rejected, a large section of young delegates walked out in disgust.

SUITS AGAINST NEWSPAPER--Basseterre, St Kitts, Monday, (CANA)--Former St Kitts-Nevis Minister of Education Fitzroy Bryant, now a lawyer in private practice and treasurer of the St Kitts-Nevis Trades and Labour Union, has filed a writ in the High Court claiming damages for libel against the Democratic Printing Company Limited, publishers of the pro-government newspaper the DEMOCRAT. Bryant's claim has been filed by his solicitor, Lee Moore, former Premier, currently leader of the Opposition and President of the union. Bryant claims that the words of an article published in the DEMOCRAT of October 24, 1981, headed "Bryant Should Remember" were false and malicious and calculated to disparage him in his profession or calling. He alleges that in consequence of the said works, he had been gravely injured in his character and credit. Bryant is also seeking an injunction to restrain the DEMOCRAT from further publishing and printing the alleged libellous material. Another politically linked action is pending, on a writ by former high school principal, Miss Ivy Thompson, against the DEMOCRAT through her solicitor Fitzroy Bryant. Miss Thompson is complaining that in the issue of that paper dated October 18, 1981, words were published to the effect that she was 'incompetent and unsuitable for the position of principal of a high school.' They had gravely injured her character and credit, the writ said. She is also seeking an injunction to prevent further spead of the alleged defamation of her character. COTTON EARNINGS--As part of their continuing programme of economic diversification the PAM/NRP Government has been making strenuous efforts to encourage the development of cash crops both in St Kitts and Nevis. It is therefore a matter for some satisfaction that Government's heavy subsidisation of the cotton industry in Nevis is visibly and speedily paying dividends for the "small men" who are engaged in cotton production. A news release out of the Agricultural Department in Nevis indicates that the sum of $170,000 has been earned this year by the 30 small farmers engaged in cotton production. The kind of cash being earned by small farmers was unheard of previously. In the year before PAM/NRP assumed office, only 37.5 acres of land were under cotton cultivation. The total yield was just 7,945 lbs. This year 202 cultivated acres produced 79,309 lbs, practically ten times the previous year's tally. The figures appear even more spectacular when one learns that the yield of clean seed per acre has actually doubled, as a result of Government's insistence on greater technical expertise for the small farmers, who now employ more modern methods of fertilizing and pest control. CDB CLARIFIES REPORT ON WORLD BANK, ST LUCIA LOANS

[Text]

The Caribbean Development Bank (CDB) yesterday denied that it had received an aid package of US$31 million from the World Bank for the Lesser Developed Countries of the Caribbean.

In addition, it pointed out that out of an eight million dollar soft term loan from the World Bank, St. Lucia had received US$400 000 and not EC$400 000.

The CDB was reacting to a CANA report dated October 20 out of Castries which quoted Prime Minister Winston Cenac saying that "St. Lucia had been able to receive only EC$400 000 of a 31 million aid package to the Less Developed Countries (LDC's) made through the Caribbean Development Bank.

In a release to the Caribbean News Agency (CANA), the bank said that in January 1980, the World Bank made available to it the following loans and credits amounting to US$31 million.

— A US$23 million — for inclusion in the Bank's ordinary capital resources for making loans on "hard" terms to all LDC and MDC member countries (except Trinidad and Tobago).

— US$8 million — for inclusion in the Bank's special (IDA credit and EEC action credit) funds resources for making loans on "soft" terms to those LDC member countries which are members of the ECCM. ECCM.

The release explained: "As is well known (and for obvious reasons) the bank's "hard" resources are used mainly in the MDC member countries and the "soft" resources mainly in the LDC member countries.

"Accordingly, the $23 million "hard" loan is being used entirely in the MDC's, with the exception of some loans to Belize and St. Vincent and the Grenadines.

The bulk of the $8 million of "soft" money will go to Dominica and St. Vincent, as agreed with the World Bank in early 1980 as these countries were then considered very seriously affected by disasters — hurricanes and volcanic eruption.

"CDB did not receive an aid package of US$31 million for the LDC's. CDB, however, received US$8 million on very soft terms from the World Bank (IDA) for on-lending to the ECCM LDC's, US$400 000 of which has been lent to St. Lucia (not repeat not EC$400 000).

VIOLENCE, VANDALISM ERUPT AS CENAC WINS NO-CONFIDENCE VOTE

Bridgetown THE NATION in English 30 Oct 81 p 18

[Text]

SMALL-SCALE sporadic incidents of violence and vandalism took place here Wednesday night shortly after Prime Minister Winston Cenac's ruling Saint Lucia Labour Party (SLP) had survived an opposition motion of no-confidence in the House of Assembly.

Police reported yesterday that a small gang of men used stones to smash the glass show-windows of three buildings, just outside the city's main commercial area.

The National Insurance Scheme (NIS) building which houses the inland revenue department and a small store, were among the places attacked.

A number of parked cars, including that of Speaker Donald Alcee, also had their windows smashed and a policeman sustained minor head injuries.

The violence ended as suddenly as it started. Policemen armed with batons patrolled outside parliament buildings and parts of the city, but no arrests were made.

It was the second time in five months that political agitation had spilled over into attacks on business places.

Last May, gangs of youths went on the rampage after an opposition protest demonstration calling for resignation of Cenac's government.

They broke through a police cordon, smashed business places and hurled stones at the police who responded with teargas.

Wednesday night the police, obviously anticipating problems, cleared away groups of persons who had gathered outside parliament buildings.

The debate failed to live up to expections, especially as most of the key political figures in the house failed to speak.

Among them were Opposition leader John Compton and Progressive Labour Party leader George Odlum, on the opposition side and Prime Minister Cenac and Foreign Minister Peter Josie on the government side.

Apart from deputy United Workers Party leader George Mallet who moved the motion, the only opposition speaker was deputy DLP leader Michael Pilgrim. The government's response came from Communications Minister Remy Lesmond and backbencher Evans Calderon. (CANA).

CENAC ON REAGAN REMARKS--Castries, St Lucia, Saturday (CANA)--St Lucia Prime Minister Winston Cenac, has said that the capacities of small islands like St Lucia to develop their own economies are severely limited because of their traditional problems of underdevelopment. Mr Cenac was reacting to the call by the President of the United States Ronald Reagan, for Third World countries to develop free market economies, and get their economic houses in order instead of relying so much on foreign aid. This position was reiterated by the U.S. President to developing countries at the Cancun summit in Mexico. Mr Cenac expressed the view that St Lucia and most other developing states in the region are doing their best to develop their economies, adding that their efforts were impeded by problems of underdevelopment inherited over the years. The St Lucia Prime Minister said that to develop their economies, the islands needed a heavy flow of capital and investment from outside the region. "But having said all of this, I must emphasise that we believe in a free economy, in a mix between private investment and public investment. We believe that a mixed economy is about the best way in which we can develop our resources and solve unemployment," he added. The Prime Minister said he firmly believed that the private sector can do more to assist in the development of the economy. Mr Cenac added that the United States was developed to a very large extent from a flow of capital from Europe and in addition, the U.S. was always considered a rich country with its minerals and fertile soil. Therefore, Mr Cenac said, it was unfair to expect any poor developing country to prosper without capital aid and other forms of external assistance. JOSIE IN GUYANA--Georgetown, Guyana, Oct 23 (CANA)--St Lucia's Foreign Minister Peter Josey is now in Guyana on a short visit during which he will examine the structure of the ruling Peoples National Congress. "We are reorganising our party, and in fact we have been doing so for several years, and feel that we can benefit from the organisational aspects of the ruling party here," he told CANA today. "My visit can be described as a learning process. In fact we in St Lucia can learn not only from the ruling party here, but also in Trinidad and Tobago and in Barbados." The St Lucian Foreign Minister referred to the debate in the St Lucian parliament next Tuesday of a motion of no confidence in the St Lucian government. "I have every confidence that we will survive that motion but my concern is what happens afterwards. It is a fact that the country must continue to exist and the government must continue to govern. We must think in terms of a more dynamic approach to the problems. There must be more dynamism in the government," he said. Mr Josey said the government will have to think in terms of what steps to take as it continues to rule the island. The opposition he added "continues to make noise but this is not how the masses feel." [Text] [Kingston THE DAILY GLEANER in English 29 Oct 81 p 3]

UPM ON U.S.-CUBAN TIES--Kingston, St Vincent, Wednesday (CANA)--St Vincent's Opposition has called on Vincentians to demand to hear the Cuban case on U.S.-Cuban relations. The UPM's call follows a recent lecture-discussion here by coordinator of the Cuban desk in Washington, Nyles Frechette. Mr Frechette a week ago charged that the Havana Administration has "a remarkable capacity to create problems for the U.S. Government." The U.S. diplomat said that it was difficult for Cuba to escape the Soviets' orders even if it wanted to, in view of what he described as "Castro's heavy economic dependence on the Soviet Union." The UPM spoke of "the clap-trap put out by Mr Frechette," and questioned in what way did the University Centre intend to stimulate discussions on U.S.-Cuban relations. What fairness and democracy was there in bringing American personnel twice, when there was a reluctance to bring Cuban officials to put their side of the story? The party asked. "Must our views of Cuba and Cuban—U.S. relations continue to be shaped by the U.S. State Department and its agencies?" President of the St Vincent-Cuba Friendship Society, Vaspar London, stated that for some time the society has been endeavouring unsuccessfully to solicit the assistance of the University Centre to get the Cuban Ambassador to conduct a discussion. He added, however, that the society was still pursuing the matter. [Text] [Bridgetown ADVOCATE-NEWS in English 12 Nov 81 p 3]

ALLIANCE PROGRAM ON FOREIGN POLICY GETS PRE-ELECTION AIRING

Port-of-Spain TRINIDAD GUARDIAN in English 30 Oct 81 p 9

[Text] The Alliance (DAC-Tapia-ULF) has affirmed the full political, economic and cultural independence of Trinidad and Tobago as an integral part of the West Indies and the Caribbean.

This is stated in the Common Policy and Programme of the Alliance, which is contesting the November 9 general elections.

The final section of the programme, dealing with foreign policy:

A Foreign Policy Paper:

The Foreign Policy of a country is the primary vehicle through which it stakes its claim as a sovereign nation. For this reason, in the constitutional road to independence, control of foreign policy (with Defence) was usually one of the last areas to be surrendered by the colonial masters. For this reason, too, it is the dynamism and sense of purpose with which a new State pursues its foreign policy which marks it as a truly independent nation and invests it with the characteristics of political maturity.

In the years since 1962, however, the promises which were at first held out have remained unfulfilled. Trinidad and Tobago, given its historical antecedents and geographical location, seemed, at the time of independence, well-placed to become the bridge-builder between Latin America on the one hand, and the countries of Africa and Asia on the other, to interpret one part of the world to the others, and to demonstrate domestically through its collection of races and peoples the possibilities of peaceful coexistence for the world at large.

Unfortunately, none of these rich possibilities have been seized. Our foreign policy, unduly timid to begin with, quickly became stale and has remained uninspired. Today we are at a stage where we neither "recognise nor derecognise"; where our level of representation at regional and international forums is often so low as to constitute an insult in terms of protocol; and where frequently the nature of our conference participation is embarrassing in the extreme. Drift and aimlessness rather than direction and purpose have characterised our foreign policy over the years.

Clear Concept

Foreign policy, however, is not only the tangible expression of a people's self-conception, it is also a vehicle for the attainment of material objectives supportive of the productive life of the nation.

For this reason a meaningful foreign policy must properly be directly connected to domestic plans and purposes.

In the present situation such vital integration is completely absent, a condition which, no doubt, arises from the lack of any clear concept of the road to be travelled by Trinidad and Tobago as we approach the twenty-first century.

To explain the lacklustre foreign policy pursued by thi country thus far some cynics would say that we have nothing to protect for the soul of the nation is dying. No greater crime can be perpetrated, no greater indignity visited upon a people, than when those who are in authority, who through inaction, passivity, confusion or ignorance, surrender the sovereignty of their nation and stifle the soul of their people.

To remedy this situation, to provide a vision of our role in the Caribbean, the Atlantic community and the wider world, to fully participate in the brotherhood of nations to which we belong, the Alliance proposes a foreign policy which, through its various components, would consistently and resolutely secure, maintain and champion the national autonomy of our State, thus to affirm the full political, economic and cultural independence of Trinidad and Tobago as an integral part of the West Indies and the Caribbean.

Major Elements

The major elements of such a Foreign Policy are:

(a) A frank recognition of the major objective factors which frame our existence as a country. Three such factors stand out immediately. Trinidad and Tobago is first, a small country. Second, we are a Caribbean country. Third, we are a cosmopolitan country. None of these factors is subject to change and they thus serve as the basic determinants of our range of interests as well as impose outer limits on the range of policies that we can reasonably adopt.

(b) An active vigilance in defence of the principle of nonintervention and in rejection of every attempt at discrimination, economic pressure, blockade or invasion attempted by any country against another except where such actions are adopted by the international community against States whose principles and practices are repugnant to the basic concepts of human dignity. Our advocacy of such a principle must be seen in the context of a situation where the territorial integrity and even the basic sovereignty of many small post-colonial States in Central America, Africa, Asia and the Pacific are threatened by external forces. We must insist on a policy that defends the integrity of such countries if we genuinely hope to maintain our own.

(c) An active involvement in the pursuit of a new economic order. For us such a search begins with the fullest exploitation of the possibilities of Caribbean Economic integration through CARICOM, the Caribbean Development Bank and other related institutions. In addition we will move to the strengthening of our involvement with the nations of the ACP as well as actively support all initiatives designed to redress the historical inequities of the international economic system.

(d) A commitment to bilateral and multilateral ties with other nations of the world based on their respect of our independence and self determination and a pursuit of closer ties with those countries of the world with which our people have cultural and ethnic affinities.

(e) A commitment to educate the population of Trinidad and Tobago as well as those of our partners in the Caribbean on the issues faced by the Caribbean Community as we approach the twenty-first century. To that end we shall make Port of Spain the centre of a much more active Caribbean diplomacy with the aid of:

(i) A professionally competent regional newspaper;

(ii) Appropriate shortwave radio facilities; and

(iii) Appropriate adjustments in the regional University system designed to render it an effective centre for the dissemination of information and analysis to all levels of Caribbean society.

CHAMBERS TAKES TOUGH LINE ON WORKERS IN CAMPAIGN SPEECH

Port-of-Spain TRINIDAD GUARDIAN in English 24 Oct 81 p 1

[Article by John Barb: "Work or Face Dismissal Warns PM"]

[Text] "From November 10 we will have to begin to think in terms of an honest day's work for an honest day's pay," Prime Minister George Chambers told thousands of PNM members and supporters at Sangre Grande on Thursday night.

He was referring to the attitudes of some people.

"When we start to keep the promise of sharing power with you, you will have to understand a few things," added Mr Chambers, who is also Political Leader of the People's National Movement (PNM).

For example, he cited that the man to operate the elevator must operate the elevator because that is what he is being paid to do.

"The long and short of it is," he said, "we would have to fire some people, and we would have to hire people who want to work for the people of Trinidad and Tobago," he added.

PNM Records

Mr Chambers also pointed to areas where he said the PNM had a record--housing, water, education, etc. But that, he explained, did not mean to say that everything was working right.

"We come to you with our housing record, but I can't say that everyone who needs a house, has a house," he declared. "When we give you a house, you have to pay the rent; you have to pay the mortgage.

"We can no longer afford a situation where some people have three houses, and lying to get another one. It is unfair to the man who does not have one," he said.

"It is not Alert (meaning Housing Minister, Carlton Alert) who steals the galvanise, you know," said Mr Chambers. "It is not Alert who steals the toilet bowls, and window frames.

"It is not Kamal who stealing the bed-sheets in the hospitals, you know; nor the cutlery, and food. And above all, is not he who stealing the drugs in the hospital," the Prime Minister added. [as published]

He pointed to the many things that belonged to the people, and said that Trinidad and Tobago was the only place in the world where a government was attacked for barking on the type of diversification it has embarked upon Port Lisas.

Unit Trust

Then he told the crowd: "At Point Lisas you now own the most modern port in the Western hemisphere, with four persons operating it. Also, the most technologically advanced steel mill, 51 per cent of two fertiliser plants and, soon, 51 per cent in a methanol plant," he added.

He hinted that establishment of the energy-based industries were far away from finishing, because in the followup there would be downstream operations from which the small man would benefit--using as a lever the Unit Trust legislation that was proclaimed on Thursday.

After pointing out areas of State-ownership in various enterprises, Mr Chambers said the people now owned the commanding heights of the economy.

He said that under the Unit Trust legislation, everyone would be able to buy units in the Trust, and that Trust would buy shares in companies.

The Unit Trust legislation, Mr Chambers said, was the final legacy of the late Prime Minister, Dr Eric Williams, to the people of Trinidad and Tobago.

He said the PNM was the first to come out with a "People's Sector." He recalled the party convention of 1970, following the disturbances, when the party amended its "People's Charter" with "Perspectives for the New Society."

"We are coming to you with a positive record of achievements," said Mr Chambers, "Nobody else has one."

Friendship

He also spoke on transportation and said that Trinidad and Tobago was probably the only place in the world where people could travel as freely and cheaply.

A few months ago, he recalled, gasoline in the United Kingdom was (TT) $9 a gallon. In Trinidad and Tobago, it was one-ninth of that.

Speaking about Tobago, Mr Chambers said he believed that the people of Tobago have recognised that Trinidad has extended a sincere hand of friendship. "And I can honestly say," he said, "that the people of Tobago have accepted that hand of friendship. I hope that they will continue to hold that hand of friendship."

The Prime Minister urged the people to check the voters' list. It was their solemn duty to check, he said.

In order to ensure that they had continued democracy in this country--a democracy that has been nurtured and cherished--they ought to vote the PNM back into power.

BUSINESSMEN CHARGE FIRES ARE SET BY POLITICAL ACTIVISTS

Possibility of Arson

Bridgetown ADVOCATE-NEWS in English 7 Nov 81 p 3

[Text]

PORT-OF-SPAIN, Trinidad, Friday, (CANA) — City businessmen here have claimed that two fires which wiped out 19 firms were set by political activists.

Syrian and Lebanese businessmen, who said they might be victimised if they gave their names to the press, said that at least two managers had been threatened by persons who said they held the wrong political philosophy before their business went up in smoke.

The police have made no arrests following the fires on Saturday and Tuesday, but Commissioner Randolph Burroughs admitted that arson might have been involved and said the crime-fighters would be keeping a closer eye on business premises.

A travel service, five boutiques, the Businessmen's Association, a book store and a watch repair business were among the 10 businesses destroyed last Tuesday. The damage from the fires has been unofficially tagged at more than $2 million.

Trinidad and Tobago goes to the polls on Monday to elect a new government.

The Police Commissioner has advised businessmen to make a thorough check of their premises for "any suspicious parcels or devices." He told them not to be lured into keeping parcels for persons whom they did not know.

He also suggested they demand proper identification papers from policemen before permitting a tour of their premises.

Police Dragnet

Bridgetown THE NATION in English 8 Nov 81 p 1

[Text] Five Barbadians are listed among 17 CARICOM nationals caught in a Trinidad and Tobago police dragnet in an effort to combat what has been regarded as pre-election sabotage.

They are: Roy John, 27; Anthony Brathwaite, 28; Richard Nightengale, 45; Junior Aimes, 34; and Erskine Forde, 30.

The five, who were among the group arrested for questioning, were held during a tactical police exercise, at the paddock, Queen's Park Savannah, early on Thursday morning, following an all-night vigil.

The crackdown came as police searched for clues to fires which left nine business premises on Charlotte Street, Port-of-Spain, destroyed last Saturday night. Another business house on the same street, was burnt-out following Tuesday night.

Apart from the five Barbadians held two Jamaicans, and three Grenadians formed the group of 17, all were deemed prohibited immigrants. The other seven are Trinidadians.

Trinidad and Tobago Police Chief, Randy Burrowes, has hinted that there was an organised gang causing great disorder in his country.

He mounted a strike force, comprising of the Flying and Narcotic Squad, the Special Tactical Unit, the Divisional Task Forces and Port-of-Spain detectives.

In addition to the fires, the arrested men were being questioned about the recent spate of armed robberies and other crimes in Trinidad.

11-MAN COMMITTEE TO DEVELOP NON-OIL SECTOR OF ECONOMY

Port-of-Spain TRINIDAD GUARDIAN in English 3 Nov 81 p 1

[Text] Cabinet has appointed an 11-member committee to consider ways of developing exports from the non-oil sector of the economy.

The committee, chaired by Mr Eldon Warner, general manager of the Industrial Development Corporation (IDC), is expected to complete the exercise within three months.

A Whitehall statement said last night Cabinet had been concerned over the dependence on the petroleum sector to provide the bulk of export earnings and the dependence appeared to be increasing.

In 1981 the petroleum sector contributed more than 40 per cent of the national output--80 percent of export earnings and 64 percent of government revenues.

The figures reflect the decline of the agricultural exports, notwithstanding the reduced output of sugar and its falling prices.

Last year the import bill was about $650 million, the statement said.

The members of the committee, apart from Mr Warner, are Mr M. Ramsaran, Economist I, (Acting Economist II), Ministry of Industry, Commerce and Consumer Affairs; Mrs L.L. Cumberbatch, Head, Political and Economic Division, Ministry of External Affairs; Mr Eon Abner, Economist, Research and Development Division, Ministry of Finance and Planning; Mr Lennox Osborne, Manager, EXCITO, (representing Trinidad and Tobago Development Finance Corporation);

Mr Clive Teelucksingh and Mr Arthur Lok Jack (representing Trinidad and Tobago Chamber of Industry and Commerce); Mr Val Rogers, also representing the Trinidad and Tobago Chamber of Industry and Commerce; Mr Ed Fung, (representing Small Business Association of Trinidad and Tobago); Mr W. Rudder, Ministry of Agriculture, Lands and Food Production, Acting Head, Economic and Planning Division; and Mr Neville Blake, member/secretary, acting Export Promotion Officer (representing the International Marketing Corporation).

The terms of reference are to identify constraints to boost exports in manufactured and processed goods from Trinidad and Tobago to the Caricom and international markets; and to recommend measures for the removal of all bottlenecks and suggest ways to beef up exports through the use of fiscal and other incentives.

PUBLIC SERVANTS' WAGE DEMANDS DISCUSSED; WORK STOPPED

Cost to Government

Port-of-Spain TRINIDAD GUARDIAN in English 31 Oct 81 p 1

[Excerpt] Present wage demands by the five unions representing the country's public servants would result in a bill of $2.57 billion over the 1981 to 1983 period, with $670 million in 1981 alone. This was stated by Chief Personnel Officer, Mr Hilton Cupid, during an address on television last night. Mr Cupid also said that the unions' demands continued to be "extraordinarily excessive and far removed from any reasonable area of settlement."

He added that the offer to the unions of $100 across the board plus 30 per cent in the first year and ten per cent in the next two years was a fair one which could stand up to scrutiny.

Should the unions accept the CPO's wage offer, the cost to Government would be $1.8 billion--$770 million less than was being demanded by the unions.

Halt in Operations

Port-of-Spain TRINIDAD GUARDIAN in English 6 Nov 81 p 1

[Article by Irma Rambaran]

[Excerpts] Operations in the postal services, courts, schools, and most government-run offices came to a virtual standstill as thousands of public servants heeded a call by their unions to stay far far away from their jobs yesterday.

The action code named "Operation Charlie," will gain momentum today the last working day before the general elections on Monday, as the unions have strengthened their call and public servants are expected to come out in their thousands.

The 52,000 workers in at least five branches in the public service mounted their action to get the Government's Chief Personnel Officer, Mr Hilton Cupid, to give them a 75 per cent increase over a three-year period, retroactive to January 1, 1981.

The CPO has countered with a 50 per cent (30x10x10 plus $100 across the board).

The CPO and the public servants met up to 5 a.m. yesterday, ending a 17-hour meeting--the longest so far since they started negotiation in September last year.

The 52,000 postmen, clerks, firemen, police and others want an early settlement.

The public servants were joined by teachers later in the day and one teacher who is involved in the recognition issue of the Trinidad and Tobago Unified Teachers Association (TTUTA) said that unless public servants came out in full force ("like we did") then they won't get to the "nerve of the government."

Also present at yesterday's meeting was Mr Harold Taylor, who is acting as adviser to the unions. The unions representing the public servants are the Public Services Association, PSA, the Fire Services Association Prison Officers Association, Police Association and the Postmen's Union.

KIDNAPPING, TORTURE IN SOUTHERN CONE REVEALED

FL041826 Havana Voice of Cuba in English to North America and the Caribbean 0500 GMT 4 Dec 81

[Text] Uruguayan labor leader (Sergio Lopez Burgos) has revealed the details of the kidnappings of Uruguayan citizens in Brazil and Argentina, giving the names of the kidnappers and torturers.

(Lopez Burgos), who is in the Brazilian city of Porto Alegre, was jailed in Libertad prison until last May. He was kidnapped in 1976 in Argentina, where he had sought exile. (Lopez Burgos) was then secretly taken to Uruguay by torturers from both countries. He accused Gen (Amauri Kant); majors (Nelson Diar), (Manuel Ferrero) and (Jose Galazzo), the current head of the Uruguayan army intelligence; captains (Eduardo Ferro) and (Mario Maurente); and two Argentine officers, (Noel Igor) and (Tatin), as those responsible for his kidnapping and torture.

(Lopez Burgos) said that labor leaders (Gerardo Gatti), (Leon Duarte) and (Ivo Mendez), who disappeared in Buenos Aires, were last seen in Argentina's naval mechanics school. He added that he was in a cell next to that of (Universindo Rodrigues Diaz), who the Uruguayans kidnapped in Porto Alegre 3 years ago, along with Lillian Celiberti. There is no news on Celiberti's whereabouts.

(Lopez Burgos) sayd that (Rodrigues Diaz) told him that Col (Calixto de Armas) is the head of the Uruguayan military commando that kidnapped him and that Major (Mendez) was one of his torturers. (Rodrigues Diaz) also told him that while a prisoner in Buenos Aires he had witnessed the torture of Roberto Santucho's sister. Santucho is the top leader of Argentina's People's Revolutionary Army.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE REORGANIZATION APPROVED

PY012010 Montevideo EL DIA in Spanish 11 Nov 81 p 1

[Text] Yesterday the executive branch published the approval of Constitutional Act No 12 signed by president of the republic Lt Gen (Ret) Gregorio Alvarez together with the national defense, interior and justice ministers.

In the preamble of the decree it is established that "the causes which were the reason and bases for the approval of Constitutional Act No 8 have disappeared" and that the executive branch in the present circumstances deems "indispensable the immediate reorganization of the administration of justice, not only because of the great importance which a measure of this nature represents, but mainly because it entails giving concrete form to one of the most firm purposes of the civilian-military process which guides the republic's future."

It is pointed out that with this purpose and abiding by the ruling principles of our political law, laid down by the founder of our nationality in the 5th instruction of the year XIII [as published], "the executive branch believes that it is necessary to organize the jurisdictional function so that the administration of justice will perform with the powers belonging to a state branch."

Regarding the independence of the judges--from the technical and economic points of view--the decree points out that it is "achieved through the implementation of the mechanisms which the most authorized and widespread constitutional practice on the subject suggests in this regard, this is, by making sure that the appointment, transfer, promotion and approval of judges and their secretaries and clerks are carried out with maximum guarantess within a system in which all the branches participate equitably under the constant surveillance of the public."

POLITICAL SYSTEM--"We have reasserted several times that our main objective is to establish a political system in which all Uruguayans--not foreign groups or persons who are not in keeping with national interests--can express their ideas and interests in complete freedom and in an organized manner. This political activity will be established within the framework of the political parties statute that is being drafted. There is no democracy without strong, representative and responsible political parties that observe the true national interests." The navy commander, Vice Adm Rodolfo Invidio, made this statement in a speech he delivered yesterday at the Navy Plaza during a ceremony held to commemorate the 164th anniversary of the Uruguayan Navy. The high-ranking navy chief added that "we are going to establish a society characterized by order, a proper place in society for everyone and dignity; a society in which life is worth living and not merely the scene of a struggle caused by the selfish interests of a few irresponsible persons." He noted: [We are going to] "establish a democratic society in which all citizens can have an active and political representation in keeping with our traditional and proper lifestyle. But [we will establish] a lifestyle that will not destroy itself merely because it does not know how to cope with the real problems affecting Uruguayans." STREET DEMONSTRATORS REPRESSED--Montevideo, 3 Dec (TELAM)--The Interior Ministry last night announced through a communique which was released by the National Public Relations Bureau (DINARP) that the Uruguayan Government and the armed forces will strongly repress street demonstrations. The communique states that the government and the armed forces will not remain indifferent toward the slightest attempt at disrupting social peace and that they will firmly apply the law to those who engage in such actions. The communique adds that on the evening of 30 November groups of persons demonstrated along the 18 De Julio Avenue, chanting Marxist mottos and slogans. The demonstration was coincidental with the end of the school year at several schools; thus increasing the number of demonstrators, who were no more than a few hundred. According to the official communique, the demonstration had been promoted since 24 October through Radio Moscow. Finally, the communique states that the Interior Ministry advises the parents to take care of their sons in order to prevent the youth from being used once again for violent or disorderly actions. The repetition of this kind of event could hamper the normal and sustained development of the process of rechanneling of political activities. The visitors intend to make all the arrangements regarding the presence of Uruguayan troops among the Sinai Peacekeeping Force. It was revealed that Uruguay will initially participate with a 100-man detachment that will help supervise the observance of the Camp David treaty, which established peace between Egypt and Israel. The Uruguayan troops will reportedly travel in March and later be replaced by combat troops. [Text] [PY021525 Buenos Aires TELAM in Spanish 1605 GMT 1 Dec 81]

MINISTER CESAR CALS DISCUSSES ENERGY PLANS, PROBLEMS

Brasilia CORREIO BRAZILIENSE in Portuguese 8 Nov 81 p 8

[Interview with Cesar Cals, minister of mines and energy, by the JORNAL DO COMERCIO; date and place not specified]

[Text] Although the government itself has admitted that the demand for electricity will not increase as rapidly over the next 20 years as it has over the past 10--at annual rates exceeding 10 percent--the timetable for the nuclear program will not be revised.

The above information, which at first glance indicates real foolishness on the government's part, was obtained by the JORNAL DO COMERCIO in an exclusive interview with Cesar Cals, minister of mines and energy. Closemouthed, the minister stood firm on the question of the timetable, reaffirming that the eight power plants will be in operation between 1995 and the year 2000. And he indicated the reason backing up the government's position: "If I say that this program is aimed at mastering the technology, then only technology can modify its pace."

Cals was vague, however, as to the reason for so much effort just to absorb the technology, since he denied any suggestion that the nuclear program has other purposes that are not purely peaceful. Speaking, as always, in the third person singular--"minister refers to the minister as an aloof person"--he emphasized that the government has no ulterior motives with nuclear technology, such as assuming a hegemonic position in Latin America. In the minister's opinion, nuclear and coal technology will be widely used in Brazil after the year 2000.

He admitted that by the end of the 20th century, Brazil may have more nuclear power plants under construction than the nine now scheduled (one bought from the United States and eight from the agreement with the FRG). At least two would be in Ceara, his home state, where by 1995 he intends to build a complex for exporting enriched uranium.

Saying that those outside the sphere of government are not competent to judge, Cals described as "pessimists" the scientists who are expressing doubt that the jet nozzle enrichment process will ever pan out on an industrial scale. According to him, the technicians at NUCLEBRAS [Brazilian Nuclear Corporations] and those from the National Energy Commission all "say that it will work, and there is no reason to doubt it."

The minister does not agree that Brazil is taking a chance by building the eight power plants before the process has been proven, since that would make the country dependent on imports of fuel for the power industry, which until now has been self-sufficient. But he does not rule out the possibility that Brazil will buy enriched uranium abroad if it becomes necessary.

Concerning the energy model prepared by his ministry, Cals underscored his conviction that by 1985 the country will be importing only 500,000 barrels of petroleum daily. Referring to the skeptics, he asks that they check out all the goals and timetables established in his ministry.

He agreed, however, that the goal of producing 120,000 equivalent barrels of petroleum in 1985 from charcoal will have to be revised, since the funds for that program have not yet been found. Cals says he sees no difficulties in heading a ministry made up of officials who are constant "minister material"--that is, the chairmen of the state-owned firms: Eliezer Batista, Shigeaki Ueki, Paulo Nogueira Batista, Costa Cavalcanti, and so on. Trained as an engineer himself, he recalls that there is a big advantage when a minister is a technician as well as a politician. Cals smilingly let slip his optimism concerning his candidacy for governor of Ceara: "Only if President Figueiredo leaves...."

Below is the exclusive interview granted by Minister Cesar Cals to the JORNAL DO COMERCIO.

[Question] Is Brazil experiencing an energy crisis or a crisis in its balance of payments?

[Answer] When we first set up President Joao Figueiredo's administration, we had a crisis that I would call a petroleum crisis, since we were producing 164,000 barrels daily and importing 960,000, and our consumption had been growing by an average of 7 percent annually for the preceding 10 years. Since production was falling and consumption was rising, there was a trend toward increasing our petroleum imports and thus leading the country into a crisis in the trade balance. President Joao Figueiredo then ordered his minister of mines and energy to draw up a new model aimed at reducing our dependence on foreign oil. To do that, we had to give thought to three things that had to be done: first, increase Brazilian production, which was declining, and that included increasing the reserves; second, take steps to reduce the growth of consumption, which was rising at a rate intolerable for the country; and third, induce the Brazilian people to prefer domestic fuels over imported petroleum. So it was a petroleum crisis that was leading to a crisis in the trade balance.

[Question] What is the specific role of the Ministry of Mines and Energy in preparing the energy policy, since the Planning Secretariat, the National Energy Commission, and other ministries are also involved?

[Answer] Our ministry is responsible for the production of fuels and their processing and distribution. Transportation is the responsibility of the Ministry of Transportation and Public Works, and consumption in the industrial area is primarily the responsibility of the Ministry of Industry and Commerce [MIC]. On the other hand, priority was being given to alcohol as a substitute for gasoline under the plan for substituting other fuels for petroleum, and since alcohol was already an MIC program, being a derivative of the sugar program, alcohol production was also made the responsibility of the MIC.

[Question] Isn't there some distortion with so many agencies being involved?

[Answer] No. At the moment I can make the following breakdown: the production of mineral fuels is assigned to our ministry; the production of fuels from plants is the responsibility of the Ministry of Agriculture, although production in the case of alcohol is assigned to the MIC, since it has traditionally been the responsibility of that ministry; and the processing and distribution of all fuels comes under the Ministry of Mines and Energy, as does electric power. The result is that many ministries are involved, and the National Energy Commission coordinates the work of all those ministries.

Overall policy is set by the government, and the commission coordinates activities concerned with liquid fuels and those aimed at reducing our dependence on foreign oil. The reason is that when the National Energy Commission was established, its specific job was to coordinate the replacement of petroleum products. For example, it has nothing to do with the nuclear program or the electric power program--Plan 2000 does not go to the commission. As for SEPLAN [Planning Secretariat], it is naturally responsible for national planning. Energy planning is a part of national planning, and since there was a need for harmonization among all those programs and the funds for the energy mobilization programs, a SEPLAN energy commission was set up.

[Question] In the mineral area, it seemed at the beginning that the MME [Ministry of Mines and Energy] would be responsible for setting up the Carajas Iron Program and the Greater Carajas Program as well. But today we see several ministries selling Carajas.

[Answer] The Carajas Iron Ore Project was a natural project for the MME, but the Greater Carajas Project is a mining-industrial and agricultural project. Thus we see that there are three ministries: the MME for mining, the MIC for the industrial portion, and the Ministry of Agriculture for the agricultural portion. The Greater Carajas Project was therefore never the sole responsibility of the MME. In that project, our ministry is concerned primarily with fuel and mineral inputs. All the industrial processing programs are analyzed by the MIC's departments, and the Ministry of Transportation and Public Works looks after the ports, railways, and so on. Coordination at the ministerial level, when several ministries are involved, has remained with the Planning Secretariat, but since Carajas also involves exports, the Ministry of Finance is concerned as well, as is the Central Bank itself.

[Question] One of the most frequent criticisms of the MME's energy model is that it is aimed solely at supply and has no major concern with altering the structure of demand in this country. Do you agree?

[Answer] In my opinion, that criticism comes from people who are not familiar with the model, because if we have succeeded in reducing demand--that is, the rising consumption of petroleum products, which used to be 7 percent annually--to 0 percent, that represents a very major and energetic influence on demand, and this year we are showing negative growth. I feel that our influence on demand has been much more rapid than it has on substitution or on the supply side.

[Question] But did that reduction in petroleum consumption come about through the MME's action or because of the recession?

[Answer] No. The reduction in consumption was brought about by the MME, because when we reached 0 percent last year, the Brazilian economy had grown by 8.5 percent, so it was not because of recession. It was because of all the activity aimed at reducing gasoline consumption, the activity in connection with diesel oil involving highway inspections--it was because of the supervision of industry, when we looked for waste and for ways of reducing it. A time limit was set for reducing that waste by improving energy efficiency in each firm, and a time limit was set for making substitutions when other fuels were available, and that included the multinationals.

[Question] How about the coal and charcoal programs? Are there misgivings about those programs?

[Answer] The energy model is flexible, and so it is updated from year to year. It is now in its second version, and later we will begin working on the third version. Since the model has such a diversity of sources, we knew from the start that not all of them would be able to perform equally--at the same speed. So there are some that are moving ahead faster and others that are slowing down, depending on circumstances. But look. The important thing as far as the general public is concerned is that the final goals should be achieved. That is the important thing, not the individual stones in the mosaic. The coal program got off to a slow start due to a lack of projects. In 1979, the reason was a lack of projects, not a lack of funds. The reason was that coal mining activity had been viewed much more from the standpoint of its social value as an employer of manpower, but then the approach changed--it came to be looked at from the economic standpoint--and we did not have any projects ready. So while coal slipped a little in the goals, hydroelectric power accelerated, as did energy conservation. So the goals are still valid--that is, by 1985 we will be importing 500,000 barrels of petroleum daily. That is the thing that is important--the model has a final goal, which is that of reducing petroleum imports. The rest is a compromise between sources.

[Question] And how is the charcoal program progressing at the moment?

[Answer] I feel that your question is justified. I must admit that the charcoal program is one that has been tied very closely to the reforestation project, and since the tax incentives for that purpose are only now being shifted to energy forests (since President Figueiredo decided that 30 percent of the incentives in the Northeast would go to that type of forest in 1980, followed by 40 percent in 1981 and 50 percent from 1982 on), it is only now that we are shifting funds, because the incentives before this were concentrated heavily on steelmaking, charcoal for pig iron and industrial wood, cellulose, and so on. Those commitments had already been made. Charcoal has really lagged behind, and we believe that those incentives are not sufficient for the program we want to carry out. Another source of funds is needed, and the Ministry of Agriculture is already looking into a number of alternatives.

[Question] Will the goal of producing 120 equivalent barrels of petroleum in 1985 be revised?

[Answer] Like all the others, that goal is revised annually. I feel that it will be changed, considering that we have not yet found the funds we need.

[Question] The price of international petroleum is to be frozen at $34 until the end of 1982. How will that benefit Brazil?

[Answer] At their last meeting in Geneva, Saudi Arabia and a few OPEC countries reached the conclusion that they must unify the petroleum price and freeze it until 1982. It is obvious that the market also played a part in that decision. The fact is that we are currently in a buyer's market. There is an oversupply of oil in the world because, as a result of the Iran-Iraq war and since the 1979 crisis, all the countries that buy petroleum have stepped up their programs for prospecting, energy conservation, and substitution. The result is an oversupply, and the consequence of that is a natural stabilization of prices. The important thing in their decision is the unified price, but the price freeze was brought about by the market. Our intention is that by the end of 1982, we will be importing 600,000 barrels of petroleum daily.

[Question] Will the current imports of 750,000 barrels daily be reduced this year?

[Answer] We are thinking of reducing them to 700,000. Considering that the cost of importing 750,000 barrels comes to $10 billion, the reduction to 600,000 will mean a savings of about $1 billion in foreign exchange next year. We must reach the end of 1982 with a maximum petroleum account of $9 billion and daily consumption of around 900,000 barrels. So in 1982 we will already be within 20 percent of our goal for 1985. We have already achieved 80 percent.

[Question] The ministry intends to increase the nation's current production of 240,000 barrels daily to 280,000. Is that possible?

[Answer] Yes. We have the Campos basin in Espirito Santo, and we have Rio Grande do Norte and Ceara. Let us not be pessimistic. Check with me in January.

[Question] But according to PETROBRAS [Brazilian Petroleum Corporation], domestic production will not reach 280,000 barrels this year.

[Answer] Check with me in January. On other occasions, other people have doubted my goals: they doubted that imports would drop to 750,000 barrels per day, they doubted that domestic production would reach 240,000 barrels, and so on. I am convinced that we will close the year at 280,000 barrels--as a peak, not the average.

[Question] Isn't it very difficult to get along in the same ministry with such self-sufficient officials as, for example, Paulo Nogueira Batista, chairman of NUCLEBRAS, Eliezer Batista, chairman of the Rio Doce Valley Company, or Shigeaki Ueki, chairman of PETROBRAS, who frequently doubt the ministry's goals?

[Answer] I feel that they all have a lot of good will. They are all very competent in their specific sectors. But the ministry takes the overall view--it looks at the political aspect--and so I feel that there is some advantage to having a minister who is both a technician and a politician.

[Question] How are things progressing with the negotiations to form a trinational petroleum enterprise consisting of Brazil, Mexico, and Venezuela?

[Answer] The advantages are very great. It was a great decision by Presidents Figueiredo, Herrera Campins, and Lopez-Portillo. The advantages are economic, to begin with. We believe that Third World countries naturally prefer to deal with state-owned enterprises, and when three state-owned enterprises with technology in the areas of petroleum prospecting, production, and industrial exploitation join together to provide services, they will certainly find a natural preference on the part of Latin American countries and, in the future, the Third World. There is a whole market for services that will be generated for our technicians and an equipment market as well--in short, it will be quite an important market. On the other hand, our idea is that that enterprise, or transnational partnership, should keep its distance from the multinational firms, because it also wants to train personnel from the countries in which it will operate. That is a political stand of the greatest importance, because we are contributing to the development of the Third World through technology transfer. So this is a very important political advantage, and of course, it also includes the economic and political aspect of looking for petroleum reserves here in the region in an effort to make the region less dependent on petroleum from outside Latin America.

[Question] Would that enterprise be able to operate in Brazil?

[Answer] It is aimed chiefly at third countries. Brazil is ruled out, since this involves the exporting of services, and here we have PETROBRAS. Another important feature of this undertaking is that Brazil is going into partnership--with closer ties--with Latin America's two chief petroleum producers. It seems to be a partnership that in the medium term will insure a little more stability in the supplies provided to our country by those two countries.

[Question] Does Brazil have a petroleum surplus?

[Answer] No. It is maintaining only its normal stocks.

[Question] For how many months?

[Answer] For the normal number. The figure is no secret, but I am asking you to respect my decision not to mention it. I did not want to state the figure for the following reason. There are many ways of reporting the inventory. One concerns the stocks on shore, another covers those in transit, and another includes those being unloaded. So the figures are never very precise, and the result is that there may seem to be contradictions or bad faith. It makes no sense to spread panic in Brazil.

We have adequate stocks. And the important thing is that we are secure from that standpoint.

[Question] Has the MME already received Plan 2000 being drawn up by ELETROBRAS [Brazilian Electric Power Companies, Inc]?

[Answer] We had a meeting with ELETROBRAS after I returned from abroad. The main decisions have already been made. But ELETROBRAS has asked for a little time in which to reanalyze the market--not the supply, but the market. The reason is that since the market had declined very sharply in the Southeast Region, it was necessary to see how much surplus power existed. So they asked me to give them time to reanalyze the market.

[Question] Does the government admit that the reasons for signing the nuclear agreement with Germany in 1975 are no longer the same as the reasons and justifications existing today? It was said back then that our hydroelectric potential would be exhausted in the 1990's.

[Answer] I believe the reasons are the same--national sovereignty in the area of energy and the mastery of technology, which is the main reason. It is obvious that the theory of an exhaustion of hydroelectric potential can be stated in many ways. One of them concerns a market hypothesis that proved false, while another involves a comparison of economic costs. Lastly, there are various approaches that place the Brazilian nuclear program within the hydroelectric program. But the main reason is that we want to master the technology.

[Question] Isn't there any military strategic reason?

[Answer] None. Only for peaceful purposes.

[Question] In addition to mastery of the technology, wouldn't another purpose be to try to achieve sovereignty over that technology in terms of Latin America, since Argentina is ahead of us in that area?

[Answer] No. The agreement is resolutely for peaceful purposes.

[Question] Most of the developed countries adopt nuclear technology for electricity generation only after other cheaper sources have been exhausted. Why is Brazil doing the opposite?

[Answer] It is not doing the opposite. Hydroelectricity is the priority. The only thing is that we know that in the year 2000, the bulk of the plants will be nuclear or coal-fired. So we are preparing to produce equipment in Brazil--to produce the nuclear fuel cycle in Brazil--because we feel that whoever possesses energy today has great strength in the world. You can have money and still not buy energy because of problems with an embargo on petroleum or difficulties in obtaining enriched uranium. So we will have to master the technology for our fuels. We have had 25 years of hydroelectricity, so if I am convinced and the government is convinced that in the year 2000 the bulk will be nuclear and coal-fired, we have these 20 years in which to master the technology. In other words, to design, build, and operate plants, produce equipment, and produce the fuel cycle.

[Question] What is the schedule for completion of the eight nuclear power plants provided for in the agreement with Germany?

[Answer] We hope that they will all be operating between 1995 and the year 2000.

[Question] With the acceptance of Plan 2000 and the analysis of future consumption prospects, would it not be advisable to slow down work to place those eight plants in operation? You yourself said earlier that any program must be reevaluated periodically.

[Answer] But a reevaluation of this program has nothing to do with the demand for electricity. If it were reevaluated, it would be because of failure to absorb the technology. Look at it this way. If I say that this program is aimed at mastery of the technology, then technology is the only thing that can modify the pace. If it were aimed basically at supplying the market for electricity, then there would indeed be reason to reevaluate it now. We want to go through with it because we need the technology.

[Question] But some scientists say that two or perhaps three plants would be enough for absorbing the technology.

[Answer] No factory or equipment manufacturer--and I am issuing a challenge--and no businessman will make an investment in his plant to produce equipment in Brazil for three plants. I doubt it. If you find one, bring him here to my desk.

[Question] So what is the necessary number?

[Answer] It is a modular program, and we consider that the eight plants are necessary to continue getting the factories ready so that we can then sharply increase the number of nuclear power plants beginning in the year 2000.

[Question] A study made by an engineer estimates that if Brazil's GDP increased by 5 percent annually over the next 20 years, we would need an installed capacity on the order of 100,000 megawatts in the year 2000 and that, as a consequence, the hydroelectric potential will be sufficient at least until the year 2025.

[Answer] What country has ever exploited more than 70 percent of its hydroelectric potential? Ask that of an economist. Unless I am poorly informed, no country has ever managed to exploit more than 70 percent of its potential.

AGRICULTURE MINISTER EXPRESSES INTEREST IN INDUSTRIAL GROWTH

Buenos Aires LA NACION in Spanish 20 Nov 81 p 3

[Text] Rome, 19 Nov (AFP)--"I think that the results of this FAO conference are going to be very constructive," the Argentine agriculture minister stated, "because this organization's responsibility is reaching its high point." Jorge Aguado justified his assertion by adding that "the world has now become aware that food is one of mankind's basic priorities."

"The FAO's working committees are at work right now, and I think that as of Monday, when the members of the council are elected and after the reports from the committees, the conference will obviously enter its final stage and issue the appropriate documents," he said.

Referring to the problem of secure world food supplies, he contended that they "are going to be achieved if production rises."

"The world," he went on to say, "still has a great deal of capacity to boost production. I would say that mankind's main asset is the resource called Earth and that despite his technology, man has not yet demonstrated the ability to tap its full potential for production."

"Therefore," he asserted, "I basically think that as many resources as possible should be earmarked to boost production and so that most countries can be largely self-sufficient in foodstuffs."

"We feel," he added, "that to the extent that they have the financial and storage capacity, the producing countries could establish some grains reserves, which in any case are a safeguard in stabilizing the prices of farm output."

"We feel that to the extent that this is possible, countries can have reserves within their own borders. Argentina sells practically all of its output every year; Argentina exports everything that it produces, without limitations of any kind, and it has also shown that in practice it is the only country in the world that has not utilized food as an ideological weapon."

Argentina, Aguado said, "does not want to be a food exporting country. Our aim is to be a country with integrated agricultural development and with our own industrial development. And we want to do so under competitive conditions, without protectionism."

CENTRAL BANK PRESIDENT COMMENTS ON REFINANCE BOND MEASURE

Buenos Aires CLARIN in Spanish 11 Nov 81 p 12

[Interview with Egidio Iannella, president of the Central Bank, on 10 November 1981; place not given]

[Text] "The refinancing bond is the most controversial, the most difficult and the most important law in recent times," Central Bank President Egidio Iannella told CLARIN yesterday. At age 60, Iannella has been involved in banking for 42 years. He has been with the Central Bank since 1939, when he began working there as a stenographer-typist.

The following is his interview with CLARIN:

[Question] Some people are saying that last Monday's move will bring inflation; others say that it was too late in coming, and there are still others who argue that without follow-up measures it will be of little consequence. What do you think?

[Answer] That all three are right. First of all, we will be injecting 220 billion pesos a month into the system; this is what the Central Bank will pay the institutions to refund business debts, and the sole recompense will be the general welfare. These funds will not come from an increase in taxes; they will enlarge the deficit and fuel inflation. The problem involves the degree of inflation, and we have to ask ourselves what the cost would be if the country ignored its indebtedness problems. With regard to its lateness, that's right. It is, however, a far-reaching move that will require responsibility and consultation with all sectors involved. It is also true that it is not enough by itself. This move alone will not get the economy moving again or resurrect a business that is in bad shape. It is a government measure and as such it requires other government measures to produce widespread effects.

Interest Rates

[Question] Is the bond restrictive?

[Answer] I think it was not a happy turn of phrase to say that the bond is tax-restrictive. Its conditions are realistic: Most businesses must meet their tax and social security obligations just as private individuals do. It is even less restrictive because it empowers the Central Bank to consider special cases in the planned Arbitration Commission or through other special procedures that we will be implementing, easy terms of payments, for example.

[Question] But if interest rates do not drop, what effect will the bond have?

[Answer] Interest rates will drop. This is a Central Bank goal; otherwise, there will be no economic upturn. In an open market the rate is regulated with Treasury Bills. That is what we are doing, but we do not want thundering falls because the existing system lends itself to a dangerous rebound in interest rates, as has happened in the past. And if the debt refunding is handled well, the debtors will have greater maneuvering room to reach agreement on the interest rate for their loans. So then, money managers and lending officers will have to again show their skills at the bargaining table. People say that the banks are going to mark up their new loans to compensate for the interest rate of the refinancing. I don't think so. In an decontrolled system a firm can then choose to do business with another bank.

[Question] Why didn't the refinancing include mortgage loans or personal loans?

[Answer] Because these are different situations that require their own particular measures. This is a serious social problem, and we are looking into it.

Indexing

[Question] Are you saying that due thought will be given to financial indexing? What will happen with Circular 1050?

[Answer] Indexing is employed to pay back to a bank what it pays out to savers. The root of the problem is to choose between a floating rate or a fixed rate. I, like others, am in favor of the latter. But this means that first of all we have to alter the inflation context. Another problem arises when a jump in relative prices adversely affects wages or a given activity. This happens with any index that reflects a tattered economy. The Mortgage Bank has begun to come up with answers for the problems of individual borrowers. The Central Bank is also getting ready to. This issue has been knocked around a great deal. I prefer to see what happens first.

[Question] There are those who assert that Circular A-65 will heighten the problem of the high cost of borrowing and the rise of 1050...

[Answer] The institutions with problems have at the Central Bank the rediscounts they need so that they do not have to borrow at high rates. But credit between financial institutions is not supposed to be a loan portfolio. A person who places his funds in call money does not want to be a banker.

Some 8 percent of total funds are handled as call money, but in some institutions up to 40 percent of lendable funds are call money, and at some point you have to tell them to straighten things out. We have been tossing this about for 5 months.

Mergers

[Question] What will you do to cut the cost of bank middleman operations, which make borrowing more expensive?

[Answer] The banks have already begun to gage their costs. Their loan markups are smaller than a few months ago, and if they are larger in some cases, it is because the institution or borrower risk has increased. The bond will also have an effect in this regard, and the reform of the Financial Institutions Act will revamp the market. We want a more open market without 30-day operations. We are also taking a look at how to prevent public enterprises from continually taking part in competitive bidding for funds, which makes borrowing more expensive for the private sector. We are trying to get bank groups to finance a business's overall needs in one stroke, as is done elsewhere. We cannot have financial institutions in Argentina that have 70 percent of their loans concentrated in the State while there is no money for private business.

[Question] Are you in favor of abolishing the contribution to bank social services to cut credit costs?

[Answer] Not at all. I have lived off my salary all my life and I know that the contribution is of little consequence to the banker employer but of major consequence to the employee because it is his health that is involved. Lower credit costs will not come from this. They will come from a more efficient financial system.

TURNOVER TO PRIVATE SECTOR OPPOSED

Buenos Aires CLARIN in Spanish 11 Nov 81 p 16

[Text] "We should resort to private capital as an investment and efficiency aid," said Communications Undersecretary Gen Eduardo Corrado in rejecting the bid to privatize the National Telecommunications Enterprise (ENTEL).

The undersecretary urged that we "not waste more time trying to turn public enterprises over to private hands," indicating that "a whole sphere of economic and industrial activity in our country has taken shape around ENTEL."

"It is the only industrial activity that is doing its work, because the sector plan has not come to a halt," Corrado explained in his comments to a monthly journal. He also disclosed that the firms Ericsson, Standard Electric, Siemens and Pecom Nec "are prepared to collaborate in a peripheral, gradual privatization program but would never be willing to assume operational responsibility."

With regard to the possibility of privatizing the telecommunications company, he remarked that this "would not solve the problem of telephone installation in Argentina," adding that political, union and economic problems have adversely affected the public sector and led to a "poor telephone system."

After indicating that the State "likes" to have public enterprises because "these enterprises have at times gotten every government out of a hole," he pointed out that "in spite of the politically set rates throughout its history, the telephone company has been a good business." He commented in this regard that "it is suited to private enterprise, but the problem is to come up with enough capital to take over, not pay off, take over what currently exists without payment obligations."

"The problem," he said, "is to take over the enterprise, because from here on it will have to invest some $1 billion a year, and the enterprise itself will have to generate that $1 billion. So then, whoever takes it over knows that the investments will hinge on the funds that the enterprise actually has, and those funds are going to depend exclusively on its rates," he stated.

In Corrado's view, American Telephone and Telegraph is the company that "is in the best position to take over the telephone system in Argentina."

"Let's not waste any more time trying to turn public enterprises over to private hands," he suggested. We made the mistake back in 1974," he noted. One of the basic reasons why the country is in the shape it is has to do with the disproportionate responsibilities that the State has assumed, Corrado cautioned.

ROLE OF EXPORTER MUST BE EXPANDED, SAYS TRADE MINISTER

Buenos Aires CONVICCION in Spanish 15 Nov 81 p 14

[Text] Trade and Maritime Interests Minister Carlos Garcia Martinez stated here that "Argentina must become a major export power."

He made this remark to some 200 businessmen at the closing session of the foreign trade seminar organized by the Commodity Exchange of Mar del Plata and sponsored by the Trade and Maritime Interests Ministry.

Addressing the session before him were the undersecretary of state for foreign trade and regional integration, a branch of the Trade and Maritime Interests Ministry, Jorge Caminotti; the director of the Argentine Chamber of Commerce, Herberto Karpgus, and the head of the Mar del Plata Commodity Exchange, Norberto Pezatti.

Garcia Martinez first off listed the great values "that Argentina must firmly cling to if it wants to safeguard its greatness, sovereignty, prosperity, freedom and justice in a turbulent and dangerous world."

He pointed out the three major objectives of Argentina's transformation into an export power. He asserted that "all of them are directly or indirectly linked to the great values I have mentioned." These objectives are: large-scale industrialization, national integration and the development of talent in Argentina.

He went on to say that "these three goals are firmly linked to Argentina's future and are themselves closely interrelated. The most sweeping and revolutionary way to promote these three goals is to transform Argentina into a major export power."

Garcia Martinez then examined these relationships, asserting that the only way to close the enormous gap between the population and the size of the market that a technological revolution requires is to have access to world markets, which is impossible unless the country gradually adapts its domestic organizational structures to the great goal of being a worldwide force. "Exports generate markets; this stimulates industrialization, which in turn promotes population growth. Thus, we have this cumulative cyclical process that is always behind the major creative transformations of history."

He then urged "closing the immense gap between the development of national talents and existing job opportunities. This an urgent need for our nation, and large-scale exports can play a preponderant role in this, not only because of the direct impact of more jobs from increased exports, but also in terms of the indirect effects, since this extraordinary transformation of our domestic production system will generate an enormous number of jobs, which contributes to efficiency and high profits."

He also asserted that "we cannot become a major exporting country by purely artificial means. The country's production structures must undergo an in-depth transformation so that our entire domestic system is gradually brought into line with making exports an especially significant element in national development."

Towards the end of his address, Minister Garcia Martinez outlined the basic points that "must be accomplished to achieve the great national goal of transforming Argentina into a major export power."

These basic points are:

Economic discipline, which always, but especially under the present circumstances, means controlling the demon of heightened inflationary expectations;

Clear-cut, stable and, therefore, reliable ground rules;

Reestablishing the preeminence of profit as the reward of risk capital;

Transforming the State into the creator and promoter of and guide for major strategies of action, as well as the emergence of businessmen who are aware of the major goals of the policies that are decided on and who are prepared to achieve these goals in a competitive framework while pursuing their own interests;

A wideranging process of transforming, overhauling and modernizing industrial, marketing and service structures.

Statements

Dr Carlos Garcia Martinez stated that "an economic program is much broader than an export promotion plan."

This was his reply to the newsmen who approached him at the close of the foreign trade seminar in Mar del Plata.

He explained with regard to the same topic that "in compliance with my obligations as minister of trade and maritime interests and in compliance with instructions from the Military Junta and the nation's president, I have drafted an export promotion plan, which is not an economic program."

He rejected the word "speculation" when asked about the exchange rate. He contended that "if you have a floating market, a financial market can simply have fluctuations that are out of step with the commercial market, but on the commercial market, which is what I am talking about, the exchange rate is realistic and is constantly being adjusted to prevent overvaluations."

PRESS ITEMS REFLECT REACTION TO EEC POLICIES

EEC Protectionism Scored

Buenos Aires LA NACION in Spanish 12 Nov 81 p 2

[Text] Rome, 11 Nov (ANSA)--The Argentine Government is very concerned about the EEC's agricultural policy, because it feels that the EEC's dumping tactics are "irrational" and seriously "detrimental," Argentine Undersecretary of Agriculture Victor Hugo Santirso told the 21st General Conference of the FAO.

"We are extremely concerned," he asserted, "about the restrictions and obstacles that seem to be spreading in agricultural trade among nations, mainly the agricultural policies that the European Common Market is pursuing through subsidies that lead to large-scale unprofitable production, from the standpoint of costs, and that represent a waste of energy that cannot be recovered. We think that they are irrational, and they cause us very serious harm. The fact is that the dumping of product surpluses by the European Common Market is seriously distorting import markets and crowding out economically viable producers such as Argentina."

"These practices," he asserted, "constitute one of the most negative manifestations of the economic policy of the developed countries, which by means of protectionist barriers and subsidies, keep domestic prices high, on the one hand, while exporting at depressed prices, on the other, which adversely affects the exports of developing countries and alters their terms of trade. Argentina rejects these discriminatory practices because we feel that they are at odds with a more just economic order."

Gains

After announcing that his government supports the FAO's work schedule and the proposed budget for 1982/83, Santirso spoke of the gains that Argentina has made in agriculture.

"My country has achieved successive record harvests over the past 6 years," he asserted. "These successes are linked to a series of policies, some of which have required a lengthy lead time while others had more immediate effects, to bolster the expectations of growers and induce them to work harder and with more advanced techniques.

"During the 1980-81 farm year, Argentina's grain harvests hit the overall figure of 3 million tons, compared to less than 31 million in the preceding year," he explained.

"Gaged differently," he added, "we have produced 1.3 metric tons per inhabitant. As we can see, this is a considerable amount, and it has enabled us to generously meet domestic consumption needs and has yielded even greater surpluses than the year before for export. Also, our country has been able to donate food to needy peoples."

Technologies and Percentages

"These ongoing and systematic gains in recent times have been due mainly to a striking increase in the advanced technologies incorporated into farm production. Thanks to them, the total volume of domestic crop and livestock output, which had been increasing at just 1.4 percent a year over the past 50 years, began growing at 3 percent a year over the past 5 years. Argentina has thus resumed the farm production growth pace that made it famous before the world trade crisis in the 1930's.

"I would cite as the groundwork for this sharp rise in surface area productivity the policies of support for agricultural research and extension work, which received a major push in Argentina as of 1958, with the creation of the INTA [National Institute of Agricultural and Livestock Technology] and the allocation of major complementary funds to universities and other study centers to conduct scientific and technological research for the same purposes.

"These gains," he asserted, "are among the most rapid in the world in recent years. In the 10 years between 1968/69 and 1977/78, the rise in the per hectare production of wheat in Argentina was 47.5 percent.

"In the case of corn," he added, "productivity rose 133 percent in Argentina. The jump was even more spectacular for sorghum, 132 percent, as against some 4 percent [sic]. The increase for soybeans was also significant, 111 percent."

Pricing Policy

"We think that the major changes introduced in 1976 in the farm sector's pricing and incomes policies were of decisive importance in bringing about this period of real innovations in farm production," he asserted. After almost five decades of keeping the relative prices of farm products low for political reasons, the government evinced a determined intention to improve these ratios. Within the framework of the country's general economic policies, we have persisted in this course, with some ups and downs. When the new government took over in March 1981, some new strides were made in exchange rate policy, which benefited the rural sector by providing incentives for more extensive plantings and additional technological investments.

"I am pleased to point out," he emphasized, "that 95 percent of Argentina's producers own the lands they farm. We are concerned, however, that in a country like Argentina, which has a generous endowment of farmlands and grasslands, the average size of farms is rapidly shrinking and that a good many of them are now too small."

CARBAP Calls for Protests

Buenos Aires LA NACION in Spanish 19 Nov 81 p 20

[Text] CARBAP [Confederation of Buenos Aires and the Pampa Rural Associations] "feels that the appropriate Argentine authorities have a duty to lodge protests without delay with the authorities of the EEC and of the governments that belong to it, under existing international instruments, over the damage caused our country by the EEC's policies." According to CARBAP, these policies have resulted in a striking decline in our regular sales of meat to third countries that used to be traditional purchasers.

To this end, CARBAP sent a note to Mr Jorge Aguado, minister of agriculture and livestock, in which it outlines the grounds for the confederation's request for urgent action in this regard.

CARBAP reaffirms the need to guarantee overseas markets for Argentine meat, "inasmuch as the fact that cattle stocks have declined does not alter the fundamental premise of serving the national interest." On the contrary, it stresses that the country should again pursue a policy to reverse the effects of the decline in the cattle stock.

Urgent Steps

It then lists the steps that the appropriate authorities must urgently take. They include citing the dates and amounts of EEC meat shipments to Israel, Egypt, Greece and other countries at subsidized prices, and the publicizing worldwide of the protests that Argentina's representatives have filed because of them, in order "to strengthen Argentina's subsequent position."

As a precedent, it notes the publicity accorded the protests by Australia, New Zealand, Canada and the United States against EEC policy, adding that "unfortunately, we are not familiar with news reports on Argentina's protests, and this lack of worldwide public impact weakens our position."

It then makes the point that the EEC's subsidized sales "violate Article XVI of GATT, because we do not know whether the community's export subsidies were announced in advance or whether, as the article stipulates, consultations were held with the aggrieved party, Argentina."

It points out that these sales "should be considered in light of the 'Agreement on the Interpretation and Application of Articles 6, 16 and 26 of GATT,' which is known as the 'Subsidies and Countervailing Duties Code' (an outcome of the Tokyo Round). Our country must not fail to bring this code, which took effect on 1 January 1980, into play because "it enables an exporting country that feels its protests in bilateral talks with the subsidizing country have come to naught, to demand that the contracting parties order countervailing duties for the subsidy to its detriment."

It recalls that the same code stipulated that subsidies would not be given to commodities and that to establish "the amounts for purposes of comparison" for the aforementioned agreements, a representative prior 3-year period of normal operations on the market on which the subsidized item has been sold would be taken."

Precedents

As precedents backing up the measures that CARBAP feels Argentine authorities should take, it notes that the United States has outlined the problems stemming from the subsidies applied by Australia and New Zealand and is planning to take action vis-a-vis the EEC.

It states later on that we should not have disregarded Australia's proposal for a joint protest of EEC policy and that if the proposal was not disregarded, it should have been given broader publicity so that it could serve as a precedent for our position. It feels that the change of government in France could be beneficial "in view of the projected decrease in the domestic subsidies that the French Government gives farm products." It points out that "Argentina could find that other members countries of the community" support its protests because they aim at diminishing protectionism, which would lighten their contributions to the enormous subsidies budget.

DAILY CALLS FOR POLITICAL OPENING TO ACHIEVE STABILITY

Santa Cruz LEL MUNDO in Spanish 17 Oct 81 p 5

[Editorial: "Political Stability or Permanent Disorder?"]

[Text] The fact that Bolivia needs political stability to face its most vital problems is something no one disputes. The fact that in spite of it rumors about supposed preparations for a coup d'etat are not ceasing is also certain.

The rumors are coming forth in the face of government inertia. They fill the vacuum which official lack of decision leaves before the most urgent problems of this moment, which are expanding with astonishing speed.

In spite of this, it would be frivolous to suppose that nothing has changed, since only a few months ago Bolivia was living under a personal leadership without a new style and although it lacks a concrete program it is more receptive to what is claimed by national opinion and above all, to our own historical experiences.

The road to be traveled is full of obstacles. To begin with there is an economic recession of very serious proportions, such as to make people suppose that the solutions can be given by new coups d'etat which like many other sin the past would not go beyond a changing of the guard lacking valid answers for our most pressing economic, political and social problems.

On the edge of the inquiries which could be made about political stability and coups d'etat, if anything is obvious it is the citizens' desire for a period of normality, without meaning limitations to civil liberties, or excesses by the opposition. The most appropriate step would be a political opening su,ficiently broad to allow the most pressing national problems to be analyzed in a climate of liberty, mutual respect and toleration.

The constitutional organization of the public powers should precisely achieve a national agreement which would put out of the game the factors which disturb and obstruct the democratic life of the nation at every step.

PAPER FOCUSES ON PERUVIAN EFFORTS TO SAFEGUARD DEMOCRACY

La Paz EL DIARIO in Spanish 21 Oct 81 p 2

[Editorial: "The Peruvian Crisis"]

[Text] With every day that passes the political and social situation of Peru becomes more complicated. In the last few hours, the government of that country has been obliged to dictate extreme security measures because of the outbreaks of violence in some departments.

In this case we must not restrict ourselves to observing superficial events in that country, where, paradoxically, there exists a regime elected by a popular vote and whose actions, at least until now, have been based on enforcing the law. What must be analyzed here as in other regions is the very foundation where the action of extremist subversion working where liberty is and has an open field for its activities.

This is not the place to repeat sentences and concepts, but doing so turns out to be unavoidable since it seems that many people do not understand a painful reality of our time: The struggle for ideological hegemony is going on everywhere, but principally where democracy is gaining ground. That has always been and will continue to be the pattern of subversion, since it is not profitable to it for the democratic system to be consolidated anywhere. That happened, for example, in Chile, Uruguay and Argentina. In the Chilean case, the situation is much more paradoxical because there, through the democratic system, a man clearly identified with Marxism achieved power; but the forces of intolerant subversion began an intense task of undermining the regime which brought about his fall. The fact is that extremists do not profit from the consolidation of a democratic system because its leaders are partisans of tyranny who require another regime of violence to achieve power. Argentina is another typical case. Following elections and after periods of great violence, democracy was finding its channel with the achievement of power by a political force of popular origin. The forces of subversion which had perceived that fact first infiltrated that party, tried to take over its mandate, succeeded in indoctrinating the important youth movement, and kept the democratic government in a permanent dither. New agitation, the use of violence determined the fall of the system which was replaced by another one, basically useful to the subversives. Uruguay and other countries are also examples to demonstrate how extremism checkmates democratic systems up to the point of turning them over to dictatorships because their preaching is possible only in those conditions.

In the Peruvian case that is what is going on. In other words, what happened in Chile, Argentina and Uruguay is repeating itself. The Peruvian Government, which is the product of a democratic act and which has since turned into a government of force, is the propitiatory victim of extremism which is now making demands not uttered before. It attacks the democratic government because that system does not use violence, which is precisely what subversion seeks. With what has happened in other countries, Peru has to act in another way, adjusting itself to the tactics of subversion, turning its face toward a struggle which has no ethical borders.

While this is happening in Peru, the remaining peoples of Latin America should become aware of the clumsy way in which it affects democracy.

It is time to carefully observe the work of extremism and to understand that in Peru one of the great battles for the survival of democracy is being waged. The fall of the present Peruvian system, for example, will fundamentally mean a great defeat for democracy. It is urgent then to exhibit solidarity with the Peruvian Government in this unequal struggle with a subversion which does not give quarter anywhere.

GOVERNMENT IN EXILE AWAITING DEMOCRATIZATION, SAYS WRITER

Cochabamba LOS TIEMPOS in Spanish 5 Nov 81 p 4

[Article by Albo Romero: "Government in Exile?"]

[Text] An AP cable sent from Paris and dated 2 November reveals the existence of a "government of national unity of Bolivia in exile," of which Jaime Paz Zamora is reportedly vice president and Dr Siles Zuazo possibly president. This revelation helps one to understand why the European countries were so reluctant to recognize the military government emerging from the 17 July 1980 coup. An entire political organization is playing its cards abroad, obviously enjoying the official sympathy of the governments belonging to the European Common Market.

The People's Democratic Union (UDP) was actually openly supported by the Socialist International, headed by German postwar leader Willy Brandt, formerly mayor of Berlin and later prime minister of West Germany. The Christian Democrats also had their preference for that party. The Socialist International is not a communist movement strictly speaking, but it nevertheless gets along better with the totalitarian regimes dominated by Moscow than with Western governments. In the postwar period, Willy Brandt guided Germany's fate, sometimes walking a tightrope held by Russia and the United States between the East and the West.

Since the Socialist International is an international movement, as its name indicates, the ties and connections of the alleged "Bolivian Government in exile," whose headquarters are probably in Paris, have been many in number to channel the resistance to the government of former President Garcia Meza.

Shifting from the phase of verbal aggressiveness that characterized the group of Bolivian exiles, who used Dutch and German radios to launch tremendous diatribes against the Bolivian regime, Paz Zamora now suggests in conciliatory terms the need "to achieve a great national accord of democratic convergence in order to save the country."

One notes the obvious intention to take advantage of the apparent liberalization of the current government of President Torrelio, who has allowed the country to normalize its constitutional life within a peremptory period of 3 years. It would appear that there is an attempt to turn the current government into a bridge to a democratic regime. The worst thing is that, trying to avoid a leftist presence in government, the result was to ensure that active presence in the coming elections. In fact, the Bolivian left, which in past elections had scarcely a little over a third of the votes out of the total cast, could command an overwhelming absolute majority in the next elections.

The date of 17 July 1980 did little to strengthen the Bolivian left politically. The same thing that happens in Bolivia will surely happen in Chile and Argentina, where the persecuted sectors continue to grow to the maximum extent. After Pinochet and Viola, the alliance of the followers of Frei and Allende and the Rio Plata guerrilla fighters will return with their hands up, shouting their resurgence.

POSITIVE RESULTS FROM NORMALIZATION OF RELATIONS WITH U.S. REVIEWED

Cochabamba LOS TIEMPOS in Spanish 5 Nov 81 pp 4, 13

[Article by Samuel Mendoza: "The Normalization"]

[Text] At last, after a freeze of over 15 months, it would appear that we are approaching a normalization of relations between Bolivia and the United States. At least the diplomatic moves of recent days indicate that within a few more days, or perhaps a few more hours, those relations will be normalized with the naming of an American ambassador to Bolivia and a Bolivian ambassador to the United States. Although certain indispensable steps have to be taken to achieve that objective, the announcements made on the subject in both La Paz and Washington are highly satisfactory and arouse hopes that in the future, those relations will become even closer, in hopes of an understanding between the two nations, the two governments, the two peoples that have traditionally been friends.

Confirming press reports of recent weeks, the cable from the American capital reports that the person chosen by President Reagan to represent the State Department and the United States as ambassador to the Bolivian Government is Edwin Corr, who until only recently headed the American diplomatic mission to the Republic of Peru. It is said that Corr is an expert in the fight against narcotics trafficking, which may mean that the United States is renewing its cooperation in the fight against that evil in Bolivia.

The fact that the designated American ambassador is an expert in fighting drug trafficking is highly significant and logically positive for the Bolivian Government and people. Perhaps with his knowledge, he can help to better plan a fight that authorities here have been waging to the best of their ability, but without the necessary means and instruments. Naturally, the appointment will not be welcomed equally by certain groups that view it as a serious danger to their illegal activities. The drug traffickers will have to find themselves a safe place or suspend their ill-fated action that has done so much damage to the country's dignity. We believe that the appointment of Corr will mean direct and effective support from the United States in the head-on, final struggle against drug trafficking.

While the normalization of relations between the two countries seems to be an indisputable fact that has made it possible to relieve the tension under which the Bolivian people have lived for over a year, some steps remain to be taken, as we mentioned. One of them has to do with the decision of the Foreign Relations Committee of the U.S. Senate, which is probably already considering President Reagan's proposal. We know that it is a difficult and complicated step, but we hope that the Senate of that country will agree that one cannot isolate a poor nation such as ours any longer, subjecting it to imminent dangers that could destabilize the general situation on the continent. As never before, Bolivia has endured a cruel and brutal blockade since the 17 July 1980 uprising, which has caused the most destructive crisis in history. The isolation to which Bolivia has been subjected has not been a kind of punishment -- as may have been thought at one time -- for those in power, but rather, a flagrant attack on the Bolivian people who suffered the consequences and who continue to suffer them.

As we stated on previous occasions, we must realize that the normalization of relations with the United States will not be a magic wand that will automatically solve the crisis and bring the country out of the economic chaos in which it is plunged. But it will make it possible to reopen financing and credit channels that have been hermetically sealed for over a year, even though Bolivia will have to make enormous efforts at home and abroad.

All in all, the normalization could enable us to get the country on the right path and thereby bring it out of the dramatic situation in which it finds itself.

REFORMS TO DOMESTIC POLICY SEEK TO REMEDY NATIONAL CRISIS

La Paz HOY in Spanish 22 Oct 81 p 8

[Text] The dmoestic policy of the Armed Forces government is seeking to resolve the current crisis by initiating fundamental reforms which are imposed by the conditions prevailing at the present historical moment.

The principal paragraphs proposed in this field advocate a national policy of respect for human rights, a response to the crisis "made more acute by political motivations on an international order," to eliminate the drug traffic, liquidate administrative corruption, smuggling, speculation and illegal accumulation of wealth, achieve national unity, revise the administrative apparatus, effect a tax reform, reorganize the physical distribution of economic activity, organize a modern national state, maintain a policy of permanent dialogue with political and social forces and in consultation with representative sectors to compose the first draft of a political constitution of the state to be submitted to the consideration of the Constituent Assembly.

The complete text of the government's domestic policy follows:

"In the context of its domestic policy, the Armed Forces government proposes to resolve the present crisis by carrying out certain fundamental reforms required by the conditions predominating at this historical moment, in accordance with the political criterion expressed in the following paragraphs:

1. To maintain in effect a national policy of respect for human rights and for the constitutional guarantees of governments and of the governed.

2. To respond to the crisis made more acute by political motivations of an international order by clarifying nationalistic convictions and the massively mobilized national will, seeking to overcome the economic crisis and seeking the construction of a solid democratic system which may overcome the limitations and the errors of the past, to the benefit of political stability and of an intransigent defense of national dignity and of the sovereign right of the Bolivian people to determine their own historical destiny against any overt or covert form of intervention.

3. To eliminate the drug traffic and to overcome moral degeneracy by applying the most drastic penalties to the manufacturers and dealers in drugs together with their accomplices and accessories without any concessions or toleration until the county's image abroad has beem improved.

4. To eliminate administrative corruption, smuggling, trade speculation and illicit acquisition of wealth.

5. To effect a genuine national unity integrating all the regions of the country and of all social sectors without any exception.

6. To begin a profound institutional transformation based on the following:

6.1 To readjust the administrative apparatus of the divisions of the state, on the level of ministries, prefectures and townships for more efficient operation.

6.2 To reorganize the decentralized institutions and public enterprises so that as soon as possible their rationalization and efficient functioning may be achieved and they may reach the highest possible levels of profitability.

This fact necessarily demands an operating decentralization on the executive level of the administration of said enterprises, most especially on the regional and managerial level, so that the general credit be recovered as rapidly as possible in efficient public administration and in self-support by the state enterprises.

6.3 To put into effect an integrating tax reform tending to establish a true social justice which will equalize rights and obligations among all citizens without distinctions or privilege whatever; by avoiding tax evasion and permitting the redistribution of income and a social capitalization at the service of the national community.

6.4 To formulate a body of lega dispositions aimed at normalizing and coordinating the functionong of stat enterprises, mixed and private enterprises and cooperatives whether in an independent or ina combined manner.

6.5 To establish the third integrated economic sector of the national economy, based on the social property of the Peasant Communities, on cooperatives of every class and the producer and consumer associations in which the system of producer and consumer participation prevails, as directly interested in the normal functioning of said enterprises.

6.6 To reorder the economic space of the country to obtain an adequate regionalization for the achievement of geopolitical objectives and political-administrative objectives.

6.7 To redirect the participation of private enterprise as a function of the objectives of national socioeconomic development by means of adequate legislation.

6.8 To organize a modern national state as a task of unavoidable historical urgency.

Within the framework of a nationalist, institutionalist and Christian ideology, where man, as a generator of national values and as an agent of development, may acquire a new preponderance and be changed into the center and the goal of government action and where the state will be defined as the instrument for the achievement of his training, development and realization.

To revise and add to the various law codes in effect according to the requirements of socioeconomic development, for the purpose of permitting the building of an institutional order adequate to the political and cultural demands of the republic.

To rationalize the functions of the modern national state in all their dimensions and administrative, judicial and legislative jurisdictions; by simplifying fiscal procedures, by making judicial independence effective as determined by the constitution, by imparting a moral attitude to the judiciary and giving a functional structure to the legislative branch.

6.9 Finally, the Armed Forces government declares its open disposition to maintain a policy of permanent dialogue with the political and social forces to achieve a proper national consensus permitting the country to achieve its economic, social, democratic and institutional goals which are proposed in this government program.

This task includes taking the following fundamental steps:

a) Concerning administration and institutions.

1. To revise and reactivate the Organic Law of Public Administration.
2. To revise and add to the codes and their dependent provisions now in effect.
3. To define mechanisms for rationalizing wages.

b) In the institutional and political aspect.

1. To prepare in consultation with representative sectors of the country the first draft of a political constitution of the state to be submitted to the consideration of the Constituent Assembly.
2. To draw up, in an act agreed upon by representative groups of opinion, the bill for the law of political parties.
3. To draw up in consultation with groups of representative opinion the reforms of the electoral law.
4. To prepare a law of municipalities.
5. An agreement of the Constituent Assembly to approve amendments to the political constitution of the state and other legal provisions referred to in this document.
6. Progressive institutionalization of public powers.

INVESTMENT LAW TO BE REVISED TO ALLOW PARTICIPATION OF PRIVATE INTERESTS

La Paz EL DIARIO in Spanish 6 Nov 81 p 3

[Text] Sucre, 5 Nov--The president of the country, Gen Celso Torrelio, has announced that the investment law will be revised and updated in order to permit the participation of national and foreign private capital in developing the country's vital industries. The announcement was made in a speech delivered on the occasion of the official opening of the new oilfield "Porvenir" in Luis Calvo Province in the Department of Chuquisaca.

The chief of state also emphasized the efforts of YPFB [Bolivian Government Oil Deposits] executives, technicians and workers and the work of the contracting company, Occidental Boliviana, which discovered the new field that will immediately make it possible to achieve a gradual increase in the country's oil production.

The opening ceremony was attended by departmental, regional and local authorities, along with executives and technicians from the YPFB and Occidental.

Cardinal Jose Clemente Maurer pronounced the blessing for the new production center.

In his address, Donal R. Wladden, vice president and general manager of Occidental Boliviana, said that the company has been operating in the country since 1973 on the basis of operating contracts signed with the YPFB, in order to successfully work the hydrocarbon deposits. In 1976, the company first discovered the Tita oilfield in Santa Cruz and now produces some 43 million cubic feet of natural gas and 1,300 barrels of oil a day. In 1978, it discovered the Porvenir field in Chuquisaca that was just officially opened.

That field now produces some 3,000 barrels of oil a day. Wladden said that the figure will gradually increase until it reaches 8,000 barrels a day of condensed oil. The natural gas that comes out of the field in significant volumes will be reinjected into the production wells in order to maintain the pressure required for normal production.

Wladden also announced that both he and the other Occidental executives have demonstrated their interest in investing more capitals in other northeastern areas of Bolivia in 1982, for which purpose another operating contract was signed with the YPFB.

For his part, Minister of Energy and Hydrocarbons Jorge Zamora said in his speech on the occasion that the government has outlined a national energy policy with the prime objective of discovering new reserves that will basically guarantee the country's supply.

He emphasized that the results obtained at Porvenir were made possible with the participation of risk capital and that in the future, that participation will be more active for the discovery of new oilfields in potential areas of the country. In that way, oil production could be increased.

In opening the Porvenir field, General Torrelio stressed the results achieved there through the combined efforts of both state and private capital and technology in the task of achieving a rational exploitation of natural resources and improving the living conditions of the Bolivian people.

"That is why the Armed Forces Government program has chosen the policy of increasing the participation of national and foreign private capital in the development of those those resources that will remain government-owned. They will be aided through the new investment law, which will clearly establish the rules of play specifying the fields of possible action."

He later emphasized that the country is aware that it does not have sufficient resources for prospection, localization and production, or for the importation of modern technology enabling Bolivians to benefit from their natural resources in keeping with the progress of the contemporary world, thereby justifying the participation of private capital.

CAUSES LEADING TO BALANCE OF PAYMENTS SITUATION ASSESSED

La Paz PRESENCIA in Spanish 6 Nov 81 p 3

[Article by Juan Carlos Calderon E.]

[Text] At a meeting of an economic and political group in the country, one high government official recently urged a reduction in imports because, he said, the country imports more than it exports, thereby causing the foreign exchange deficit.

It must be recognized that the balance [illegible]s deficit (considered to be the most important element for analyzing a co[illegible]ry's transactions in foreign currency) has increased in recent years. One must analyze the causes of the deficit so as to propose economic policies that can reverse the trend within the shortest amount of time.

It was deemed fitting to make a preliminary analysis of the behavior of the Bolivian balance of payments over the past 5 years.

From 1976 to 1980, the balance of payments showed a deficit totaling, according to information from the Central Bank of Bolivia, $481.4 million. The deficit created in the past 3 years has more than outweighed all the positive results obtained between 1976 and 1977. The causes of the deficit are varied. One of them is undeniably smuggling, which, according to a thesis submitted to the Bolivian Catholic University in 1977 for a master's degree in economics, represents nearly half of everything legally imported (Mantilla C. Julio: "Smuggling in Bolivia," Catholic University of Bolivia, 1977). According to the premises of the economic theory, it can be assumed that the "errors and omissions" heading represents smuggling and the accumulation of foreign currency in the hands of private parties. Over the past 5 years, that heading showed a deficit of $882.4 million, which in the case of Bolivia would be nearly 100-percent smuggled goods, inasmuch as during that span of time, with the fixed exchange rate and free buying, there would be no valid economic justification for assuming a strong demand for foreign currency for speculation, in addition to the existence of the clause for maintaining the value of savings deposits.

Another factor involved in the balance of payments deficit was "services and income" (shipments, other transport, travel, income from investments and other goods, services and income), which showed a negative balance of $1,314,300,000. It is interesting to note that shipments and other transport show a negative result of $576.3 million. This reveals, not only the lack of infrastructure in the country, but also the need to intensify the work of LINABOL [expansion unknown] and ENFE

[National Railway Enterprise] so as to avoid chronic dependency on freight companies. Despite a foreign balance of $651.3 million, investment income should be analyzed with great care because in addition to representing a relatively well-paid source of work, it means the transfer of technology not bought by the government and which could signify future capital savings for the public and private sectors. The deficit in other goods, services and income results from the payment of services rendered under aid programs and the maintenance of Bolivian diplomatic representation in other countries. As one can see, it does not seem possible to reduce the deficit under this heading.

The entries that in some way helped Bolivia's balance of payments were those of the capital account, which had a surplus of $1,269,000,000 during the period from 1976 to 1980. Attracting funds in foreign currency, while it did tend to lower the negative results of the balance of payments, tends to mortgage the country's rather immediate future because net income from the heading "other capital" (totaling $1,141,600,000) represents 89.96 percent of all income in the capital account and 72.73 percent of total positive income for the last 5 years ($1,569,600,000). It has been repeated that the "other capital" heading tends to mortgage the country since it represents credits granted to the country for the private and specially public sectors. Consequently, all this income must be paid back, plus interest, which is now increasing.

The other major heading that reduced the balance of payments deficit was goods (exports minus imports), which had a positive balance of $300.6 million. This contradicts the statement by the high government official who urged a reduction in imports, without considering that over 75 percent of what the country imports is raw materials and intermediate products (fuel and related items, raw materials and intermediate goods for agriculture and raw materials and intermediate goods for industry) and capital goods (building materials, capital goods for agriculture, capital goods for industry and transport equipment), things the country does not produce because of its low technological capabilities and the small market.

Based on all the foregoing, it is possible to draw a few conclusions: First of all, it seems illogical to try to implement measures banning imports because not only would this encourage what economic officials call the "cancer" -- that is, smuggling, but in addition, the direct, collateral effects would be manifested in increased unemployment and higher prices. The foreign debt policy followed with such enthusiasm in recent years must be seriously reconsidered because if it is to be continued, bankruptcy of the Bolivian Government will be imminent. Finally, one justification for this article: It results from the need to try to take the myth out of the current situation of Bolivia, for as it is continually repeated, we have but one country and we must try to see that it operates in the best way possible.

DETAILS PUBLISHED ON COOPERATION AGREEMENT WITH SPAIN

La Paz EL DIARIO in Spanish 6 Nov 81 p 3

[Text] In accordance with the provisions of the Technical Cooperation Pact signed by representatives of the governments of Spain and Bolivia on 3 July 1971, the minister of foreign relations of Bolivia, Dr Gonzalo Romero, and Spanish Ambassador Tomas Lozano Escribano yesterday signed a Complementary Technical Cooperation Accord.

The ceremony took place in the office of the minister of foreign relations and was also attended by the president of the Santa Cruz Regional Development Corporation (CORDECRUZ), Oscar Alfonso Echazu.

The agreement envisions an improvement in the current irrigation system, the identification and drafting of new irrigation and agricultural development projects for the mesothermic valleys in Florida, Vallegrande and Caballero provinces.

It provides that the Spanish Government will appoint the General Directorate of International Technical Cooperation of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and the National Agrarian Reform and Development Institute, an autonomous entity of the Ministry of Culture, as responsible for compliance with the obligations of the Complementary Accord.

For its part, the Bolivian Government will appoint the Santa Cruz Regional Development Corporation as the organization responsible for execution of activities.

For this purpose, CORDECRUZ technicians will be trained in Spain and special experts will be made available to the regional development organization of the eastern region for specific advisory tasks.

The financial obligations that Spain will assume are the following: underwrite all expenditures incurred in Spain by Spanish experts helping CORDECRUZ in Bolivia; moving expenditures for the families of such technical personnel Spain-Bolivia-Spain; return traveling expenditures between Spain and Bolivia, monthly food and medical care allowance and pharmaceutical and hospital expenses for Bolivian technicians being trained in Spain.

The financial obligations and responsibilities of the Bolivian Government are: one-way tickets for CORDECRUZ technicians from Bolivia to Spain; premises, offices, personnel, secretarial and office costs; traveling expenditures inside Bolivia when on behalf of CORDECRUZ.

TRADE MINISTER EXPLAINS SOLUTION TO SUGAR SURPLUS

Santa Cruz EL MUNDO in Spanish 30 Oct 81 p 1

[Report on interview with Minister of Industry and Commerce Lucio Paz, La Paz, 29 October]

[Text] La Paz, 29 Oct--Minister of Industry and Commerce Lucio Paz said today that sugar surpluses that will be exported by government mills were not sold on the domestic market at prices lower than those established, adding that the fate of that production will be determined in planning for 1982.

It was recently claimed that sugar mills under the Bolivian Development Corporation had sold sugar at $10 a quintal when official prices are approximately 900 Bolivian pesos.

"That sale did not take place; it did not occur," Minister Lucio Paz emphasized when questioned today by the local press.

The official repeated that "the general problems of the country's sugar industry are very difficult because we are producing more sugar than the domestic market can consume.

"At the same time, exportable surpluses cannot be immediately sold outside the country because their price is $10 a quintal. If we consider a production cost that is over $10, plus freight costs of about $7 to the port, the government would obviously be losing money," he explained.

The export quota was originally set at 1.5 million quintals. This situation forced Bolivia to ask the international sugar agreement for a reduction in the export figure, which was lowered to 800,000 quintals that must be exported so that our country will not lose its place in the international organization.

These 800,000 quintals of sugar must be exported by December of this year.

The approximately 500,000 quintals that will not be exported and that are production surpluses "will be programmed in 1982."

All of the export sugar belongs to the two government mills (Guabira and Bermejo).

"Unfortunately, the state mills are those which have to export this year when prices are the lowest," Minister Paz Rivero said.

The press asked the official whether subsidies will continue to be given to private mills, with prices higher than on the domestic market.

"I would not say they will be subsidized. What happened is that in recent years, sugar was sold at a lower price than on the international market. A correction was made but it was unfortunately greater than those on the foreign market (prices). However, this is a policy that every country in the world applies when it is a matter of promoting industry," Minister Paz said.

He announced that next week, national and foreign firms were invited to present bids for the awarding of partial sales to those offering the best prices.

Paz Rivero said that in order that the state firms not suffer great economic losses, the export sugar will be sold at a price over $10 a quintal.

In order to analyze and correct these situations that endanger the existence of the national sugar industry, consultations are being held with a view to a national meeting of the National Sugar and Cane Study Council (CNECA).

The minister of industry and commerce stated that for the time being, there is no date set for the plenary meeting of the CNECA.

PRESIDENT TO RETURN TO WORK, WILL APPOINT NEW ADVISORY GROUP

Sao Paulo O ESTADO DE SAO PAULO in Portuguese 7 Nov 8 81 p 5

[Text] One of the first acts by President Joao Figueiredo after reassuming his position as chief of the government on Thursday will be to effect a small change in the internal structure of the Presidency of the Republic, creating one more direct advisory agency, the Special Secretariat, to be occupied by Col Luis Carlos Coutinho, now trip coordinator for Vice President Aureliano Chaves.

The formal creation of the new agency is being completed by the Civilian Household and possibly the Special Secretariat will be similar to the Private Secretariat, occupied since the beginning of the administration by Heitor Aquino Ferreira. Col Luis Carlos Coutinho has been working at Planalto Palace during the time the acting president has been in office. After being personally invited by General Figueiredo, he informed Aureliano that he will assume his new duties and was released by the vice president. Before changing posts, however, Coutinho will still accompany Aureliano Chaves to Rio on the 12th, where he will be the sponsor at the wedding of a friend's daughter, and the next day he will go to Sao Paulo for the inauguration of the Automobile Hall.

The work to be performed by Col Luis Carlos Coutinho is still being kept under wraps and he himself describes it vaguely as the activities pertaining "to a special adviser." However, the most probable thing, according to statements by other advisers to the Presidency, is that Coutinho will also be used in work of political coordination, in which he acquired a certain experience from his day to day living with Aureliano Chaves and in the legislative advisory work he did for the Vice Presidency in Congress during the past two years. Coutinho is well-known in the legislative area today and will also become one of the main liaisons between the Presidency and the Vice Presidency of the Republic.

Luis Carlos Coutinho was chief of personal security for former President Medici, also a friend of Gen Joao Figueiredo, who was then chief of the Military Household. A native of Itajuba, Minas Gerais, he later worked with Aureliano Chaves in the government of Minas Gerais and his bonds of personal friendship with the vice president are very old; he will now be in a privileged position for the work he will perform as a person trusted by Figueiredo and Aureliano.

MINISTER OF AIR SAYS 1985 PRESIDENT MUST BE YOUNG

Sao Paulo O ESTADO DE SAO PAULO in Portuguese 7 Nov 81 p 5

[Text] Minister of Air Delio Jardim de Mattos said yesterday that the future president of the republic in 1985 must be "a young man, civilian or military," and once more discarded any possibility of being a viable name for the nomination to the presidency in 1984. The minister of air said that the democratic opening is already a fact which cannot be turned back, believing that the defeat of the bill for allowing multiple candidates from the same party for the same position (sublegenda) with respect to gubernatorial elections showed that there "exists a democratic movement."

Delio also advocated the need for the political class to wait for the results of the direct elections of 82, which according to him will dictate many standards for the future. "We have to prepare ourselves for the 82 elections," said the minister, "and then think about elections for the president of the republic. It is still too early to think about that." He said that he is not a candidate for the presidency because "that entails some requirements and being young is one of them." Minister Delio Jardim de Mattos, who granted a collective interview to the press for more than an hour at the auditorium at the Manaus Air Base, said that he does not discriminate as far as the future president of the republic being a civilian or a military man. "It could be a civilian just as well as a military man. The important thing is that we play the democratic game. To seek a civilian would be to discriminate against the military. I would not do that." He also said: "There are many young men with a mature, adult mind. There are also many old men with young minds." He did not, however, say which group he would fall into. "If I am not a candidate that does not interest me. I am very old. The post is for the young."

The minister of air believes it is normal for the PDS [Social Democratic Party] to withdraw from Congress the political programs of the government. It is part of the political game. It is a right of political parties. And if the activities of the parties were hindered in the full exercise of the Congress. then that is not democracy."

In Manaus yesterday also, the minister of air announced the creation of a new Regional Air Command in Amazonas "to take care of the development needs of the region," in the example of what the army and navy are doing, which should increase their number of men in the Amazon Region, creating new commands within the framework of a strategy for the creation of the 5th Army with its headquarters in the capital of Amazonas. Minister Delio Jardim de Mattos also reported that the Airport Commission of the Amazon Region (COMARA) should initiate the construction of a civil airport in Leticia next year, a Colombian city across the border from Benjamin Constante in Amazonas and could build others in bordering countries.

As far as the creation of the Amazonas Air Command is concerned, the minister explained that it will not require great expenditures by the ministry because there will be no need for deployments of aircraft or substantial increases in the number of personnel in the area. With respect to COMARA, he promised to equip the agency so that it can take care of local needs and that now, with the interest demonstrated by countries bordering the Amazon Region, the technology of building airports could be taken to those countries. The minister also said that the FAB [Brazilian Air Force] does not have the capability for the surveillance and identification of clandestine airports in the Amazon Region. "It is a difficult work for which we are not prepared," he explained, announcing that the air force is already studying a type of aircraft for replacing the legendary Catalinas in flights over the Amazon Region. He said that possibly a project will be developed for converting the "Bandeirante" aircraft into an amphibian or for the construction of an aircraft provided with floats so that the Amazone Region will not be served only by the airports COMARA is building.

SOVIETS URGE GREATER EFFORT TO BALANCE TRADE WITH USSR

Sao Paulo O ESTADO DE SAO PAULO in Portuguese 25 Nov 81 p 28

[Text] The secretary responsible for the Soviet side of the Joint Soviet-Brazil Commission, Valeri Kornyschev, said at a meeting with several Brazilian businessmen in the FIESP [Sao Paulo State Federation of Industries] yesterday that the unbalanced trade between Brazil and his country "is, to some degree, a hindrance to its further development."

In suggesting more dynamic trade relations between the two countries, Kornyschev asserted: "Although we cannot propose the task of establishing complete balance in bilateral trade, given the profile of merchandise involved, moderation of the sizable and severe imbalance would be a favorable influence on trade as a whole. In our opinion, therefore, if the Brazilian party wishes to develop trade it should devote more attention to seeking mutually advantageous ways for increasing USSR exports to Brazil."

According to businessman Jose Mindlin, the invitation to hold the discussion about trade relations between Brazil and the USSR originated with the Soviet Government itself, concerned about reducing its existing deficit. Mindlin, of Russian descent, agrees with Kornyschev in saying that "in the long run the current trade imbalance must not persist."

He said later at a press conference that the Soviets must be patient, in view of the nation's current balance-of-payments situation: "They must show some understanding and continue giving these opportunities to Brazil, because this could represent a gain in the future," he said.

Mindlin contends that in the long run the Brazilian Government will be able to help correct the present situation, even using purchase of heavy Soviet equipment as an instrument for selling Brazilian manufactured goods. With that in mind, he suggested more representation for private enterprise in the Joint Brazil-USSR Commission.

He recalled, however, that increasing purchases of Russian equipment now would involve not only reactivating the economy but also a policy change in Brazilian foreign-trade relations: "It is difficult for Brazil to buy equipment from nontraditional suppliers such as the USSR, as such business is invariably dependent upon an efficient technical structure for maintenance, which the Soviets may have, but of which Brazilians are not yet aware," he concluded.

Soviet merchandise exports reached $66.1 billion in 1980, a $9.6 billion (17 percent) increase over 1979. The Soviet Union now trades with 139 countries, responsible for 20 percent of world production; the Soviets maintain a specific ministry that is responsible for foreign trade and that controls several agencies which function as state enterprises, each of them responsible for a particular group of merchandise.

The largest USSR trading partners in South America (1980 data) are Argentina ($1.6 billion), Brazil ($370 million), Bolivia ($34 million) and Uruguay ($32 million). In its trade with Brazil, Soviet exports were about $30 million, compared with $340 million exported by Brazil last year. In 1981, the amount of merchandise traded should be the highest in the history of Soviet-Brazil relations, totaling about $700 million.

JANIO QUADROS POPULARITY SUBJECT OF GALLUP POLL

Sao Paulo O ESTADO DE SAO PAULO in Portuguese 12 Nov 81 p 5

[Text] The popularity of former President Janio Quadros is inversely proportional to the knowledge people have about his political career. His prestige is precisely greater among those who know the least about his public life. Recent surveys of public opinion in Sao Paulo by the Gallup Institute show that in terms of social classes as well as age or education, the rate of support for the former president diminishes as the social class, age or educational level of those interviewed increased.

The surveys also reveal that the majority believes the episode of resigning from the Presidency of the Republic has not been well explained and that although the general index of prestige of the former president is similar to that of other recently analyzed politicians, his reproval rate is twice as great. Questions on the recent PMDB [Brazilian Democratic Movement Party] decision to bar the entry of Quadros into the party show an almost equal proportion of those who support the former president and those who approve the PMDB position, however, in the comparative picture with other former Sao Paulo governors, the greatest number prefer Laudo Natel.

Numbers

The absolute majority of those interviewed have already heard about Janio Quadros but those who know him best criticize his behavior the most. In Class B, 90 percent of those questioned know which public offices he held as did 82 percent of Class A, 83 percent of those who are 50 years of age or older and 89 percent of those who have higher education. In those classes, the level of prestige of the former president, which theoretically can vary from +100 percent to -100 percent, is respectively -22 percent, -20.8 percent, +4.8 percent and -23.4 percent, the lowest obtained yet.

As the knowledge of his political career declines, in 74 percent of Class C, 62 percent of Class D, 77 percent of those between 30 and 49 years, 62 percent of those between 18 and 29 years, 77 percent of those who have high school education and 67 percent of those who have primary education, his prestige index increases, reaching +23 percent, +33.4 percent, +13.6 percent, +30.2 percent, +23.2 percent and +24.6 percent, respectively.

On the question of the resignation, although the majority (46 percent) says that the episode has not yet been well explained, that index rises among the older people polled, reaching 49 percent among those who are 30 to 49 years-of-age and 55 percent among those who are 50 years-of-age or older. Among the younger, those from 18 to 29 years-of-age, the greatest number (39 percent) could not say whether or not the resignation was well explained.

By comparison with other politicians on whom polls have been made, the popular prestige of Janio Quadros is characterized by being more extreme and more negative at the same time. While Quadros, as well as the other politicians obtained 22 percent rates for the highest level of approval, the average of those politicians for the lowest reproval rate was 10 percent, while the former president receives 20 percent. Opinions are divided on the question of Quadros entering the PMDB, with 35 percent of those interviewed supporting the party decision of barring the entry of the former president, 30 percent saying that his entry should have been accepted and 35 percent not answering because they did not have an opinion on the subject.

In the comparison with several former governors of Sao Paulo, Janio Quadros obtained only 17 percent of the preferences, against 24 percent by Laudo Natel--19 percent of those interviewed could not express an opinion as to their preference.

FOREIGN DEBT REACHES $54 BILLION, RENEGOTIATION HINTED

Sao Paulo O ESTADO DE SAO PAULO in Portuguese 3 Nov 81 p 30

[Text] Despite the favorable report Minister of Planning Delfim Netto will make to Acting President Aureliano Chaves tomorrow, telling of the willingness of European bankers to continue financing Brazil next year to take care of the need for at least $18 billion in money, pressures for renegotiation of the debt continue inside and outside the government.

The minister of planning knows of those pressures, revealed in tones of warning or concern, and he has been discussing the subject with the persons involved, always repeating that the country can go through 1982, as it did in 1981, without resorting to negotiations.

Delfim says that at the end of last year "the orchestration" around negotiating the debt was even greater and that "a veritable disaster was being forecast." Despite that the country reached November with foreign resources practically staying home, despite the fact that a major effort was made to obtain loans in money to compensate for the decline in direct investments, which had been foreseen as $2 billion but did not even reach half that much.

Actually, according to Central Bank figures, investments and reinvestments, which in December last year reached the sum of $17,480,000, grew this year to $17,498,000, a growth of only .1 percent.

There was even a drop in reinvestments from $5,846,000 in December last year to $5,211,000 in June of this year, expressing in part the effect of the increase in value of the American dollar by comparison with other money.

Polish Example

In the discussion around renegotiation of the debt--which is no longer in the newspaper pages but continues to live within the government and among businessmen--Minister Delfim Netto has a strong ally in his predecessor. Both Delfim and Simonsen, agree on one same definitive argument: renegotiation would be difficult but the worse thing would not be the slow and painful negotiations with creditors but the virtual halt in the flow of foreign resources, either in the form of loans in money or direct investments. In that hypothesis, Brazil would not have any means for proceeding with its investment program, which still require a minimum of $5 billion per year.

According to Mario Henrique Simonsen, the halt in the flow of foreign resources would be the first thing to happen as soon as the intention of Brazil to renegotiate its debt were announced officially. The flow would continue to be halted during the entire period of negotiations, exposing the country to a troublesome situation before the international financial market.

Delfim adds the example of Poland to that argument. Poland is facing serious difficulties in renegotiating its debt of $18 billion--a third of the Brazilian debt--and is being forced to reduce its program of investments drastically (which depends on resources obtained in the Western World), because the banks simply refuse to lend it more money.

Debt

In June the foreign debt had reached $56,148,000, exceeding the forecasts made by authorities at the beginning of the year, according to which it would reach $60 billion. The net debt (gross debt minus reserves), which last year amounted to $47.5 billion, should reach $54 billion by the end of this year.

For the minister of planning those amounts are perfectly compatible with the other indicators of the economy and he believes the net debt/exports and debt service/exports relationships to be in an acceptable position. At the end of the year the relationships should reach 2.04 and .56, respectively, compared to 2.36 and .64 at the end of last year.

GALVEAS ASSURES ECONOMIC RECOVERY IN 1982; OTHER COMMENT

Sao Paulo O ESTADO DE SAO PAULO in Portuguese 27 Nov 81 p 27

[Text] The government may reduce investments in all its programs except for agriculture and exports in order to divert funds to Social Security, even with an additional tax on nonessential goods (the list of 145 products reported this week is one of five being studied) that should bring in 200 billion cruzeiros unless consumption declines. This may be one of the suggestions Planning Minister Delfim Netto will submit to the president of the republic to cover the Social Security deficit of 400 billion cruzeiros, as the planning minister himself admitted in Sao Paulo yesterday at the closing session of the Third Brazilian Congress of the Electric and Electronics Industry.

In his speech to the sector's businessmen, Delfim acknowledged this year's difficulties but promised recovery in 1982. "Brazil has now reached a point where we can think about growing again. Not the glorious development of 14 percent a year but certainly 5 percent without it causing any additional pressure on the balance of payments."

Deficit

The planning minister said the Social Security deficit is so big that all programs now underway are candidates for cuts. "But we must leave out at least agriculture and exports. The rest is subject to being cut, including the energy sector," he stated in a press interview. "The arithmetic will accept any figure. If we are aiming at tax revenues of 400 billion cruzeiros all we have to do is set the rate."

He pointed out, however, that covering such a deficit is a difficult process and any solution will involve less expenditures for medical care, a solution that is already being applied by Social Security Minister Jair Soares, and the sacrifice of a few other government programs as well as taxing nonessential goods. Delfim Netto rejected, however, the possibility of increasing INPS [National Social Security Institute] contributions by employees and employers, alleging that it is necessary to comply with the law that was approved.

"A list was reported in compliance with the decision by Congress, which decided upon a mechanism for financing the INPS and it is our obligation to find a solution within that decision," he explained, pointing out, however, that the list reported is only one of five being studied to obtain tax revenues sufficient to finance at least a part of the Social Security deficit. He said the rates varied among these lists but the goods are not very different. Thus, if the reported list should be applied and there is no reduction in demand for the goods that are listed tax revenues of about 200 billion cruzeiros would be produced and the other half of the deficit could be covered by cuts in government programs, Delfim noted.

He acknowledged, however, that raising the tax might reduce consumption, but the Social Security deficit--which in his opinion is very important--must not be financed by inflationary methods. And he explained that this lower consumption need not result in a loss of revenue. "It is not inevitable that the product of price times quantity will fall. You can have a 5 percent reduction in quantity but a price increase of 20 percent and your revenue increases 15 percent," he suggested.

The planning minister's goal is to present the problem's solution by the end of this year, which he intends to do. He explained further that in the case of the tax on nonessential goods, there will be no annual tax period to take into consideration because the IPI [Finished Goods Tax] is the instrument by which the tax will be charged.

"The law says a tax of up to 20 percent of the final price of the product may be levied. If it were decided to create a new tax mechanism it would be a tragedy. The plan is to collect this by means of the IPI. You compute how much you have to raise the IPI so it represents 20 percent of the value of the sale. As this is a matter of correcting the IPI, which is not paid on a yearly basis, this can be done at any time."

Luxury Goods and Jobs

In regard to the official note of the Brazilian Electro-Electronic Industry Association (ABINEE) which, on the basis of Paragraph 2, Article 62, Section VI of the constitution, says that a tax on luxury goods is unconstitutional, the planning minister said this is a problem for the courts: "Whether or not the law is unconstitutional is decided by the STF [Federal Supreme Court]. I am not competent to answer." After conceding that "one man's luxury is another man's employment," Delfim Netto said the statements by the CNI [National Confederation of Industries] president, Albano Franco, to the effect that the measure would cause businesses to fail astonished him: "It would appear that he was speaking against almost any solution other than this one." He then asserted that this "necessary" expense for medical care must be financed by all sectors of society.

"To provide this financing consumption must be cut somewhere else. It is a physical problem. If we must finance the deficit this will represent a sacrifice by some sectors. But we are in a position to grow 5 percent," he continued, and concluded that "making economic policy is difficult because people do not understand there are physical restrictions and no one wants to take unpopular positions."

Domestic Interest Rates Will Fall, Says Delfim

Domestic interest rates will fall in 1982 because in the monetary budget, now in the final stage of preparation, the government has decided it will borrow less money in the domestic market. That assurance is made by Planning Minister Delfim

Netto, who cited less dependence on domestic borrowing as one of the measures consistent with reduction of interest rates next year. This year, as the government had to take out many domestic loans, interest rates rose, as the planning minister explained, because "public borrowing must pay more, the more the funds are needed." But, he said, in the 1982 monetary budget there is less dependence on domestic loans.

"Certainly, domestic interest rates will fall," he added, listing additional reasons for his belief: lower foreign interest rates; reduction of the rate of inflation (which he expects to be less than 100 percent this year), with a lower rate of monetary correction and nominal interest. After acknowledging the difficulties caused by the balance of payments he said the improvements already obtained have created an opportunity for a return to growth. "We are going to do that, trying to choose sectors that mature rapidly, that produce exports and that have a low import coefficient," he continued.

At the closing ceremony of the Third Brazilian Congress of the Electric and Electronics Industry, Planning Minister Delfim Netto acknowledged that the sector went through a severe adjustment process, as the balance of payments led to a reduction of sales. He asserted, however, that this was not produced by government policy: "With the rise in interest rates, consumption of goods produced by companies associated with the ABINEE fell, but in 1982 we will have a recovery."

In his speech he said he prefers applause and so would like to be in December 1980 to celebrate a 12 percent increase in industrial production. But he asked everyone to recognise that the government was not conducting a "purge" nor did it wish to penalize industry, because its primary objective is economic development.

"I don't feel comfortable in the straitjacket of controls and I would prefer to avoid certain restrictions. But we had to settle our balance of payments. We could no longer continue depending upon foreign savings. This would lead us to bankruptcy. Courage was needed to make the necessary adjustments. You can do what you want to do only if you are able to and if you do what you are able to do you end up doing what you want. We are suffering, but we are making progress," he remarked, commenting further on the reduction in the rate of inflation, the trade surplus and the adjustment to the energy crisis.

Delfim Netto reminded them that reduction of oil imports to 700,000 barrels a day was not due to the industrial slump but rather to increased domestic production, substitution of alcohol and conservation practices of business. "The 'baron' on television showed that much could be saved and that, if invested in the financial market, could be an additional source of income," he asserted, pointing out that it is now possible to return to using a portion of imports to promote growth of the industrial sector.

He acknowledged that monetary policy has a way of making the policy unpalatable, but that the objective was to reduce the amount of imports and favor mainly agriculture and exports. In this regard, he said the electro-electronic sector must increase its exports, which it will do more easily if it is able to expand domestic demand to reduce costs. "We are going to grow again, simply by working. But we will work more happily because we will not have to restrict consumption so much. When we meet again in 1982, you will see that we will have accomplished what we plan to do: development," he concluded.

'Expansion of 5% in GDP Is Futurology'

Brasilia--Herbert Levy, federal deputy and board chairman of Itau Bank, yesterday called Planning Minister Delfim Netto's prediction of a 5 percent increase next year in Gross Domestic Product "futurology," because in the deputy's opinion the Brazilian economy this year does not reveal good prospects for 1982.

Levy termed "deplorable" the negative growth "that will be recorded in industrial production" this year and, recalling that the situation is not favorable, referred to Labor Minister Murillo Macedo's confirmation of 2.5 million unemployed in the nation, "quite aside from other problems created for producers, for example." He further said that "the social price being paid for carrying out this economic policy is exorbitant."

But Jose Carlos Moraes de Abreu, the bank's general manager and a member of the National Monetary Council [CMN], believes the economy will be reactivated in 1982, "not at a rate proper for Brazil, but that should increase gradually beginning in 1982." In his opinion, the major problem to be solved by the government next year will be reducing the unemployment rate.

Moraes de Abreu, moreover, sees the possibility of lower domestic interest rates due to lower inflation and international interest rates. But he believes reducing the domestic rate will depend essentially upon reducing government sxpenditures. "If the government must finance a very large deficit, as it did this year, it will have to offer a high rate of interest to attract funds," he argues.

Deputy Herbert Levy believes that unless interest rates are reduced "there will be widespread bankruptcies because business can no longer afford the current cost of money, which is between 120 and 150 percent."

Both Deputy Levy and CMN member Moraes de Abreu were present yesterday at the inauguration in Brasilia of the first Itau branch bank outside of Sao Paulo State, which will use the computer-assisted Itau-Tec system.

Galveas Says 1982 Growth Will Be the Greatest Possible

Rio de Janeiro--"The government's desire is that the economy grow in 1982 at the highest possible rate," Finance Minister Ernane Galveas said yesterday when asked to make his prediction for next year.

So as not to completely avoid giving figures, Galveas said that production in 1982 is very likely to improve, as the farm crop promises to be satisfactory, in view of the 3 to 5 percent increase in planted area, according to the latest data from the Agriculture Ministry in his possession.

"At times," the minister said, "it is not possible to attain the desired growth because conditions do not permit. The government," he added, "must not permit greater pressure from imports nor a decontrol of inflation and there are restraints that limit economic expansion. If it were up to the government, we would grow 10 percent every year."

But he also believes the poor performance by the industrial sector this year and high interest rates favored inventory liquidation, which created better conditions for growth in 1982. He also assumes that exports will benefit from lower international interest rates because they create a trend toward greater sales of commodities and raw materials in foreign markets.

But Gaveas asserts the government will not conduct an administrative program by CACEX [Foreign Trade Department] to increase imports to fill the gap resulting from a trade surplus this year. As far as he is concerned, imports will increase as much as economic activity permits.

Government policy in 1982 will be exactly the same as it was in 1981: to limit inflation, the issuing of currency and the money supply will increase less than the rate of inflation, the policy for monetary and exchange correction will keep pace with inflation and the exchange rate will keep pace with monetary correction.

When asked about the possibility that, with such a policy, annual monetary correction would be greater than inflation beginning in January and February, Galveas asserted that even if that happens the policy will not be changed and the difference will be absorbed in the long run. For the present, the government does not intend to deduct foreign inflation from the exchange-rate correction. It would be ideal if the 10 percent premium over the INPC [National Consumer Price Index] adjustment being paid to Social Security pensioners who receive up to three times the minimum wage had been eliminated. But as Congress did not pass this, the government must find another source of additional funds besides the increase in the IPI on nonessential goods to cope with the deficit in the Social Security system.

GALVEAS ESTIMATES MIDDLE EAST TRIP TO YIELD $2.5 BILLION

Sao Paulo O ESTADO DE SAO PAULO in Portuguese 27 Nov 81 p 27

[Text] Rio de Janeiro--Finance Minister Ernane Galveas estimated in Rio yesterday that the mission he led to Saudi Arabia, Iraq, Kuwait and Bahrain could yield sales and financing of about $2.5 billion in a period of 5 years. He further expressed much optimism regarding the opportunities that are opening up for Brazilian business in that region, especially in the sectors of engineering services, building materials, foodstuffs and mining.

According to the finance minister, the great obstacle for Brazilian exports to the [words missing]: the cost of shipping a Volkswagen from Japan [as published] to Saudi Arabia is $200, whereas it costs $800 from Brazil.

In view of the size of investments that these countries are now making for modernization and industrialization of their economies, Galveas believes there is a broad potential market for Brazilian goods, pointing to Iraq, the most populous of them (14 million inhabitants) and with a 5-year plan (1981-85) that provides for investments of $26 billion this year and $35 billion in 1985. It happens that Iraq is a socialist country in which all business firms are state enterprises and which does not permit enterprise to continue making investments in associations such as that of the Brazilian-Iraqi Bank, whose headquarters will now be here. But in the case of the automobile industrial park planned by the Iraqi government, Volkswagen of Brazil is seeking a place with good prospects of success.

As to Kuwait, the best prospects are in the nature of investments that may be made in Brazil, as it is a great financial center with a stock market considered the world's eighth largest, although the country has only 1.2 million inhabitants and little intention of becoming an industrial center. The Kuwait Government, according to the finance minister, is quite satisfied with the ABICO (association of Kuwaiti and Brazilian capital), which intends to invest $300 million in a project for raising sheep, probably in Bahia.

Saudi Arabia is the inverse of Iraq. Everything is governed by market forces and all business is conducted by private companies except for public works. Galveas said that, subject to price and quality, Brazil has ample possibilities for exporting goods and services. To give an idea of the potential, the Saudis import annually 5 million head of sheep and to take advantage of that market Brazil should be equipped with special ships to transport live goats--the traditional Arab method of importing, according to the finance minister.

EMBRAER EXPORTS TO TOTAL $100 MILLION BY YEAR'S END

Rio de Janeiro O GLOBO in Portuguese 23 Nov 81 p 11

[Text] Sao Jose dos Campos--Despite the difficulties it has been facing, expecially in selling its products for the domestic market, the Brazilian Aeronautics Company (EMBRAER) will close out the year selling more aircraft abroad than in the years of 1978 and 1979 combined. By the end of December the company will have sold in the foreign market 50 aircraft of the Bandeirante, Xingu and Xavante types, worth a total of about $100 million. In the domestic market, however, there has been a significant decline, as sales reached a little more than half the 373 units sold in 1980 and which would indicate a billing of 4.3 billion cruzeiros.

EMBRAER marketing director engineer Ozilio Carlos da Silva thinks it would be a real achievement if domestic sales this year amount to two-thirds of what was sold last year. For the present there are no more exact figures available. The company, trying to expand sales, especially of agricultural aircraft, set up a system of direct financing that has been functioning since 2 November and will remain in effect until 31 December and that so far has not received much market response.

Abroad

Showing mainly its Bandeirantes, and now with the Brasilia, which is an elongated version of the Bandeirante that seats 30 passengers, EMBRAER was trying to expand its activities abroad by participating in several international fairs and meetings and opening several sales agencies. According to Ozilio Silva, one of the most important steps was EMBRAER participation in the meeting of regional airline operators in the Unites States during the 2d week of November. During that event EMBRAER inaugurated the office of its subsidiary company in that country, where buyers can now conduct negotiations directly with the Brazilian Aeronautics Company.

The trend in the United States market is toward standardization since for several months the air traffic controlers strike has forced U.S. regional airlines to operate at only half their capacity, deterring additional purchases of aircraft. At the present time 58 Bandeirante aircraft are operating in that country and there are many proposals for new contracts being analyzed and negotiated with U.S. financial agencies. In Europe the economic crisis and high interest rates have also hampered aircraft sales.

Meanwhile, EMBRAER is seeking to open new markets, especially in Asia, where the company participated in an Asian aerospace conference and exposition in Singapore during September, where the Bandeirante and Xingu were demonstrated to representatives of Japan, South Korea and Pakistan. "We have no doubt," said Ozilio Silva, "that as a result of this exposition EMBRAER will sell many aircraft to Japan and Australia."

Over the long term the company hopes to penetrate the market in China, which its directors visited this year. Ozilio Silva, however, believes the Chinese market is very difficult to penetrate, "where many meetings and studies and even at times some political sacrifices by the exporting country are required." He explained that China is a large market, but for manufactured personal and household goods, as the Chinese are manufacturing their own aircraft and air transport is limited, although there are several areas of application for Brazilian aircraft.

Americas

EMBRAER's marketing director reports that this year the U.S. market should absorb 30 to 35 Brazilian aircraft, with even better prospects for 1982, especially if the expected lower interest rates are confirmed. In the United States only the Xingu, an executive aircraft, and the Bandeirante, for passenger transport, are being sold. In December EMBRAER will be visited by representatives of the Canadian Ministry of Industry and Commerce and expects at that time to open negotiations with that country.

Latin America is a market almost entirely penetrated by EMBRAER. Countries such as Paraguay, Chile, Argentina and Ecuador have begun negotiations with the company. The Latin American market is more diversified, as light aircraft as well as those with civilian and military applications are being sold.

In Brazil EMBRAER expects to sell 278 light aircraft this year, which would represent a sizable decline from 1980, when 373 aircraft were sold.

"In January of this year," says the marketing director, "we lowered the forecast as a result of the country's domestic difficulties and now it looks like our performance will be even worse." To try to cope with the situation, EMBRAER set up a direct-financing plan for purchasing the aircraft, but until now does not know exactly what results have been achieved.

"The direct financing we are doing," he stresses, "is a heavy drain on the company and cannot last very long because in a short time we would have to seek money outside the company."

The most important factor at this point is definition of the system and mechanism for rural credit for next year, as that is the market that is best able to buy certain types of aircraft made by EMBRAER. According to Ozilio Silva, it is not important if rural-credit interest rates are raised, as in any event the rates will be lower than market rates and what the farmer values most is the system, operation and very existence of rural credit. If rural credit opens the possibility of buying aircraft for agricultural use, EMBRAER will recover its income in the domestic market within a short time.

In the Red

The last 3 years of economic crisis have caused EMBRAER to operate "in the red"; that is, at a loss.

Increased exports and domestic sales in some cases did not cover inflation. Moreover, in recent periods EMBRAER's foreign expansion was not enough to make up for lower domestic sales. In 1979, for example, the company sold 48 aircraft of the Bandeirante, Xingu and Xavante types, billing $70 million. The following year exports increased to $84.1 million, from the sale of 58 units of the same types.

This year, according to records as of 15 November, EMBRAER exports totaled $70.3 million for 44 aircraft. There are negotiated contracts waiting for financing covering 15 additional units, which will represent another $25 million. By the end of the year the company's exports could reach $100 million, 20 percent more than last year. Immediately after the beginning of the year EMBRAER expects to make a sale of several more airships in the United States, which could enable EMBRAER in January to reach the goal of exporting $120 million initially forecast for 1981. Total sales last year were 9.1 billion cruzeiros; this year, through 15 November, sales volume had been 13.1 billion cruzeiros, split almost evenly between the domestic and foreign markets.

Within the company it is believed that 1983 will be the year of recovery. About the middle of that year the T-27 aircraft will be making its first flight. Called the Tucano, it is a turboprop for military training that already has a contract with the Air Ministry for 170 units. According to Ozilio Silva, this will be EMBRAER's major export product, almost without competition abroad, in that those whose features are most similar to it, the Pilatus and the Beechcraft Mentor, are older.

NATIONAL STUDENTS UNION HOLDS CONGRESS IN CABO FRIO

10,000 Students Expected

Sao Paulo O ESTADO DE SAO PAULO in Portuguese 29 Oct 81 p 12

[Text] The 33rd Congress of the National Students Union --UNE--should gather nearly 10,000 persons, between delegates and participants, as of 12 November in the cities of Araruama and Cabo Frio, region of the Rio de Janeiro Lakes. The students have the support of the prefectures of the region, which have already provided shelters and buildings for the meetings for the four days of the gathering.

Homage to composer Vinicios de Moraes, one of the authors of the organizational hymn, will be paid during the opening of the Congress. According to the organizers, all Brazilian composers who were partnered with Vinicius in making music will be present for the presentation of a performance.

On the 12th and 13th, the groups of delegates will begin the sessions which will deal with the subjects "Situation of the Brazilian University and its Alternatives," National Political Situation," "International Situation," "Departments of the UNE" and "Statutes and Letter of Principles." On the 14th and 15th, general assemblies will be held.

Several parallel activities are also scheduled such as competitions, handicraft fairs and minishows.

The 33rd Congress will discuss the proposals for restriction of the rates of increases for private universities in 1982, increases in scholarships, also for 1981; participation by the organization in discussions by the Ministry of Education and Culture [MEC] on next year's budget; election of rectors and directors of state university schools and participation by the students by at least one-fifth in the collegiate bodies.

Criticisms

"The crisis of the student movement could become a defeat if the bureaucratic, boastful and authoritarian orientation of the UNE continues," says the president of Minas Gerais State Student Union (UEE-MG), Americo Antunes, and is the first of the subjects to be discussed at the 27th Congress of Minas Gerais Students, which should gather between 200 and 300 delegates in the Law School on 31 October and 1 and 2 November as a preparation for the UNE Congress.

On the item "Evaluation of the Student Movement," the UEE-MG will make a proposal for the innovation of "the practice of the movement with more democratic interaction," according to Americo Antunes, who argued that "the difference between the UEE-MG and the UNE is due to the fact that we consider the movement to be in crisis, with the students discrediting and disbelieving the leaders of the organizations, while the UNE boasts that the movement is victorious."

Congress Is Initiated

Rio de Janeiro O GLOBO in Portuguese 12 Nov 81 p 12

[Text] The 33rd National Student Congress sponsored by the UNE begins today with a meeting of all participants at the Hermenegildo Barcellos Stadium in Arraial do Cabo, Cabo Frio. Its subsequent meetings will be held simultaneously in Cabo Frio and Araruama with the support of the prefectures of both cities. Five thousand students will be housed in Cabo Frio and 5,000 in Araruama, with plenary sessions scheduled in both cities for discussions of the following subjects: "Free Elections," "Cost of Living," "Better Educational Conditions" and "Unemployment and Inflation."

The Congress, whose opening will be attended by the president of the Workers Party [PT], Luiz Inacio da Silva, "Lula," and the president of the PMDB (Brazilian Democratic Movement Party), Deputy Ulisses Guimaraes, will be closed Sunday in Cabo Frio at the Hermenegildo Barcellos Stadium, at which time the subjects discussed will be approved and the guest authorities will speak. The other prefects of the municipalities of the Lakes Region who support the gathering should attend.

Like the prefect of Cabo Frio, Altevir Pinto Barreto, the prefect of Araruama, placed the buildings of the municipal schools at the disposal of the sponsors of the Congress for the housing of the participants who come from all parts of the country, also granting the use of the kitchens of those establishments for the preparation of meals. The food will be supplied by several commercial enterprises who agreed to support the gathering in response to a request by the prefects.

Candidates Deny Charges

Sao Paulo O ESTADO DE SAO PAULO in Portuguese 14 Nov 81 p 14

[Text] Arguing that it is "an advanced form of democracy such as that used in some countries, the United States, for example, the two candidates to the UNE presidency, Francisco Javier Alfaia of Bahia and Luis Alencar Furtado of Pernambuco, yesterday answered the charge that the present system for selecting new leaders for the organization is an indirect election--because it is done by delegates--which would be a contradiction with respect to the principles they defend on the political field of a free and direct selection of candidates to elected positions.

According to Alfaia and Alencar Furtado, the fact that the new slate to be voted on in a Congress such as the one being held in Cabo Frio, where 2,500 participants face problems of organization and housing, with many of them sleeping in bathrooms and overcrowded classrooms, is an example of advanced democracy because this is what happens in the United States where the president is elected by a college. "The only thing we did," intervened Aldo Rabelo, now president of the UNE, "was to make sure we impugned all the delegates who were not elected by the students of their schools and no fewer than 16 of them were impugned because the records of their elections showed fraud. Moreover," he emphasized, "an election in a Congress is more democratic because political discussions become more in depth."

The discussions promoted yesterday on the second day of the UNE assembly dealt with a subject considered the most controversial up to now by the student sector: The selection of the new leadership for the organization and the support which each candidate receives from clandestine leftist parties. Although the subject aroused general attention, the presentation and defense of points of view took place in an almost veiled manner. Francisco Javier Alfaia--virtually considered the next UNE president for the next period, who has the support of the PC do B [Communist Party of Brazil], and Luis Alencar Furtado, who is supported by the MR-8 [Revolutionary Movement-8], particularly avoided making comment on their commitment to political factions, explaining only that the election depends on the votes of the delegates of other student factions. On this UNE President Aldo Rabelo declared: "We do not question the support each candidate may have from any party, clandestine or not, because the UNE does not make any type of discrimination."

FUTURE COURSE OF LABOR UNION MOVEMENT DEBATED IN BRASILIA

Brasilia CORREIO BRAZILIENSE in Portuguese 16 Nov 81 p 6

[Text] The three main currents of the Brazilian labor-union movement will be debating their ideas today beginning at 1900 hours in the Brasilia Cultural Center. Luis Inacio da Silva (Lula); the president of the Santos Metalworkers Union, Arnaldo Goncalves; and the president of the National Farmworkers Confederation (CONTAG), Jose Francisco da Silva, will be discussing the direction of the Brazilian labor-union movement, the Single Workers Federation [CUT], the general strike against unemployment and holding the National Congress of Workers in August 1982.

Lula, Goncalves and Jose Francisco are members of the National Commission for a Single Workers Confederation [Pro-CUT], elected at the recent National Conference of the Working Class (CONCLAT). Lula, president of the Workers Party and former president of the Sao Bernardo do Campo Metalworkers Union, is one of the leaders of the National Coordination of Popular and Labor Movements (ANAMPOS) that includes labor-union leaders connected with the PT [Workers Party], PDT [Democratic Labor Party], some from the PMDB [Brazilian Democratic Mobilization Party] and others without party ties. This labor-union current is opposed to that led by Arnaldo Goncalves known as "Labor Union Unity," which includes labor-union leaders connected with the PMDB. Jose Francisco leads the group of rural labor leaders closest to the CONTAG.

At the CONCLAT, which was held last August, the CONTAG leaders established a position equidistant from the two other currents until the moment when the National Commission for the CUT was to be elected: Goncalves and Jose Francisco are on Slate 1 ("Labor Union Unity"), whereas Lula proposed Slate 2 ("CUT for the Rank and File"). As the plenum of over 5,000 delegates was divided and it was impossible to count the votes, the two slates eventually reached a compromise.

Unity

Lula, Goncalves and Jose Francisco were important elements to assure unity of the three currents and prevent CONCLAT from ending with a split in the Brazilian labor-union movement. They are now working to remain unified in the work of the Pro-CUT commission to assure holding the National Workers Congress in 1982. The National Pro-CUT Commission met all day yesterday at the CONTAG headquarters and will have an open meeting at 1300 hours today with the caravans of labor leaders who came from several states to decide what to do about the government's failure to respond to the demands submitted to Planalto Palace on 1 October.

The demands approved at the CONCLAT were registered at Planalto Palace after Acting President Aureliano Chaves refused to admit the labor-union delegation that came to deliver the document. According to the CONCLAT resolutions, 16 November [today] is the deadline for the government to answer the demands. "On that day," according to the resolutions, "the workers will meet to decide on the procedure for calling a general strike."

At the evening's discussion, the main topic will certainly be the general strike, a proposal suggested by a group of Sao Bernardo do Campo labor unions and announced by Lula on 1 May. Lula and Goncalves have different views about the general strike and Jose Francisco has not yet expressed himself explicitly about the proposal. During the discussion, sponsored by the Pro-CUT and by the Brasilia Interunion Front, the official publication of CONCLAT will be launched: "All About CONCLAT: The Road to a Single Federation," which contains the resolutions and report of the meeting.

HEAVY INVESTMENTS IN AEROSPACE INDUSTRY FORESEEN IN '80's

Rio de Janeiro JORNAL DO BRASIL in Portuguese 23 Oct 81 p 15

[Text] Research and development of the Brazilian aerospace complex will receive large investments in the decade of the 80's and for this purpose Minister of Air Delio Jardim de Mattos called a meeting of the Air Force High Command in Sao Jose dos Campos for a discussion of the new guidelines of the Basic Plan.

Sources of the Aerospace Technology Center--CTA--the agency responsible for the planning and execution of the research and development policy in the Ministry of Air, said the meeting was for consolidating the government policy which decided an expansion of the aerospace complex to be the first priority, since the country became self-sufficient in the sector and exports have a favorable total in the trade balance.

Imports: Zero

Thanks to the CTA, the Brazilian Air Force [FAB] has almost 70 percent nationally built components in its aircraft and equipment. According to the same sources, the growth of the sector in this decade should be even greater than that of the last decade due to the actions taken in policy in the area. In 1974, nearly 740 aircraft were imported, however, 6 years later, imports were reduced to practically zero. Only the large aircraft of the commercial companies will have to be purchased abroad in coming years, while at the same time there will be a constant modernization of the FAB equipment provided by national industries only.

CTA sources believe the consolidation of the Brazilian aerospace industry is an undeniable fact since now, despite the economic situation the country is undergoing, our technology is moving toward a definitive consolidation due to the efforts by private and government organizations. All these factors lead one to believe that constant investments in the sector will not be halted or reduced.

GERMAN FIRMS TO HELP BUILD SUBMARINE AS OF 1984

Brasilia CORREIO BRAZILIENSE in Portuguese 29 Oct 81 p 9

[Text] As of 1984 Brazil should begin construction of 1KL 209 submarines at the Rio de Janeiro Naval Shipyard. These submarines will be built with help of Germany. This agreement will in no way interfere with, or use, the nuclear technology agreement signed in 1975, which includes the construction of a nuclear powered submarine.

The Brazilian Navy has already requested from Germany the major details on the plans for a submarine offered to this country. That submarine, however, is known to be conventional and very important points such as the national construction of equipment, financing and the question of payments will be studied.

Other countries in addition to Germany offered to produce submarines in Brazil but the decision on which of the plans to be used still depends on several questions asked of Germany.

The agreement for the construction of the submarine, which will be completely nationally built without any foreign components, involves between 30 and 40 German firms and the Brazilian Navy. The main contractors are Ferrostaal, which will transfer the concepts and the basic plan in addition to the technology for the manufacture of antimagnetic steel for preventing sonar from detecting the submarine, and the Howasdtwerk, a Kiel shipyard, which will transfer the know-how for the construction itself. The Varta Batterie A.G. transferred the technology for the manufacture of submarine batteries to its Brazilian subsidiary, Saturnia, several months ago.

STEEL PRODUCTION DROPS IN FIRST 10 MONTHS OF 1981

Sao Paulo O ESTADO DE SAO PAULO in Portuguese 7 Nov 81 p 24

[Text] National steel production, measured in raw steel, from January to October of this year reached 11,176,000 tons, a decline of 12.2 percent by comparison with a like period last year. In October 1,022,900 tons were produced, compared to 992,800 in September and 1,351,000 in October 1980.

The numbers of the preliminary statistical report of the National Nonferrous Metals and Steel Council (CONSIDER) indicate that in the area of primary metals the overall results were also negative. From January to October, 212,900 tons of aluminum were produced, a decline of 2 percent by comparison with an identical period in 1980; 30,257 tons of lead (down 19 percent); 6,315 tons of tin (down 16.1 percent), 1,957 tons of nickel (down 7.5 percent) and 74,429 tons of zinc, the only metal which showed an increase by comparison with the first ten months of 1980 (up 17.8 percent).

The production of rolled steel by October was 9,360,600 tons, 12 percent less than during the first 10 mmonths of 1980, of which 5,019,400 tons were flat sheets and 4,341,200 tons of shaped sheets. In October alone, 865,600 tons of sheets were produced, 25.4 percent less than in October of 1980, but more than the 808,600 tons produced in September of this year.

The large mills of SIDERBRAS [Brazilian Iron and Steel Corporation], a holding company of the state iron and steel industry, had negative results from January through October by comparison with last year. COSIPA [Sao Paulo Iron and Steel Company] produced 2,081,200 tons of raw steel during the period, 15.2 percent less than in 1980, while the National Iron and Steel Company produced 1,959,500 tons (down 4.3 percent) and USIMINAS [Minas Gerais Iron and Steel Mills, Inc] produced 1,965,300 tons (down 27.2 percent).

Of the 41 iron and steel companies existing in the country, according to the CONSIDER report, only the following companies had a production higher than that of last year: Acesita, controlled by the Bank of Brazil, up 14.6 percent; Dedini, up 23.9 percent; Eletrometal, up 4.6 percent; Fi-el, up 5.1 percent; Itaunense, up 12.7 percent; Mafersa, up 2 percent; Usiba, up .9 percent; Vibasa, up 197.2 percent and Cosinor, up 248.4 percent [All expansions unknown].

STEEL COMPANY SUPPLIES MOST OF COUNTRY'S DEMAND

National Production

Santiago EL MERCURIO in Spanish 8 Nov 81 p B1

[Text] The national steel market, represented by the Pacific Steel Company (CAP), experienced an increase in the productivity of national iron and steel processes during 1980 and the first 8 months of 1981.

There was also a rise in the importation of steel products of different qualities, similar to what is produced in Chile, or high-technology products, utilized especially in the manufacture of electrical and electronic appliances.

Between January and August of this year, steel production reached 364,073 tons of finished products, which represents an increase of 5.3 percent over the same period of 1980.

In 1980 CAP activities earned profits of $26,118,000, which indicates its growth within the national economy.

CAP Operations

Basically the Pacific Steel Company engages in two activities: steel production and iron mining, with deposits in the El Romeral, El Algarrobo and Santa Fe mines.

Huachipato Steel Production

This plant, located on San Vicente Bay, northwest of Concepcion, Region VIII, has an installed capacity to produce 800,000 tons of cast steel a year.

The Huachipato factory is an "integrated plant," which means that steel is made from iron ore and is processed into finished goods that meet about 85 percent of national demand for elements such as bars, plates, shapes, pipes, etc.

In 1980 the production of steel ingots reached 694,785 tons, all of which was sent to the domestic market.

Although Huachipato operated at full capacity, the growth of internal demand for steel products, partly due to construction, was greater than the supply. Thus it was necessary to import about 16 percent of finished steel products.

On the domestic market, CAP markets basically two kinds of steel products: plates and bars.

Among the plate products are thick and thin plates; in general, whatever is used to protect a surface (for example in the manufacture of closed seam products).

The bar products include cylindrical objects such as round bars for concrete, straight or in coils, bars for structural use, thick, flat, square and angle bars. These products are also used in the manufacture of wire, nails, screws, etc.

Mining Deposits

The El Romeral deposit in Coquimbo produces an ore with an iron content of 62 to 65 percent. Most of it is exported, although it also serves as a source of iron ore for Huachipato.

The Atacama mining deposits of El Algarrobo have an iron content of 57 percent. Other deposits are the Santa Fe deposits in Atacama, and the Antofagasta deposits. Their production has dropped because the ore obtained there has a high phosphorous and sulfur content.

Treatment of Ore

In order to eliminate the phosphorous and sulfur impurities of the iron ore, CAP has built a "refining" plant in Huasco (pelletizing). This plant supplies five major Japanese steel plants.

Steel Company Investments

Santiago EL MERCURIO in Spanish 8 Nov 81 p B1

[Text] The Pacific Steel Company believes that growing demand for steel products in the next 5 years will reach a total of 1 million tons. At present it could meet 80 percent of that demand.

To increase production, the company has considered various investment projects in steel processing as well as mining.

Investment Projects

In steelmaking, the company has plans to build a coke plant with an annual production capacity of 560,000 tons. Imported coal will be used until new deposits are discovered in this country in sufficient quantities and with the required quality.

The present coke plant's production falls year after year, making it necessary to import about 40 percent of the coke needed by the Huachipato steel plant from Japan.

Another investment considered by CAP is the installation of continuous casting equipment in the Huachipato plant. In addition to raising the capacity to produce semi-finished goods, this would reduce petroleum consumption.

With regard to mining, the pellets plant and the port of Guayacan are to be expanded. Thus, larger ships will have access to the port, and freight costs, particularly to Japan, can thus be reduced.

GOVERNMENT INTERVENES IN TROUBLED FINANCIAL INSTITUTIONS

Economic Implications

Santiago EL MERCURIO in Spanish 5 Nov 81 p B1

[Text] The recent measures adopted jointly by the Central Bank and the Superintendency of Banks to intervene in the operation of eight financial institutions involve significant economic repercussions that must be analyzed carefully.

The consequences stem from the decision by economic officials to provide a government guarantee to back up all the institutions' earnings, savings and deposits. The intervention is the result of the fact that those entities, due to "deficiencies of administration," do not have enough resources to be able to return such funds to depositors. Therefore, the state will make up the difference, probably through the Central Bank or the State Bank.

The situation today is different from that of the interventions that took place 4 years ago, since at that time authorities agreed to return savings only up to a specified amount, expressed in Units of Development, in order to protect small savers.

However, in the case that concerns us today, the state guarantee seems to be unlimited, according to official statements. While the superintendent of banks indicated that "the return of savings is completely guaranteed," it was also stated that "the Central Bank of Chile will continue to lend these institutions the financial support that is necessary."

Need to Issue Currency

So far the public has not been informed of the amount of funds economic authorities must spend to cover the losses of the banks and institutions that have been the subject of intervention, and this lack of information has once again sparked many rumors about the matter.

In any case, it seems clear that the Central Bank will have to issue more currency.

The printing of more money and the consequent expansion of credit will translate in the short term into an increased liquidity in the economy. It will also help curb the upward trend in interest rates.

It is well known that in a small, open economy with a fixed exchange rate, as in Chile's case, printing more money does not result in more inflation, but in the loss of international currency reserves.

The excess liquidity cannot, in general, affect the rise of domestic prices significantly, because they basically depend on international prices. But it can mean a short-term rise in prices for those goods that are not exported or imported.

At any rate, a major part of this increased liquidity will translate into purchases of imported goods, which will erode the international reserves built up at the Central Bank.

Bank Loan Restrictions

In order to prevent the printing of more currency from having a strong influence on domestic credit, the Central Bank has decided to raise the marginal cash reserve requirement in order "to increase it in all deposits and earnings in currency, whether demand or time deposits, above the average balance that was shown in October 1981." The new reserve requirement, according to the official gazette of last Tuesday, will be 20 percent, as opposed to 10 percent earlier.

A higher cash reserve requirement tends to limit the availability of credit that would result from issuing more currency.

Similarly, the measure reduces the risk the bank runs by making financial institutions keep a higher percentage of their deposits and earnings in cash.

In any case, it should be stressed that the macroeconomic impact of this situation will depend on the amount of money that is issued. Apparently, part of it has already been issued recently, so it is not expected that the rest will represent a significant percentage of the money in circulation.

Central Bank President's Comments

Santiago EL MERCURIO in Spanish 7 Nov 81 p A1

[Text] Central Bank President Sergio de la Cuadra indicated yesterday that the purpose of the intervention in the eight financial institutions "is to place the banks in a situation of high administrative efficiency, but to end the intervention later on, as deemed necessary; if not, these banks can be sold in the future."

The president made this statement when approached by reporters after a meeting with Minister of Finance Sergio de Castro. The meeting lasted from about 1000 to 1200 hours.

When asked about the amount that the Central Bank and the State Bank have turned over to the institutions in question, he said only: "I have no figure or amount."

In answer to another question about the effect the intervention could have abroad, he said: "The effect this could have is to change a little the concept people have about the professionalism of Chilean bankers."

He claimed that the intervention is not contrary to the economic policy being followed in the country, given that "it is a matter of maintaining that economic policy. This is consistent because it is pragmatic. The economic policy here is not dogmatic; that should be made very clear," he stressed.

Regarding a possible effect on the flow of foreign credit, he stated: "That is an evaluation that foreign bankers will have to make. I am not in a position to do so."

As to whether there are other financial institutions with problems, he stated, "just these eight have provisional administrators. Otherwise, they would also be in the club."

When asked to what extent the state will finance this kind of problem, he replied that "the decision was made in eight institutions where provisional administrators were named. That is the extent to which the state has decided to go."

He added later that this was not a general policy: "It is a case that is being dealt with within the limited context of eight institutions, the ones that had administrative problems."

PABLO RODRIGUEZ ADVOCATES EMERGENCY POWERS FOR PRESIDENT

Santiago LA TERCERA DE LA HORA in Spanish 15 Nov 81 p 3

[Article by Pablo Rodriguez Grez: "Toward a National Emergency Plan"]

[Text] Unfortunately, the historical process is not as smoothly flowing and regular as one would want it to be. Nations do not always progress at the same rate of speed nor do they cross paths free of obstacles. Almost without exception, all the countries in the world are exposed to sudden attacks, crises, disturbances and setbacks. And this is all the more the case for those peoples that have — as is now happening in Chile — set themselves economic, political and social goals.

There can be no doubt that our government is facing an increasingly more difficult situation. In the economic domain we are suffering the effects of the worldwide recession, aggravated by the rigidity of a model that is not being adapted to the new situation. The latest occurrences reveal the fact that production activities are experiencing a dangerous depression. The intervention of banks and financial institutions will be of no avail if the root of the problem lies in the lack of resources of the private sector, whose indebtedness increasingly exceeds its ability to pay. Everything seems to indicate that, if the policies that have been applied up to now are maintained, the situation will become more critical, bringing with it unsuspected social consequences.

On the other hand, the reappearance of terrorism, evidenced by the attack the chief justice of the Supreme Court was the victim of and by a frustrated attempt on the life of Foreign Relations Minister Rene Rojas Galdames, demonstrates that this regime's secular enemies will lose no opportunity to deliberately increase the magnitude of the problems and take advantage of a negative economic situation.

These facts reveal a perilous combination of circumstances that can go on complicating the situation until it is out of control.

Hence the necessity of as soon as possible implementing an emergency plan like the one that should have been put into effect at the time of the military insurrection in 1973. In this situation the president has a decisive role. He must be invested with full power — within the framework of the Constitution — to avoid subsequent difficulties that would of necessity arise if the exercise of his command is watered down or his powers diminished. Corrective measures for the economy cannot be put off, nor much less so can we allow ourselves to feel — even if we are mistaken in so doing — that there is an economic team which operates on the periphery of presidential directives and instructions. The same thing happens in politics. Maintenance of the moratorium on party activity must be jealously guarded and more emphasis must be laid on repression of the terrorist centers that have sprung up again thanks to the laxity of the civilian population and the institutional progress experienced these past few years.

Most of the extremists involved in these adventures have reentered Chile after the sentences imposed on them by the courts were commuted to exile (expulsion from Chile). This is demonstrated by the fact that Marxist activists may not be staying out of the country as was supposed and that, well trained and supplied by the international communist movement, they may be returning to sow violence and crime among us. They regard their prospects as encouraging due to the progress we have experienced in terms of human rights, none of which, as we know, are respected by the terrorists when they eliminate or massacre their victims. A setback in such a delicate area is certainly not a favorable development, but a general awareness which facilitates the action of the security agencies, the members of which daily risk their lives to preserve public peace and quiet, is.

During the past few years some national sectors have gone through a drunken orgy of success and a lack of anxiety over politics. The million-dollar deals, the wave of import items, easy access to foreign credit, indifference to the social cost of the experiment, exaggerated consumer materialism and the displeasure with which every critical argument is viewed have been creating a complacent attitude that does not appear to be moved by anything. If necessary regulatory intervention by the government is demanded, those who propose such action are immediately accused of being covert or disguised socialists. If the disproportionate growth of "economic groups" is pointed out, they reply that there is no other alternative to statism. If concern is expressed over the influence these groups will in future exert on political power, they counter with the argument that imperialism's great resources were of no avail when the big copper mining industry was nationalized and that the money of the old landowning classes did not stop the process of agrarian reform.

But the confused propagandists of ultraliberalism do not yet comprehend that the old Chilean system of democracy was slowly eroded by all these factors which point to a common denominator: abuse and preponderance of power. Paradoxically, those chiefly responsible for the present difficulties — or the dangerous increase in the magnitude of same — advocate a political opening which, if it were carried out, would first of all result in burying themselves.

We must react to this and there is still time to do so. It will probably be too late tomorrow. Major crises lose no time in manifesting themselves in all their magnitude. We must adopt protective measures to keep them from attacking head on and openly.

Even though it may mean an institutional setback and postponement of the progressive steps that have been planned, a national emergency plan is the best way out of this threatening situation.

'MERCURIO' PRAISES GOVERNMENT TREASURY REFORMS

Santiago EL MERCURIO in Spanish 12 Nov 81 p A3

[Editorial]

[Text] The modernizing advance of the present government is gradually extending into all sectors. In this way it is correcting practices that burden an economy which is trying to grow by utilizing the abilities and initiative of individuals.

In the final analysis, development comes from the people, but sometimes their abilities conflict with procedures that enormously limit opportunities for growth. This was without a doubt the case with almost the entire fiscal apparatus when this government took over, particularly in the Internal Revenue Service and the Treasury Department, which have been gradually evolving with the aim of turning themselves into sufficiently more active departments that are better integrated into the foremost sector of the economy.

Two recent reforms should be added to the long list of modernizations in this domain. One is the fact that the Internal Revenue Service has authorized 18 banks and 6 finance companies to act as representatives of the Treasury Department in the collection of all types of tax liabilities and the other is the elimination of all municipal treasury offices, whose functions will in future be assumed by the municipalities.

These measures will provide a certain amount of relief for the fiscal apparatus, a cedentralization of duties in accordance with the subsidiary role of the government, an improvement of the Treasury Department's tax-collecting function and, lastly, an increase in the productivity of the economy which, in the final analysis, is the chief source of growth and development.

The collection of taxes by the banks, replacing the treasuries, is a major step forward, chiefly because it will facilitate payment for taxpayers. We cannot lose sight of the fact that the fundamental issue is serving the public. The transfer of certain Treasury functions to the municipalities and the disappearance of the municipal treasuries should be viewed in the same manner, without affecting our recognition of the fact that a special concern on the part of the officials involved is necessary, one which, moreover, is provided for in the reforms we are today commenting on.

Over the past few years the Internal Revenue Service has visibly modernized its operations and we are beginning to observe the effects of the same in the Treasury Department. Interesting advances can be seen in the latter, but we will without a doubt have to apply much more drive. This department still seems to be somewhat exaggerated in size and it is possible that almost all its functions could, on the one hand, be performed by the commercial banks and, on the other, by the Internal Revenue Service itself, the National Bank or some other state banking agent.

We must not so easily forget what an enormous government apparatus has meant for the country and what is still important in making rapid progress. Chile has developed little and, with constant inflation and trade crises, for just this reason. The social system was completely distorted by exaggerated statism and the same thing happened with our political institutions, which little by little ceased to be free and democratic.

It will be very difficult for the country to achieve economic, social and political stability and increased revenue unless it continues to follow a policy of modernization and reduction in the size of the government apparatus, which was the chief cause of our most recent crisis. Some people, who think that the government ought to call a halt to its modernization program and the transfer of functions to the private sector, do not seem to understand this. If this were to happen, we would be mortgaging our future development for stability in addition to losing the chance to consolidate a new set of modern and progressive institutions.

The recent reforms in the collection of taxes and Treasury Department services indicate that the government is still moving in the right direction and this is their chief importance.

RETURN OF MARXIST TERRORISTS DENOUNCED

Santiago EL MERCURIO in Spanish 13 Nov 81 p A3

[Editorial]

[Text] Once again, the public has been shocked by acts committed by extreme-Left terrorists, the latest of which resulted in the loss of the lives of four of them when they were surprised right in the middle of preparations for an attack on the home of Foreign Relations Minister Rene Rojas Galdames.

A few days before they had shot up the car of Supreme Court Chief Justice Israel Borquez Montero, who was fortunately not too seriously wounded.

The explosion and subsequent fire that destroyed the vehicle three of those who plotted the first of those attacks were in left their bodies unrecognizable, so that it was impossible to identify them or determine their criminal and political records. But the fourth, who resisted the police from outside the destroyed car, was specifically identified as a man with a record of extremist activities who had first been sentenced to a term in prison under the arms control law and whose sentence was then commuted to exile, which enabled him to go to Belgium, a European country which, in the name of a policy of human rights supposedly ignored in Chile due to the fact that it has imposed sentences on individuals like the one referred to, gave him shelter in 1977. However, this extremist secretly returned to Chile and engaged in terrorist activities without even informing his relatives of his presence here, according to what they say.

Two facts are worth noting in connection with this. The first is that once again we are faced with individuals who have been exiled — voluntarily, because of a court judgment or due to a government decision — who return solely and exclusively to attempt to commit crimes against law and order, public safety or the lives of individuals in Chile. The second is that a member of the irregular Marxist armed forces, in existence before 1973 and referred to as either the MIR [Movement of the Revolutionary Left] or the GAP [Group of Personal Friends] or variously named communist and socialist "commands" whose objective was to prepare the armed path to socialism under Mr Allende's government with the protection and approval of the latter, has also recently been involved.

The two above-noted facts ought to provide those movements or organizations claiming to be partisans of domestic peace and harmony with food for thought, those which have adopted as their own banner the so-called "Operation Return," without realizing that through it they are placing the lives of other human beings in great danger, since those who may be called on to return left the country for good reasons in the public interest and are in most cases dangerous terrorists or at least partisans of political violence and the search for armed solutions for Chile or those involving force. The exceptions to this rule are rarer than those organizations that criticize the practice of banishment or exile generally suppose.

The fact that terrorists captured or killed are almost invariably old hands at this kind of work shows that this is a large but fragile group of militants, since it involves the same elements trained under the egis of the ideology of violence of the extreme Left. They have no replacement generations and, to the extent that they may be neutralized or that their return may be blocked, public safety will gradually be secured until this true cancer our society has inherited from its Marxist experiment disappears.

BRIEFS

QUAKE HITS CENTRAL REGION--A strong and prolonged earthquake shook the area between Coquimbo and Valdivia at 12:30 AM today, causing panic among the populace. In Santiago there was minor damage such as fallen cornices or collapsed interior walls of old buildings. There were several slight injuries in Valparaiso and Los Andes. It appears that the epicenter of the quake was the marine depression opposite La Ligua, 30 miles from the coast. The temblor ranked a 7 on the seismic scale in Valparaiso. There was minor damage and great panic among residents, who filled the streets. On 15 October, also shortly after midnight, a similar quake struck the same part of the country. It was reported that there was a prolonged power failure in Los Andes. Some blackouts were reported in small sections of Santiago, but they were taken care of in a matter of minutes. The most terrified residents of Santiago were, as is to be expected, those living in tall buildings. Scantily clad people were seen running into the streets in terror, while their shouts and cries mingled with the noise of breaking glass. The Office of Emergency, in an official report submitted early this morning, listed the seismic intensities of the quake as follows: Coquimbo, 5 to 6; La Serena, 5; Valparaiso, 7; Llayllay, 6 to 7; Los Andes, 4; Santiago, 6; San Antonio, 6 to 7; Rancagua, 5 to 6; Curico, 4 to 5; Talca, 4 to 5; San Fernando, 5 to 6; Constitucion, 4 to 5; Concepcion, 2. COMMUNIQUE ISSUED AT END OF CTC USSR VISIT

Havana TRABAJADORES in Spanish 17 Oct 81 p 6

[Text] At the invitation of the AUCCTU [All-Union Central Council of Trade Unions], a delegation from the Central Organization of Cuban Trade Unions (CTC) paid an official and friendly visit to the Soviet Union from 18 to 14 October 1981. The Cuban delegation was headed by Roberto Veiga, secretary general of the CTC and acting member of the Politburo of the Communist Party of Cuba.

During the stay of the CTC delegation in the USSR, it held talks with an AUCCTU delegation headed by its chairman, Aleksey I. Shibayev. During the talks, which took place in an atmosphere of friendship and absolute mutual understanding, the two parties exchanged information on the work of the Soviet and Cuban trade unions in mobilizing the workers for the fulfillment of the resolutions of the 26th CPSU Congress and the Second Congress of the Communist Party of Cuba. The status and the prospects for subsequent development and deepening of the fraternal links and multifaceted collaboration between the trade unions in the USSR and Cuba were studied. Current problems in the international trade union movement were discussed. The delegations stressed that the close collaboration between the communist parties of the Soviet Union and Cuba is of decisive importance for the continued strengthening of the friendship between the Soviet and Cuban peoples, based on the principles of Marxism-Leninism and socialist internationalism. This friendship is the most valuable heritage of the peoples of these two countries, who are linked by the unity of their socialist systems and their roles in the building of socialism and communism.

The view was unanimous that relations between the workers and the trade unions of the Soviet Union and Cuba are strengthening and becoming deeper with every passing year. Consistent with the Soviet-Cuban declaration, the consolidation of peace and international security are being pursued for the good of the peoples of both nations and in the interests of the cohesion and power of the countries in the socialist community.

The two trade union organizations are determined to pursue the collaboration between the trade unions of the USSR and Cuba tirelessly, doing everything necessary to strengthen the indestructible Soviet-Cuban friendship, as well as channeling their efforts toward the achievement of unity in the international trade union movement, on an anti-imperialist and class basis.

To this end, the AUCCTU and the CTC will deepen their cooperation on all levels, will hold consultations on current problems in the trade union activities in these countries and on various aspects of the international trade union movement. They came out in favor of holding regular meetings with the participation of representatives of the trade union organizations in the two brotherly countries, of great importance to the development of bilateral and multilateral cooperation and to increasing the contribution of the trade unions to the implementation of the Complex Program for the Socialist Economic Integration of the Member Nations of the CEMA.

The AUCCTU and the CTC stressed that they will continue to contribute in every possible way to increasing the prestige and the influence of the WFTU, which has consistently spoken from class positions with regard to the current problems of the modern world and serves as the center for the consolidation of all the progressive forces in the international trade union movement. The two union organizations will make every effort to contribute to the success of the 10th World Trade Union Congress to be held in the capital of the Republic of Cuba, the first socialist country in the Western Hemisphere, and which will draft the program of action for the class trade union movement for the 1980's.

Both parties expressed their concern about the deterioration in the international situation caused by the efforts of the most reactionary imperialist circles to halt the process of detente.

The trade unions in the USSR and Cuba energetically condemned the NATO plans to place new medium-range American missiles in Western Europe, as well as the decision of the U.S. government to undertake full-scale production of neutron bombs.

The delegations voiced high praise for the peace-loving foreign policy of the Soviet Union, the Republic of Cuba and other nations in the socialist community, and expressed their absolute support of the Peace Program for the 1980's set forth by the 26th CPSU Congress, outlining a concrete path toward improving the situation in the world, limiting the armaments race, and consolidating trust, mutual understanding and cooperation among all nations.

On behalf of the workers and trade unions in their countries, the two organizations announced that they will continue to contribute to the strengthening of peace, the elimination of the threat of nuclear war, the consistent development of interaction with various detachments of the international trade union movement, on the basis of joint actions in defense of the socioeconomic interests of the workers and to unmask the propaganda campaign of slander being pursued in the West against the socialist nations in order to conceal the militaristic intentions of the imperialists.

The Soviet and Cuban trade unions firmly condemned the provocative message sent by the Polish Solidarity Congress to the peoples of Eastern Europe, based on a distortion of the facts and the desire to disorient world public opinion. The AUCCTU and the CTC hope that the workers class and other healthy and progressive forces in Poland can defend the gains of socialism and rescue the country from its crisis. The two trade unions stated that they will continue to use every means to provide support to the workers class, the branch trade unions in Poland, and their coordination commission.

The two organizations voiced their satisfaction with the increasing role of the movement of nonaligned nations in the common struggle against imperialism, colonialism, neocolonialism and racism, against the imperialist policy of aggression and interference in the domestic affairs of nations, and for a solid peace and international security, the consolidation of national independence, and the establishment of economic relations with equal rights for all nations.

The two parties emphasized that the Soviet and Cuban trade unions stand firmly with the struggle of the workers class and all the workers in the capitalist countries for their economic and social rights, for expanded democratic freedoms, and for the limiting of the power of the monopolies.

They voiced their support of all of the revolutionary and progressive forces in Asia, Africa and Latin America which are struggling for freedom, democracy and social progress and against the imperialists and the reactionaries.

The Soviet and Cuban trade unions demanded a halt to the imperialist policy of economic blockade and interference in the domestic affairs of the Republic of Cuba, as pursued by the United States, and they demanded the elimination of the U.S. naval base established on Cuban territory against the will of the people.

The workers and the trade unions of the USSR and the Republic of Cuba hailed the victory of the peoples of Nicaragua and Grenada, who have effected revolutionary transformations in their countries. They stand with the struggling people of El Salvador, the patriots in Chile, Guatemala, Uruguay, Paraguay and the other Latin American countries who are fighting courageously against fascist and reactionary regimes.

The AUCCTU and the CTC stress the importance of developing cooperation among trade unions with different orientations in the Latin American region through conferences, seminars and talks on socioeconomic matters involving the trade unions. Both parties are determined to support the unity of action among the workers and trade unions on this continent in the struggle against the forces of reaction and oppression, in defense of national sovereignty and for the strengthening of political and economic independence. To this end they will channel their efforts toward increasing the role and influence of the Latin American Workers Permanent Conference for Trade Union Unity.

Both parties voiced their support for the struggle of the peoples of Vietnam, Laos and Kampuchea in defense of the territorial integrity of their countries against the constant provocative actions on the part of imperialists and hegemonic forces. They condemned the expansionist policy of the leaders of the People's Republic of China, allied, on the basis of anti-Sovietism, with the most aggressive world reactionary circles.

The workers and the trade unions of the USSR and Cuba consistently support the Afghan people, who are defending the conquests of the April 1978 revolution, and they demand that the undeclared war being waged by the imperialists and their allies against the Democratic Republic of Afgharistan cease immediately.

The AUCCTU and the CTC urge a just and general settlement of the Near Eastern situation, with the participation of the legitimate representatives of the Arab people of Palestine. Both parties condemned the stepped-up Israeli aggression against Lebanon and other Arab nations, pursued with the direct support of the United States.

The two trade union organizations reiterated their readiness to continue to support the self-sacrificing struggle of the people of Namibia and the aboriginal population of South Africa against racism. They indicated their solidarity with the People's Republic of Angola and the People's Republic of Mozambique, which reject the aggressive incursions by the Republic of South Africa.

The AUCCTU delegation stressed the fact that the Cuban workers, headed by the Communist Party of Cuba, have achieved major successes in the economic, social and cultural building of a socialist society.

The Cuban delegation expressed its gratitude to the AUCCTU for the solidarity and fraternal aid provided to the CTC, and highly praised the tremendous achievements of the Soviet workers in the fulfillment of the resolutions of the 26th CPSU Congress and the tasks of the 11th Five-Year Plan.

At the conclusion of the visit of the Cuban delegation, an agreement pertaining to the subsequent development of cooperation between the trade unions in the USSR and the Republic of Cuba was signed.

During its stay in the Soviet Union, the CTC delegation visited industrial and agricultural centers, learned about the living and working conditions of the Soviet workers, office employees and kolkhoz peasants, held meetings with workers and met with a trade union aktiv. The representatives of the Cuban trade unions were given a cordial welcome everywhere.

The CTC delegation placed a floral offering at the tomb of V. I. Lenin and the Tomb of the Unknown Soldier beside the Kremlin wall.

The results of the visit and the signing of the agreement provided further convincing evidence of the fraternal nature of the relations which link the workers and the trade unions of the two countries. They provided a further joint contribution to the cause of subsequent strengthening of the indestructible friendship of the Soviet and Cuban peoples and the consolidation of the unity of the international trade union movement.

HART SAYS CUBA READY TO FACE UNITED STATES

Paris LE MONDE in French 8-9 Nov 81 pp 1, 3

[Report on interview with Armando Hart, Cuban minister of culture, by Marcel Niedergang: "Havana Worried About American Intentions in Central America;" in Paris; date of interview not given]

[Text] Military representatives from 20 Latin American countries met behind closed doors in Washington on 3-5 November. U.S. Defense Secretary Caspar Weinberger attended this meeting. It appears that the main item on the agenda was the deteriorating situation in El Salvador. The United States reportedly denounced, once again, what they consider to be Cuban and Nicaraguan "illegal intervention" in that country.

There is now intense uneasiness within governmental circles in Havana and Managua where there is persistent mention of possible U.S. military steps designed to "punish" the two countries for their support of the Salvadoran insurgents. In Paris for a short stay, Armando Hart, Cuban minister of culture and one of Fidel Castro's closest aides, told LE MONDE that his country was preparing "to resist American armed intervention."

"What would you do in our position? We are being bombarded with threats. We read in the American press that U.S. leaders are coolly preparing to intervene militarily in Cuba and Central America. They boldly and openly admit this. We cannot remain insensitive and inactive. Any self-respecting nation must take concrete measures. That is what we are doing. No more. No less. We are preparing to resist American armed intervention. The Bay of Pigs failed once. There will be no second Bay of Pigs.* Furthermore, we have to alert world and American opinion because such intervention concerns the whole world. The fact is that a conflict in such a sensitive region as the Caribbean would inevitably escalate into general war."

Armando Hart, Cuban minister of culture, has been in Paris since Friday 6 November to open the "Cuban Books in France" fair to be held at the Cercle de la Librairie, 117 Boulevard Saint-Germain, Paris 6, from 10 to 17 November.

---

* The Bay of Pigs, or Playa Giron, was the site of the April 1961 attempted invasion by some 1,000 anti-Castro exiles, who were assisted and then abandoned by U.S. naval and air units.

Hart is a member of the Cuban Communist Party's central committee and was one of Fidel Castro's first followers. While in Paris, he is scheduled to meet with Lionel Jospin and Jack Lang, as well as other French leaders. Hart arrived here directly from Havana where the emphasis is on mobilizing the people.

The minister said he was "very concerned." He believes that the "Santa Fe document" prepared in May 1980 by several Reagan advisers to define a new U.S. policy in Latin America, is now being implemented. This document stated that a "war of liberation would have to be launched against Cuba if propaganda were to prove insufficient."

Hart added that "the propaganda phase was already well underway. The United States is planning to begin anti-Cuban broadcasts next January from a new transmitter, designated 'Radio Marti,' with an initial budget of $10 million. Choosing Marti's name was a gross mistake. The Cuban Jose Marti was an opponent of American imperialism. Making such a choice for propaganda purposes shows complete misappreciation of the psychology of peoples."

Hart believes, however, that Havana should easily be able to jam two-thirds of that transmitter's broadcasts.

He thinks the Americans are looking for a "pretext" for their intervention. "They believe they have found one by asserting that some 500 cubans are fighting along with the Salvadoran guerrillas, after having entered El Salvador via Nicaragua. This is totally false. We have formally asked the U.S. Government to furnish proof of this allegation. We have received no reply. This is a sign that the Americans are preparing something. We are convinced of it."

Paradoxically, the present deterioration of relations between Havana and Washington has still not nullified the "small steps" taken during the Carter administration to achieve real normalization of relations. The U.S. Navy and Cuban Navy continue to cooperate in the Straits of Florida. The hijacking agreement is still in effect. The American diplomat charged with maintaining contact with Cuban leaders still has his office in Havana, "even though," the minister explained, "he has been absent from it for a very long time." Hart said that although anti-Castro commandos had not resumed operations, "such operations are now being encouraged." The only sign of the chill in relations is the sharp drop in the flow of American tourists into Cuba.

We asked the minister what he thought of Havana's recent accusations of "fascist" leveled at U.S. Government leaders. He replied that these charges should be viewed "within the context of the worsening crisis, and by realizing that the intentions and concrete actions of the Reagan administration are inadmissible." He said he was convinced that another Vietnam-type action by the United States would trigger new public protests within the United States itself. In any case, he is counting greatly on American public opinion and action by North American intellectuals opposed to any kind of intervention. "Everything must be done," he added, "to spare mankind a nuclear holocaust." But, we asked him, did he not fear that the Soviet Union would eventually abandon Cuba? A global deal between Washington and Moscow whereby Cuba would be exchanged for Afghanistan?

Our question left Hart aghast, and he exploded: "I have never even imagined such a possibility. The idea is inconceivable. In my opinion, it is utterly out of the question."

FRENCH EXPRESS CONCERN OVER FATE OF VALLADARES

Estier Meets Fidel

Paris LE FIGARO in French 28 Sep 81 p 2

[Article by Pierre Emmanuel]

[Text] Frenchmen were interested to learn that Fidel Castro had been invited to lunch with Claude Estier at the French Embassy. Their conversation must have turned on human rights in various Latin American countries where those rights are known to be in a very bad way. Since one must always clean his own house, Castro must have admitted that these rights were at their lowest ebb in his own country. And Claude Estier undoubtedly inquired about the health of a few persons undergoing treatment in Cuba's prisons.

Fidel Castro had made a very brilliant debut in his role as Libertador from Batista's evil regime. Some 2 years of guerrilla warfare in the Sierra Maestra mountains had made him a legendary leader whose torrential eloquence had not reached the diluvial proportions it was to assume later. This giant measured up to the problems of the Latin American subcontinent. His call for agrarian revolution resounded from Panama to Tierra del Fuego. It shook the big financial interests who had close ties with American power and the dictatorships it supported. The 1960 crisis with the United States and the failure of the Bay of Pigs invasion radicalized his regime and turned Fidel Castro into a Marxist-Leninist who was unaware of being such.

Castro's Transformation

What followed is well-known: Cuban-style Soviet totalitarianism, alignment with Moscow, militarization to the point of absurdity, exportation of praetorians to African countries where "socialism" is on the march under the spreading shadow of the USSR, and also the cult of personality on a scale rivaled only by the one which had centered on Stalin. This charismatic quality dazzled the intelligentsia who made Castro the hero of its congenital utopian dream of a socialist messianism that, through the crimes which blazed its trail, would lead mankind to the golden age. Castro the idol enabled these intellectuals to absolve themselves from their idolatry of Stalin, and also to project their dreams outside Europe which was definitely too traumatized by the varied experiences of Kremlin-style internationalism. Even though a good number of intellectuals have recovered from this ecstasy and are now among the first to denounce oppressive socialist regimes, they still distinguish between tyrants of the left and dictators of the right, and consider it sacrilegious to mention Castro and Pinochet in the same breath.

But Claude Estier is not a leftist intellectual. He is a top-level socialist militant and does not have our naive views. He knows what to believe about the Cuban regime and could usefully inform French public opinion about the political reasons for depicting Castro as a defender of human rights.

A few months ago, under the former government, a delegation consisting of Yves Montand, Professor Cartan, Father Toulat, Attorney Jacoby, Marek Halter, Pierre Golendorf, and myself tried to meet with the Cuban ambassador to France, for the purpose of asking him to free the poet Armando Valladares who was about to begin his 21st year in prison. The ambassador referred us to an attache of sorts who tried to convince us that Valladares was not only not a poet but a fascist and an American agent. These two barefaced lies were repeated in a leftist Madrid newspaper a few days after our visit to the embassy. If Claude Estier and a few others really want to know who Valladares is and what Cuba's prison system is like, I advise them to read the poet's book "Castro's Prisoner" (published in France by Grasset) which has a lengthy preface by Leonid Plioutch. The next time Estier meets Castro, this book will give them something to talk about.

The PEN [International Association of Poets, Playwrights, Editors, Essayists, and Novelists] met recently in France. It reminded us of this poet who has been buried alive. Indeed, Valladares, imprisoned since December 1960, became disabled in 1974 as a result of the decision to stop feeding those political prisoners who refused to submit to the "rehabilitation plan." He has been in solitary confinement since 1976 for having clandestinely released poems that constitute indictments against his torturers as well as hymns of hope and joy. How can anyone create such avenging beauty with so much blood and suffering? Simply, as in "Boniato Prison: Account of a Massacre," by relating, with all the exactness of poetic language, the martyrdom of Esteban Ramos Kessel, Roberto Martin Perez, Liuva del Torro, and Pascio, or the moment of glory of Lieutenant Perez de la Rosa emptying a clip of ammunition from a Soviet rifle into the body of Gerardo, "a Bible preacher" who "always had a bit of heaven in his hands."

Death to the Absolute

If so few people read poetry today, why then are poets so frequently being thrown into prison? What does this language, which people can no longer speak and no longer understand, say that makes tyrants unable to bear hearing it? When spoken by Valladares, it says that nothing can silence man. Through the osmotic force of its melody, it conveys that feeling of invincibility which prepares man for the greatest of sacrifices. There is some of the absolute in man, and he who finds it in himself is eternal, even though he may be physically destroyed. This is something no totalitarianism can tolerate. Their watchword to all is "Death to the absolute!" As the poet's wife wrote: "Valladares, that man who can love as a child, and at the same time suffer with the stoicism of a titan," is much more important than Fidel, "a major historical figure," because he, Valladares, is a saint of our times, a witness of the absolute. Regis Debray, you who were such yourself, do you not have just cause for reminding Castro of this fact? And also that France--even for Cuban outcasts--is the fraternal land par excellence, as the minister of culture recently assured the PEN delegates?

Wife Calls for Action

Paris LE MATIN in French 19 Nov 81 p 10

[Article by Jacqueline de Linares]

[Text] The PCF [French Communist Party] is currently conducting a major campaign in favor of Cuba, the "island of liberty," according to L'HUMANITE. At the same time, Martha Valladares, wife of Armando Valladares, the Cuban poet imprisoned for the past 21 years, is traveling throughout Europe in an effort to interest international public opinion in her husband's case.

"For several months now, I have been living on a concrete slab 2.5 feet wide and 6 feet long. The remaining space is filled by a chair and a wooden drawer with a hole in it....My body has sores caused by the hardness of the slab." The man who wrote these words has been in a Cuban prison for 21 years. He is Armando Valladares, the 44-year old poet who managed to get this letter, written on 28 June this year, to his wife Martha.

The latter, who lives in Miami, is currently visiting European capitals to have people read his writings smuggled out of prison, and also to interest world opinion in her husband's plight. Her voice is firm, her language restrained. She wears a small cross-shaped pendant round her neck. Martha Valladares, 34, tirelessly relates her husband's story: "He was arrested on 27 December 1960, charged with unlawful possession of firearms and explosives, even though none were found in his possession. Some 2 weeks later, he and a few others were sentenced to 30 years in prison for 'offenses committed against state authorities.' My husband was a student at the time and made no secret of his opposition to the turn the revolution was taking." According to Cuban authorities, Valladares was "an agent of Batista."

In late 1958, Armando Valladares was a draftsman in the Cuban police department. His wife claims that at no time did the Castro regime ever question him about his activities in that department.

Martha Valladares became acquainted with her husband when visiting her father, himself a political prisoner who has since been released. She has seen him three times. Since his arrest, Valladares has experienced imprisonment, hard labor, and complete isolation. He refused the "rehabilitation" program offered by the Cuban authorities. He refused to make his autocriticism. He has been partially paralyzed since 1974 when he was deprived of food for more than a month. For the past 2 years, he has not been allowed to receive visitors or mail. He has been able to smuggle poems out of prison, and also aquarelles in which he has depicted himself, in his paralytic's chair, gathering an armful of flowers.

Acting as if a simple political prisoner was less important than a political prisoner who is also a writer, the Cuban authorities have steadily refused to recognize Armando Valladares as a poet. Martha Valladares, however, states that her husband's writings are exceptionally embarrassing for Cuban authorities because they have made him known abroad. He has become a symbol. He is proof that there are still political prisoners in Cuban prisons, even though 3,600 of them were released in 1978 and 1979, and even though it is difficult to determine how many of the latter were actually political prisoners, because the distinction between them and common-law prisoners is quite fuzzy. For example, prior to the great exodus from the port of Mariel in 1980, common-law violators had received prison sentences for having tried to leave the island on makeshift craft.

Among the known actions being taken in behalf of Cubans in prison or prevented from leaving the island, Claude Estier, deputy chairman of the National Assembly's Foreign Affairs Committee and a close friend of Francois Mitterrand, approached Cuban officials in behalf of a few individual cases during his visit to Cuba in September.

URUGUAYAN DEPUTY FOREIGN MINISTER SPEAKS AT OAS MEETING

PY080029 Paris AFP in Spanish 1750 GMT 5 Dec 81

[Text] Castries, 5 Dec (AFP)--Filiberto Ginzo Gil, Uruguayan deputy foreign minister, has declared that the OAS has all the instruments to preserve continental peace and security and to end hemispheric disputes or aggressions.

To that effect, Ginzo Gil mentioned the mechanism of the foreign ministers' consultative meetings, but he pointed out that his country is a staunch partisan of noninterference in the internal or external affairs of other states.

The deputy minister said that the planned special General Assembly on development cooperation is an ever more undelayable event to reorganize and review OAS procedures and methods in its area of jurisdiction.

Ginzo Gil also said that development and security are two closely linked concepts and that it can be asserted that in the application of the principles of nonintervention and self-determination there can be no sort of development without the existence of security.

He remarked that Uruguay has repeatedly expressed its aspiration to renew and revitalize the inter-American system through the strengthening of development cooperation.

He concluded that in order to achieve this it is necessary that the OAS start operating again as a permanent forum for information exchange, consultations and negotiations.

PERUVIAN PAPER INTERVIEWS SALVADORAN LABOR MINISTER

PY101630 Paris AFP in Spanish 0421 GMT 10 Dec 81

[Text] Lima, 9 Dec (AFP)--Julio Samayoa, the president of the Salvadoran Christian Democratic Party [PDC] and present labor minister, has asserted that the Salvadoran Government has the situation under military control and that, therefore, elections will be held in March as scheduled.

Interviewed in Caracas by the Lima leftist newspaper EL DIARIO, the politician denied that there is a civil war in his country adding that there are rebel groups that have no possibility of achieving power or of carrying out active guerrilla activity in the capital city.

He noted that the rebels have the support of foreign governments, of the international socialists, and of the Communist Party, but that in turn the civilian-military government has the support of Christian Democratic governments, of the United States, Costa Rica and the FRG, among others.

Samoyoa added that his government rejects all foreign intervention in the domestic affairs of El Salvador noting that neither the United States, the Soviet Union, Cuba or Nicaragua have the right to meddle in Salvadoran national issues.

After noting that although the victory over the rebels will be a matter of months, defeat of terrorism will take longer, the Salvadoran politician said that the government has complete control over the nation, so much so that martial law has been repealed and the state of siege will be lifted soon.

He also said the political parties have drafted an electoral law to be issued this week that will reorganize the Central Electoral Council, which will be made up of persons not involved with any political trends.

After reasserting that his government does not negotiate with rebels, who are a minority group representing only 5,000 persons, he noted that the insurgency has caused a great economic loss; 10,000 casualties in the army and 400 in the PDC militia.

WEEKLY NEWSPAPER VIEWS ELECTIONS

PY100256 Sao Paulo VEJA in Portuguese 2 Dec 81 pp 28-30

[Text] The electoral package has caused profound changes in all of the 22 Brazilian states.

The Social Democratic Party [PDS] has in the above package the most effective, far-reaching campaigner for the 1982 election. In some states where the PDS victory is already guaranteed--for instance, in Bahia--the PDS victory will be by a far larger margin due to the package. In other states, like in Ceara, the opposition was suddenly razed from the map. As a result of the package, the PDS will have a sure victory in 11 states. Similarly, states in which the odds were clearly favorable to the opposition are now experiencing a balance of forces--and, among the large states, Minas Gerais and Pernambuco are good examples of this change. In sum, the opposition can no longer feel safe anywhere in the country because it will be confronted with a party with 3,600 organized boards and nearly 3,300 mayors throughout the country. The Brazilian electoral trends have been redesigned as follows as a result of the new rules:

Acre

The Brazilian Democratic Mobilization Party [PMDB] has lost the slight edge which, until last week, its candidate, federal deputy Nabor Junior, had enjoyed. To support the PDS candidate, Governor Joaquim Macedo will mobilize primarily the mayors of the 12 municipalities of the state, all of whom have been appointed by him.

Alagoas

Alagoas' new governor will be deputy Divaldo Suruagy, who no longer faces the threat of PDS deputies supporting the candidacy of PMDB Senator Teotonio Vilela.

Amazonas

With a good following, former governor Gilberto Mestrino continues to be the favorite but he will have to preserve the strength of his Popular Party [PP]. The PDS controls all 44 mayoral seats in the state and 90 percent of the councilmen, all of which enhances the chances of the candidate to be picked by Governor Jose Lindoso.

Bahia

The election of Cleriston Andrade, president of the State Bank, which was already guaranteed, will now become just a routine matter. Combining its good functioning and the effects of the package, the PDS of Bahia State will obtain the largest victory in the country. It could elect up to 80 percent of the federal and state deputies and 90 percent of mayors and councilmen.

Ceara

The attempt made by PMDB candidate Senator Mauro Benevides to reach an agreement with PDS Adauto Bezerra has now been foiled. Bezerra had threatened to lend to the opposition the votes of mayors and councilmen who are loyal to his group. Governor Virgilio Tavora will have no problems in having his special adviser Aecio de Borba elected. Tavora wants to become a senator.

Espirito Santo

Already shaken by the defeat of the proposal to establish "intraparty subgroups" [sublegendas], former governor Elcio Alvares, of the PDS, may now suffer a fatal drawback: without the support of Governor Eurico Rezende, Alvares has been speculating with reaching intraparty agreements if he were not elected at the convention. The PMDB will have difficulties in finding a candidate for the gubernatorial seat.

Goias

Since only two parties actually exist in the state--the PDS and the PMDB--the situation has not changed there: opposition candidate Iris Resende, a former mayor of Goiania, continues to be the favorite. The Workers Party [PT] which is just starting in Goias State, will perhaps nominate a candidate but will not have sufficient votes to pose a threat to the powerful PMDB.

Maranahao

If he wants to, Senator Jose Sarney will easily return to the government. The PP and the PT, with one federal deputy each, are confronting the risk of disappearing from the Maranhao political scene.

Mato Grosso

The PDS, which is much stronger in the interior of the state than former governor Garcia Neto's PP and Father Raimundo Pombo's PMDB, will elect federal deputy Julio Campos rather easily. Ambassador Roberto Campos has also just secured himself a senatorial seat.

MATO Grosso do Sul

Deputy Levy Dias made a good move when he left the PMDB and joined the ranks of Governor Pedro Pedrossian's PDS. If Pedrossian complies with his part of the deal and gives him his support, Levy will be supported by hundreds of campaign workers of the interior who, despite being PDS members, were considering an agreement with the PP of senators Saldanha Derzi and Mendes Canale.

Minas Gerais

The National Democratic Union [UDN] and the Social Democratic Party [PSD] are now definitely defunct: neither will Governor Francelino Pereira now have the support of former UDN members who had joined the PP nor will Senator Tancredo Neves have the support of former PSD members who had joined the PDS. Tancredo has suffered a hard blow. In addition to losing votes to the PMDB and the PT, he will have to face a strong adversary. While the PP and the PDS have organized boards practically throughout the state, the ruling party has 642 mayors against only 70 for Tancredo's party. If the election were, in fact based on municipalities [municipalizada], as proposed by the government, Tancredo's candidacy would be destroyed.

Para

The PDS mayors linked to Governor Alacid Nunes will have to vote for the candidates appointed by Senator Jarbas Passarinho, who controls the party--to the misfortune of the "pro-Alacid" deputies who had joined the PMDB and of deputy Jader Barbalho, the opposition candidate to the government.

Paraiba

Closing ranks around the candidacy of deputy Wilson Braga, the PDS watches the embittered desolation of PP deputy Antonio Mariz, who early this week had been celebrating the conclusion of an agreement with the PMDB whereby the latter would appoint candidates for vice governor and senator.

Parana

The candidacies of former Governor Jayme Canet, of the PP; and of deputy Paulo Pimentel, of the PTB [Brazilian Labor Party] were heavily affected by the package since neither party will have sufficient time to become consolidated. The election will be decided between PMDB senator Jose Richa and PDS Governor Ney Braga, both with deeply rooted ties in the entire state. Ney has already received the go ahead to mobilize the party's machinery to promote his candidate, Saul Raiz.

Piaui

Former Governor Alberto Silva has come out a loser. His PP has only a mayor and two seats at the assembly against 110 PDS mayors and 18 deputies. Governor Lucidio Portella, who will be able to pick his candidate without fear of any eventual support of dissatisfied sectors for Alberto Silva, has come out a winner.

Pernambuco

Governor Marco Antonio Maciel now believes that it will be possible for the PDS to defeat Senator Marcos Freire, the PMDB candidate--who was until last week the head of a broad front which was dismantled by the package. Former governor Cid Sampaio, who was negotiating with Freire for a senatorial seat in exchange for the PP's support, will now have to settle for a seat in the Chamber of Deputies. To make Freire's complications worse, Governor Maciel will run for the senatorial seat and will thus markedly reinforce the PDS slate.

Rio Grande do Norte

The chances of Natal mayor Jose Agripino Maia--who is supported by Governor Lavoisier Maia--have improved. Yet, former governor Aluizio Alves, of the PP, who enjoys great personal prestige, is still in the race. Senator Dinarte Mariz, who broke with the Maias and had been making contacts with the opposition, will have to retire to his Solidao Ranch.

Rio Grande do Sul

PMDB Senator Pedro Simon was surprised by the package as he was getting ready to negotiate an agreement with former governor Sinval Guazzelli, of the PP. Guazzelli will now have to run for a seat in the Chamber of Deputies but Simon, who dreamed of uniting the Rio Grande do Sul opposition forces, will have to contend with deputy Alceu Collares' Workers Democratic Party. The PDS of Governor Amaral de Souza is the party which will benefit from the splintering of opposition votes.

Rio de Janeiro

Governor Chagas Freitas, who controls through the PP more than 70 percent of the 63 municipalities of the state, will now be able to pick his successor at will. This could be damaging to his presumed heir, federal deputy Miro Teixeira, since the PP no longer needs a highly popular candidate to win the gubernatorial seat. Sandra Cavalcanti's PTB has also lost its chances.

Santa Catarina

After losing its chances of securing an intraparty subgroup [sublegenda] for deputy Pedro Ivo and another for Senator Jaison Barreto, the PMDB has now lost the support of PP Senator Evelasio Vieira. This is good for the PDS, which has deputy Esperidiao Amin and former governor Antonio Carlos Konder Reis, who are very strong in the state, among its possible candidates.

Sao Paulo

This is the only state where the package could have disastrous effects for the ruling party. Despite the opposition being divided, Senator Montoro's PMDB is very strong in medium-sized and large cities where a major part of the Sao Paulo electorate resides. In smaller cities which are exposed to Montoro's campaigning and driven by the expectations elicited by the promotion of his candidacy, electors may choose to vote basically for him as governor--and naturally, for the candidates who are listed on his slate. This phenomenon could markedly change the estimation in which the PDS appears with almost 500 mayors and the PMDB with nearly 100.

Sergipe

Governor Augusto Franco will pick the candidate of his choice--probably Antonio Valadares, the PMDB will nominate former governor Seixas Doria, who does not have the charisma needed to lead to victory a party with only 4 deputies and less than 10 mayors in the entire state. Augusto Franco wants a seat in the senate.

ATILA, ABI-ACKEL INTERVIEWED ON ELECTORAL REFORM BILL

Atila: 'Electoral Reform Nonnegotiable'

Rio de Janeiro O GLOBO in Portuguese 28 Nov 81 p 3

[Interview with Presidential Press Secretary Carlos Atila in Rio de Janeiro on 27 November: "Atila: Government Considers Electoral Reform Nonnegotiable"; name of interviewer not given]

[Text] Presidential Press Secretary Carlos Atila said yesterday in Rio de Janeiro that the electoral reform bill to be sent to Congress by President Joao Figueiredo "is not open to any negotiation.

"In essence, the decision made by the president of the republic is a closed issue. The bill that will embody these decisions is to be the result of agreements, initially within the PDS [Social Democratic Party] and possibly in Congress. But the rules established by the president will not be negotiated in any manner."

In an interview after a memorial service for victims of the 1935 Communist Revolt, Carlos Atila reiterated that the electoral reform bill has the purpose of "strengthening the multiparty system." And he added:

"Solution of major national problems must be through political means and will be possible only if there is cohesion, consistency and coherence in party life. Without strong parties that are representative of the main currents of public opinion, we will not have democracy in Brazil."

Regarding a possible obstruction of voting procedures in Congress, announced by the opposition as a reprisal against electoral reform, the president's spokesman said:

"If the opposition were indeed to cause obstruction, it would show a shortsighted point of view and adherence to their own interests, ignoring the national interest.

Interview

The interview with Carlos Atila was as follows:

[Question] Has the government decided to call Congress into special session to vote on the electoral reform bill?

[Answer] The government's first concern is to write the bill that will embody the decision made by the president about the 1982 elections. Only after the bill is written will the government decide whether to call a special session of Congress. Next week we will definitely announce when the bill will be sent to Congress.

[Question] Will merger of the opposition parties, if it occurs, contribute to political liberalization?

[Answer] I don't see why such a merger would take place. The government thinks there should be a number of parties corresponding to the major currents of public opinion. The constitution provides that a party, to be permitted to function, must have at least 5 percent of the electorate, distributed over at least nine states, and with a minimum of 3 percent of the votes in each state. Hence, under the constitutional rule, parties that really represent public opinion will be organized. The rules established by the president aim to strengthen the multiparty system.

[Question] Is it possible that there will be another measure specifically prohibiting merger among parties?

[Answer] As far as I know, this is not being considered.

[Question] Won't linked voting create restrictions for the voter?

[Answer] I don't think so. There are rules for everything. We are in a process of transforming Brazilian institutional organization in regard to election rules. We are changing from a two-party system to a multiparty system and suddenly we are faced with a situation that could completely destroy the parties. To the extent that parties are purely election-time alliances, frequently associated with regional interests, the representativeness of Congress is jeopardized.

This would make debate and discussion of major problems of national interest unfeasible. The government's major concern is to establish the minimum conditions to really strengthen the representativeness of the political parties. And note that the constitutional rules are flexible and democratic, reconciling the representativeness of the parties at the state level as well as at the federal level. We cannot return to having, as we once had, 12 or 15 parties that did not represent anything, but created tremendous confusion in alliances of candidates for elections. We have the example of other countries in which decisions about great national problems are unfeasible due to the multiplicity of parties and formation of coalitions of all types, which transform politics into a game of chess that is impossible to follow.

[Question] According to the opposition, the president's liberalization image is finished, in view of the electoral reform package. What do you think of this?

[Answer] I think it is a very hasty judgment. We have to wait for elections; these will be the real test. The comments I hear from the man on the street are that we must have a strengthened democracy, with a minimum of discipline so we can deal with the big issues of public interest. And the problem of inflation, the cost of living, projects to create employment, controlling the deficit in the balance of payments. These are the problems of Brazilian society. These matters must be settled through political solutions that will be possible only if there is cohesion, consistency and coherence in party activities, which is the basis for representative democracy.

[Question] How does the government view obstruction of procedures in the Senate, which the opposition is threatening to engage in again?

[Answer] It accomplishes nothing. If the opposition really creates such obstruction it will be demonstrating a shortsighted point of view and adherence to their own interests, ignoring the real aspirations of the nation.

[Question] The opposition agrument is that the electoral package clearly benefits the PDS.

[Answer] How can that be, when the rules are the same for everyone? Of course, the PDS is the majority party and it intends to remain so. But there are no rules that establish certain electoral rules for the PDS and others for the opposition.

[Question] But what they are saying is that these rules benefit the PDS.

[Answer] The PDS is the majority party and it intends to remain the majority party. If the rules benefit it, it is a mere coincidence, not the purpose.

[Question] Why did the government break off negotiations with the opposition?

[Answer] Because the opposition was continually trying to impose new conditions and new requirements. In fact, a bill that wasn't even under discussion, such as the one granting statehood to Rondonia, was obstructed by the opposition which created a series of obstacles in order to get further concessions.

[Question] But the justice minister reached an agreement with the opposition parties.

[Answer] Absolutely. The justice minister always established as a condition for the agreements subsequent consultation with Planalto Palace. He arrived at a preliminary understanding that will, of course, be submitted to the president for final approval. The minister was a negotiatior in constant touch with Planalto Palace.

[Interview with Justice Minister Ibrahim Abi-Ackel in Manaus on 27 November by reporters at Eduardo Gomes Airport: "Abi-Ackel Rejects Alternative of Resubmitting Bill for Multicandidate Slates"]

/Text/ Manaus--Justice Minister Ibrahim Abi-Ackel said yesterday he "rejects the possibility" of the government trying to negotiate extension of multicandidate slates to gubernatiorial elections in exchange for giving up its proposal for linked voting--an idea being studied by opposition politicians.

The justice minister explained, in an interview when he landed at Eduardo Gomes Airport, that it was he who suggested to President Joao Figueiredo the impossibility of conducting negotiations about electoral reform in view of the existing impasse.

"And it was because of the impasse that the president, in exercise of his function as head of the government and his responsibility for the liberalization process, recommended to our party the measures that by now are common knowledge," he added.

In his view, merger of opposition parties--arising as a reaction to linked voting and prohibition of coalitions--"does not depend on the government; it depends on the opposition parties." He argued, however, that the proposal of merger is "proof of the strength of the PDS," since five opposition parties intend to unite in order to oppose it.

During the afternoon Abi-Ackel received the title of citizen of Amazonas from the state legislature. He also met with Governor Jose Lindoso and, in the evening, with PDS leaders at party headquarters.

Interview

The interview with Justice Minister Abi-Ackel was as follows:

[Question] Is the president's decision to prohibit party coalitions, greatly extend linked voting and prevent election of former labor leaders part of his liberalization policy?

[Answer] Look, I want to be just as pleasant as possible with you. To a certain extent, you journalists and we politicians are colleagues. We must account to the public. But your question mixes up entirely different things, so that I will have to separate your question into what belongs in it and what does not belong. It is not at all true that the government has proposed to the opposition punishment of labor leaders. What happened was exactly the opposite: my proposal, made on behalf of the government, was to limit the time of ineligibility contained in the law, which, as it now reads, is a kind of permanent punishment. Hence, our proposal to set a time limit was a liberalizing measure intended to prevent labor leaders affected by intervention in the unions they lead remaining permanently barred from running for office. So I am correcting what seems to me is an error in the question. In respect to linked voting, it has been seen as a limitation of free movement of democratic forces. When this statement is made, it is forgotten that linked voting benefits the person directly interested in the election, the voter. With linked voting the people now have a larger number of candidates for elective offices among which to choose.

[Question] Isn't the government, by doing this, running the risk of causing elimination of what are considered small parties? And wouldn't this hamper the nation's return to democracy?

[Answer] No, just the opposite. We have a multiparty system. But that does not require existence of parties that don't express curents of public opinion with a broad national base. Provided the party reaches the size required to function as such, linked voting causes it no harm.

[Question] If the opposition should form a united front, would the government be willing to accept it or would it take other measures?

[Answer] Now, that is just a conjecture. In fact, there are several conjectures combined in one question and I would rather discuss facts.

[Question] The church says it is not concerned about the technical process, as long as the election is honest. What is your opinion?

[Answer] We want honest elections. And the government will make sure they are honest and aboveboard. Everyone wants honest elections.

[Question] Won't the president's recommendation to the PDS that it consider the matter closed be an obstacle on the road to freedom that Congress has been taking in legislative matters?

[Answer] No. The president recommended that the party consider the matter closed. Our party will have to meet--that is, the directors of our party will meet--to decide whether to close the matter, by a representative vote. Closing the question is a measure provided by law. Hence, as long as it meets legal requirements it is not an authoritarian measure or contrary to democracy.

[Question] Mr Minister, are you saying that you and the PDS were not consulted on this matter?

[Answer] I am still waiting for the question. You are confirming what I just said. Look, this is an internal problem of the government. What I can tell you is that the decision resulted from--rather, the president's recommendation to close the question resulted from--the position he was put in by the impasse reached by negotiations in Congress. The opposition, for reasons it does nor behoove me to explore, did not offer a conciliatory proposal or a counterproposal about granting statehood to Rondonia and limiting length of punishment, already provided by law, of labor-union leaders. It was I who informed the president of the impossibility of reconciling negotiations, due to the impasse. And it was because of the impasse that the president, in exercising his function as head of the government and as the person responsible for the liberalization process, recommended to our party the measures that have now become common knowledge.

[Question] Who caused the dialogue to collapse--the government, the opposition or the PDS?

[Answer] I would not say "who caused the collapse." But the opposition could not accept the government proposal and the government was not in a position to neglect certain problems of fundamental importance, such as setting the date for elections. This is a problem of the government--the government wants to set the date. It proposed setting the date to the opposition. The government is committed to holding elections; it proposed to the opposition a date for holding the elections. It also proposed statehood for Rondonia. Statehood would not benefit the government; it would benefit the people. And, as I said, it also proposed limiting punishment of labor-union leaders. Nor is the limitation for the benefit of the government; it is for the benefit of the labor leaders. But even so the opposition was not in a position to accept the proposal. This is not a criticism; it is a statement of fact. I am in no position to inquire into what situations opposition leaders had to face tha led to the impasse at which we arrived.

[Question] In closing debate on the question, hadn't the president come to the conclusion that the party had no political leadership?

[Answer] No, he reached the conclusion that it was impossible to negotiate with the opposition. And it is so true that the party has leadership that it is the leadership of the party that will meet to close the question and lead congressional voting on the bill.

[Question] Some opposition sources would like to negotiate return of multicandidate slates in exchange for linked voting.

[Answer] I reject that possibility. Congress has already voted on multicandidate slates.

[Question] Mr Minister, would the government acquiesce to party mergers?

[Answer] Party mergers don't depend upon the government; they depend upon the opposition parties.

PATIENCE, ORATORICAL SKILL PROPEL ABI-ACKEL TO CABINET POST

Sao Paulo O ESTADO DE SAO PAULO in Portuguese 29 Nov 81 p 5

[Article by M.M.: "The Uncertain Future of Abi-Ackel's Career"]

[Text] Brasilia--From unknown leader to one of the politicians receiving the most attention from the press during the last 2 years, Justice Minister Ibrahim Abi-Ackel remains an ill-defined personality. By a few votes he arrived in the Chamber of Deputies for the first time through a substitution process and during his second term he was introduced to his predecessor [as justice minister], Petronio Portella, who in turn took him to the then all-powerful Minister Golbery do Couto e Silva.

An excellent orator, he got along well with Petronio during meetings in which the late justice minister encouraged brief speeches. A great admirer of oratory, Petronio grew closer to Abi-Ackel and admitted to friends his admiration for that descendent of Lebanese who, overwhelmed by his parents' difficulty in expressing themselves in Portuguese, made a strenuous effort to overcome this immigrant handicap.

Friends, they once had common enemies. One of them, formerly president of ARENA [National Renewal Alliance] and now president of the PDS [Social Democratic Party], Senator Jose Sarney, was ridiculed by Petronio and more than once had to wait longer than necessary in his reception room. Sarney was aware of the hostility behind the waiting and Petronio even said on one occasion that he felt "a physical loathing" for the senator, now immortalized by the Brazilian Academy of Letters.

Petronio, in the same way he had been "discovered" by Felinto Muller, becoming part of the most influential ARENA group, intended to back the career of Abi-Ackel, in whom he saw the character traits, political skills and speaking ability needed to be leader of the government party in the Chamber of Deputies.

This simple preference would hardly have turned Sarney against Abi-Ackel, were it not for one of the Minas Gerais deputy's rare outbursts in which he called the ARENA president and its secretary general, Prisco Viana, liars in so many words. This is because Sarney, disagreeing with Petronio Portella, spread in Congress the idea, at the time of party reform, that the majority of the government party's deputies preferred creation of two parties supporting the government.

Abi-Ackel came out in support of Petronio's idea, whose strategy included creation of a "trustworthy" opposition party, which eventually had his initials as its own: PP [Popular Party]. At the time Petronio called the multicandidate slate "superfluous" in a multiparty system and Abi-Ackel once again appeared timidly in the news as a supporter of the same viewpoint, although stressing that the transitional phase through which the nation was passing justified the anomalous use of the "superfluous" device for the 1982 elections only.

Abi-Ackel, who comes from the PSD [pre-1964 Social Democratic Party], was ready to join the PP, or at least seriously threatening to do so, because he was up against internal opposition in the Minas Gerais party, dominated by former UDN [National Democratic Union] members Francelino Pereira and Aureliano Chaves; Sarney had also belonged to the UDN.

Petronio dies. The nation's political course changes. To its surprise the political world saw on the front page for many weeks the broad smile, bald pate and discreet elegance of Abi-Ackel, transformed into minister of justice. His biggest problem at first, and one that pursues him to this day, was taking the place of the man who was considered the leading contemporary politician. Everyone saw in Petronio Portella the future first post-1964 civilian president.

Discretion, patience and a great capacity for disregarding insulting behavior that Petronio would not have permitted characterized Abi-Ackel's first phase. Petronio's political maneuvers were now in full swing and it is not known what has been left to his known heirs.

Also taken by surprise, Abi-Ackel had no plans and limited himself to complying with the decisions of Planalto Palace while he was preparing his own line of action. One of the priorities he established immediately was strengthening the legislative branch, with which he would strengthen himself and keep in constant touch with politicians of all parties.

As his statements do not have an incisive and clear style and because the first part of last year was a period of relative calm, after approval of amnesty and the end of the two-party system, Abi-Ackel was considered a puppet of Planalto Palace and the mouthpiece of Minister Golbery. His image was further marred by one of the first bills passed during his administration, the draconian Foreigners Law, and by having to cope with the ebbing of censorship, liberalized by Petronio.

A temporamental person, he had to cope with a hostile climate on the part of the press, especially the reporters covering his ministry, whom he often treated rudely, although interspersed with periods of cordiality. He made quite clear to journalists, and frequently still does, his displeasure in being compared with his predecessor.

Always consulting the old Minas Gerais PSD politician Pio Canedo, whom he considers his political "guru," he decided to project his own image and course of action through "dialogue," "negotiation" and "transaction." And by persisting in this he was able to reach an agreement in the negotiations to change the Foreigners Law. It was his big success. He conspicuously visited the major representatives of the oppostion and the Justice Ministry opened its doors for the first time to Ulysses Guimaraes, Tancredo Neves, Airton Soares and, significantly, the formerly cassated and exiled Leonel Brizola.

In the meantime, however, Abi-Ackel "forgot" to consult his own party and Sarney in protest again began to harass him and try to disrupt the agreements. Opposition leaders (Roberto Freire, Marcelo Cerqueira, Airton Soares, Alceu Collares and others) quickly rose to defend Abi-Ackel, who promoted political negotiation as the best way to conduct President Figueiredo's promised liberalization.

But Abi-Ackel's dialog was also full of charges. While showing much cordiality to the CNBB [National Conference of Brazilian Bishops], one of the key elements in negotiations about foreigners, he was setting traps for Dom Luciano Mendes, CNBB secretary general who often did not want to be seen in the Justice Ministry. Abi-Ackel's staff would even wake up newsmen in the morning to inform them of a "secret" meeting. In this way they got revenge against statements by Dom Luciano and others, against whom they also made charges, always off the record.

After this dialogue, which also had to be extended to some "hardline" elements of the government, Abi-Ackel began negotiating electoral reform, assigned to him by the president of the republic. In Figueiredo's absence the PDS president tried once again to upset the justice minister, under the watchful eye of ex-UDN Aureliano Chaves, acting president. When Figueiredo returned to the helm, Abi-Ackel was officially made the government's political coordinator. After a week of "glory," alleging the opposition's inflexibility, he announced the president's decision to suspend negotiations.

Well-informed sources within the Justice Ministry believe Abi-Ackel knew all along about the president's "long-planned" decision and gave no hint that negotiations would not reach an agreement until 2 days before the formal announcement, when he accused the opposition of not being fair, of being very hostile and, especially, having so many internal differences as to prevent a common proposal. He still tried, in a discreet meeting with Tancredo Neves, to get the latter to force a bigger concession from the opposition. He did not succeed. When he met with the opposition at the beginning of the week, Abi-Ackel probably already knew what Planalto's reply would be.

Will Abi-Ackel, a politician who considers his greatest asset to be his ability to discuss and negotiate, be able to return to the negotiating table, with whomever it may be?

INFLATION DROPS BELOW 100 PERCENT FOR FIRST TIME IN 16 MONTHS

Sao Paulo O ESTADO DE SAO PAULO in Portuguese 4 Dec 81 p 25

[Text] Rio de Janeiro--November's inflation rate was 5.3 percent, increasing the cumulative rate for this year to 88.1 percent and reducing to 99.1 percent the rate for the latest 12 months, which fell below 100 percent for the first time in 16 months. The data were reported yesterday by the Brazilian Institute of Economics of the Getulio Vargas Fundation [FGV], which pointed out that the November rate was almost 1 percentage point higher than that of October, although well below the 7.6 percent recorded in November last year.

For its part, the Consumer Price Index for the City of Rio de Janeiro--one of the components for computing inflation--was 4.6 percent in November (91.3 percent for the year and 107 percent in the latest 12 months), with the increase concentrated in the following groups: public services (6.8 percent), housing (6 percent), personal services (6 percent), health care and hygiene (5.1 percent), apparel (4.1 percent), household articles (3.1 percent) and food (3.1 percent).

Although increasing less than the average, food was responsible for about 29 percent of the higher cost of living in Rio due to its large share of household budgets. According to the FGV, the biggest increases in this group were for onions (65.5 percent), lettuce (33.3 percent), avocados (20.2 percent), pears (18.4 percent), rice pudding (17.9 percent), apples (17.5 percent), corned beef (17.1 percent) and ham (16.8 percent).

But the price increases that had the greatest influence on the index were those of "yellow" rice, responsible for 3.27 percent of the increase in the cost of living, onions (2.83 percent), "needle" rice (2.21 percent), corned beef (1.93 percent), refined sugar (1.8 percent), eggs (1.8 percent), dressed chicken (1.58 percent) and sandwiches (1.49 percent).

The Wholesale Price Index rose 5.9 percent in November--87.8 percent for the year so far and 97.4 percent for the latest 12 months--also a greater increase than that of October. The rise is explained by the increase of 5.5 percent in wholesale food prices, 5.9 percent in raw materials and 3.3 percent in building materials.

The products whose wholesale prices rose most were onions (72.7 percent), automatically-fed flat machines (37.1 percent), Brazil nuts (33.2 percent), sweet potatoes (32.1 percent), special steel bars more than 80 mm (29.7 percent), seamless steel tubes (28.7 percent), lemons (22.9 percent) and women's stockings (20.6 percent). But the increases that had the greatest influence on the index were those for corn (13.66 percent), crude oil (7.68 percent), processed rice (4.8 percent), onions (4.01 percent), gasoline (3.77 percent), cotton cloth (3.5 percent), cloth of artificial fibers (3.35 percent) and cigarettes (2.58 percent).

The Construction Cost Index in the city of Rio de Janeiro showed a 3.3 percent increase in November--80.5 percent so far this year and 89.5 percent in the last 12 months--including, according to the FGV, a 2.7 percent increase in labor cost and a 3.8 percent increase in building materials, also rates higher than those of October.

Inflation: Change in Monthly Rates (Last 12 Months)

Key:

1. Cumulative Inflation for 12 Months: 99.1 percent
2. Cumulative Inflation for 11 Months: 88.1 percent

LIBERALIZATION PROCESS ANALYZED

PY092219 Rio de Janeiro JORNAL DO BRASIL in Portuguese 1 Dec 81 p 2

["Castello's Column" by Carlos Castello Branco: "The Keys to Political Opening"]

[Excerpt] According to theoreticians, the key to liberalization is to keep initiatives and the process under control by the dominant group, control measures can be reduced but overall control must not be lost because, otherwise, liberalization will precipitate the transfer of the government along with the premature liquidation of the dominant system. The group in the government must make concessions, liberalize gradually, but never give the impression that it is giving in to external pressures nor that it is acquiescing to hardline internal pressures.

Liberalization is not yet democratization, but a road that may or may not lead to democratization. Liberalization is intended to create stable institutions through which government succession can occur without risking a retreat to past situations declared unsatisfactory, such as the situation prior to 1964 in Brazil. President Geisel conducted the liberalization process through pressures and counterpressures, but general Figueiredo made the objective explicit which was only implicit in the policy of his predecessor: installing a democratic regime in Brazil.

Although the objective has been made explicit, the process continues to be just a process of liberalization. It is not a democratization process yet. Some similarities can be pointed out to show the identity between the behavior of the two governments that have promoted liberalization. President Geisel held free elections in 1974, but he had to intervene in the process both in 1976 and 1978 to avert loss of control by the government. He appointed senators who became known as "bionic" senators and altered the composition of the electoral college, in addition to eliminating freedom of campaigning over radio and television. These measures came to be known as the "April package." But, on the other hand, Geisel also stood up to pressures from the hardline. In Sao Paulo the first corpse (Herzog) which was exhibited in defiance by the repressive apparatus only provoked a warning visit by the president. The second corpse (Fiel) prompted General Geisel to dismiss the commander of the second army. In the same line of action, Geisel cashiered his army minister.

The Geisel government did away with the institutional acts and abolished the two-party system to break up the opposition and improve the chances of the progovernment party. President Figueiredo took a step forward by granting anmesty and consolidating the practice of freedom of the press. But repeated warnings by the hardline which exploded a series of bombs around the country--the last one at the Riocentro--halted the impetus of the president's liberal manifestations. The government ranks lost some substance with the resignation of Gen Golbery do Couto e Silva who became a dissenter. The apparent acquiescence of President Figueiredo in the hardline brought about a compromise that is obvious by now: as of yesterday, seven months have gone by without a bomb explosion.

Extreme reactions, which imply a backtracking but no cancellation of the liberalization plan, occur every time the government finds itself under uncontrollable pressure from the opposition. In April 1977, congress turned down bills submitted by President Geisel and it became obvious that, with the two-third quorum requirement, the government had to negotiate every item of the constitutional reform it wanted to implement. The "April package" took care of the situation. It made electoral conditions more difficult and reduced to zero the possibility of interference by the Brazilian Democratic Movement [MDB] in the management of the liberalization process. In 1981, President Figueiredo lost control in congress which did not pass the bill he submitted on "intraparty subgroups" [sublegendas] for gubernatorial elections and imposed conditions for the approval of other measures he proposed. The reaction was a "new package" which revitalized the principle of party loyalty [by banning discussion on bills to PDS congressmen] and the constitutional time-limit mechanism for approving bills without congressional vote [decurso de Prazo).

The dismay the new package created was great, but not as much as that created by the shock treatment of the "April package." The opposition has not yet defined its attitude toward this new package. The merging of parties is an unviable proposal. Defeating the package, a hypothesis that cannot be discarded, involves the greater risk of provoking a more brusque reaction by the system. Negotiating a softening would be a more logical approach but this will only be possible as weeks pass by and to the extent that new spokesmen with the capacity to resume talks emerged. For the opposition and for the country, the important and essential point is to go to elections, to hold the elections, and to make possible the pronouncement of the electorate through the ballots. This pronouncement might not have all the effectiveness the opposition hopes for, but it will be a new element capable of changing the picture.

PCB PUBLISHES BOOK OF DOCUMENTS; PARTY SPLIT IN SAO PAULO

Public Introduction of Book

Sao Paulo O ESTADO DE SAO PAULO in Portuguese 29 Nov 81 p 2

[Text] In Sao Paulo Tuesday evening the Brazilian Communist Party [PCB] will introduce a book containing all party documents published between 1974 and 1981. According to the invitation distributed by the Commission for Legalization of the PCB, the event will be attended by Paulo Egydio Martins, former governor of the state; Guacu Piteri, mayor of Osasco; Mario Covas, regional PMDB [Brazilian Democratic Mobilization Party] president; Ivete Vargas, PTB [Brazilian Labor Party] president; Marcos Aurelio Ribeiro, PT [Workers Party] leader in the Assembly; and Giocondo Dias, secretary general of the Brazilian Communist Party.

The book, published by Editora Ciencias Humanas, is called called "The PCB in Sao Paulo: Documents (1974-1981)" and, according to the invitation, "is a collection of documents by Sao Paulo communists referring to the period when democratic resistance advanced and the process of political liberalization was begun in Brazil." Moreover, according to the same message, the book "presents significant material for analyzing the decade of the 70's in our country, represents a source of information about the PCB's recent history and is an important step for legalizing it, the oldest political party in Brazil."

The special guests at the affair will participate in a panel discussion with the subject "Liberalization and the Sao Paulo Communists," beginning at 1900 hours on 2 December in the auditorium of the Professional Journalists Union of the State of Sao Paulo, at 530 Rego Freitas Street.

Chapters

The publication is organized and introduced by Marco Aurelio Nogueira, David Capistrano Filho and Claudio Guedes and is divided into six chapters: "Before the Declines of 1975," "Reorganization of the PCB in Sao Paulo, First Steps," "Sao Paulo Communists and the Working-Class and Labor Movement," "Sao Paulo Communists, University and Education," "Struggle for PCB Unity" and "The 1981 State Conference."

Dissidents Expelled

Sao Paulo O ESTADO DE SAO PAULO in Portuguese 4 Dec 81 p 2

[Text] Another crisis has struck the Brazilian Communist Party in Sao Paulo, leading to expulsion of several members and an exchange of accusations between the two factions that have been formed. This split is reported in a recent document of the PCB itself titled "Communique No. 2," distributed to Sao Paulo communists.

Signed by the party's state committee, the document replies to criticism by the dissident wing at the same time it accuses members of this faction of not following the party line on various occasions. The dissident communists, the communique charges, voted against admitting Janio Quadros to PMDB membership at a meeting of that opposition party's district directors, refused to support the candidacy of Joaquim dos Santos Andrade in the Sao Paulo Metalworkers Union election and published a document opposing official PCB support for Senator Franco Montoro's candidacy for governor of Sao Paulo.

After calling upon "all party organizations of the State to be alert for a new factionalist plot that is being planned involving a certain number of comrades and some organizations," the document concludes asserting that the state committee will continue "assuring internal democracy, as it has been doing, correctly applying democratic centralism and statutory principles."

PRESENCE IN ANTARCTIC DEFENDED; NAVY SEEKS ANOTHER SHIP

Bases for Claims

Sao Paulo O ESTADO DE SAO PAULO in Portuguese 4 Dec 81 p 12

[Text] Rio de Janeiro--"Brazil's presence in Antarctica and the southern seas cannot be postponed." The statement was made yesterday at the Brazilian Agriculture Society in Rio de Janeiro by Col Elber de Mello Henriques during a speech attended by representatives of the armed forces and politicians of the PDS [Social Democratic Party], and supports the scientific expedition that Brazil will send to the Antarctic in 1982.

According to Colonel Mello Henriques, "Brazil only knows about the Antarctic what was told us and it has become more necessary than ever to have our own experience." China, FRG, Australia and Argentina are already advanced in their preparation for exploring the Antarctic, he reported.

"The Chinese Government will establish as soon as possible a permanent research station in the Antarctic; West Germany has just approved a budget of 385 million marks for scientific research and development of krill (crustacean species); Australia approved a budget of 20 million pounds sterling for reequipping its stations; and Argentina finished studies for building an airport for transpolar flight, which will operate throughout the year. All this is very significant," he emphasized.

According to Colonel Mello Henriques, the progress of mankind, the constantly denser population of the Southern Hemisphere and a demand for food that covers all oceans are the causes of the attention now being given the Antarctic, as well as territorial claims founded on the principles of discovery, geographic proximity, security, frontage, economic use, scientific activity and permanent occupation. "Brazil meets some of these principles and will meet others in the near future," he said in his speech.

For the principle of discovery, he cited the letter of Amerigo Vespucci to Dom Manoel revealing that he had arrived at the South Pole--"Under the terms of our independence, the Portuguese government declared us the heirs to its rights in the Western Hemisphere, so we may invoke the right of discovery." The statement that Brazil is the largest and most populous country of the Southern Hemisphere with the longest coastline facing the Antarctic Ocean justifies the principle of geographic proximity; vital interest in South Atlantic shipping, contiguous to the Antarctic, justifies the principle of security; the southern islands of Martin Vas and Barra do Arroio Chui justify the principle of frontage which says that all the areas round about would belong to the countries whose lands face them.

In regard to the principle of economic use, Colonel Mello Henriques cites the Portuguese as the first to explore the waters of the Antarctic. In reference to permanent occupation, he says: "No nation permanently occupies the Antarctic."

Navy Seeking Suitable Ship

Sao Paulo O ESTADO DE SAO PAULO in Portuguese 2 Dec 81 p 11

[Text] Brasilia--Navy Minister Adm Maximiano da Fonseca said yesterday he had not yet received any official communication from Great Britain about its withdrawing its offer to sell the ship "Endurance" which Brazil intended to buy to carry scientists to Antarctica. The navy minister reported that regardless of this the Navy is continuing to seek another ship and is now awaiting a reply to inquiries that have been made to the FRG and Poland, which have expressed an interest in selling vessels of this type to Brazil.

The navy minister attributed the British Government's withdrawal from selling the "Endurance" to the fact that Great Britain needs a vessel with its characteristics to provide support for its bases in the Antarctic and to the population of the Falkland Islands.

In the initial proposal to sell the ship, Great Britain offered it for $2.8 million (about 336 million cruzeiros) which the navy minister considered "a good price." He pointed out that West Germany is building a vessel, also to carry a scientific expedition to Antarctica, which will cost $90 million. The United States, he also reported, has a ship and is offering it to Brazil but the navy minister said the vessel must be thoroughly overhauled to be used in a mission to the Antarctic. Poland also has expressed an interest in selling a ship to Brazil but has not yet made a specific offer.

COMMUNIST PARTY LEADER SCORES JUNTA'S ECONOMIC POLICY

LD042220 Budapest MTI in English 1042 GMT 4 Dec 81

[Text] Budapest, 4 Dec (MTI)--"The socio-economic crisis afflicting Chile indicates the failure of the junta's economic policy," said Manual Cantero, member of the Chilean Communist Party Political Committee, who had paid a visit to Hungary at the invitation of the Hungarian Socialist Workers' Party Central Committee and had been interviewed by an MTI correspondent.

Manuel Cantero recalled that class struggle revived in Chile in the recent past and big strikes were held in copper mines, harbours and in the light industry. "A new feature of the strikes is that people take the field not only for peace but they also reject the junta's policy too."

"A unity of action has been established by workers belonging to various parties in their workplaces while party leaders continue debates, and it has an essential influence on the fight of the Chilean opposition. The Communist Party called Chilean masses on an overall uprise in September 1980, and declared that the people had a right to use force, if necessary. Some of the parties of the former popular unity do not agree with this conception, they have doubts about the necessity of armed fight, but more and more parties agreed to the Communist Party's assessment."

"The bourgeois opposition fears radical changes, deems step by step policy advisable and hopes that it could coax changes out of the junta at the elections. It is the stand of the Chilean Christian Democratic Party, too. The Communist Party holds that, despite existing differences, the dialogue with the Christian Democratic Party should be continued and the unity established at workplaces should be realized in the parties' leaderships sooner or later.

"The policy pursued by the present U.S. administration may also contribute to establish unity. President Reagan openly took up the cause of the Pinochet junta, and stripped off the illusions of bourgeois parties condemning the fascist methods of the junta and hoping that Washington would force the junta to reinstitute certain democratic rights in Chile," said Manuel Cantero.

CFP FACES DIFFICULTIES FOLLOWING BUCARAM DEATH

Quito EL COMERCIO in Spanish 14 Nov 81 p A 2

[Article by Miguel Rivadeneira]

[Text] There can be no doubt that the reunification of the CFP [Concentration of Popular Forces] party following the sudden death of its top leader, Assad Bucaram, will be very difficult and perhaps, as things look now, practically impossible.

The split produced by the break between Bucaram and Jaime Roldos Aguilera on the heels of the latter's election as president of the Republic on 29 April 1979 was definite and irremediable.

It was definite and irremediable--despite the fact that in politics everything has not yet been written and anything can happen--because that split gave birth to a new political party, now legally recognized by the Electoral Supreme Tribunal and known as People, Change and Democracy [PCD], whose founder was the late President Jaime Roldos.

A bloc of Roldos-ist legislators also took shape--and still exists--made up of 12 representatives, of which only four are members of the CPD, while others continue being members of the CFP, since they have neither tendered their resignation nor been expelled.

Still a third group emerged, made up of former CFP members--known as independents--who presently find themselves scattered despite the leadership initially provided by one of the CFP's theorists, Marco Proano, who even went so far as to publish a the book "Yo CFP [I,CFP]."

These circumstances determined the forming of three distinct groups within the National Chamber of Representatives: the Bucaram-ist members of the CFP, the Roldos-ists--among whom there are four members of the PCD--and the independents.

The reunification of the CFP will be difficult because there is now a new party on the scene that inhibits its accomplishment.

Besides, the first statements following the death of the CFP leader, Assad Bucaram, convey a gloomy outlook as regards any possibility of a reunification of the CFP.

But why? Simply because the CFP will remain the same, with its present structures--according to some of its militants--which does not change the outlook, with Bucaram or without him.

Julio Ayala, one of the indefatigable followers of Bucaram, warned that a reunification will be difficult, because "We will not allow those who stabbed us in the back to return to the CFP as if nothing whatever had happened."

However, he left open the possibility of returning for some former CFP members who might have left the party through a misunderstanding or because of some personal set of circumstances.

Marco Proano, who initially announced that he was going into exile and would later rejoin the party, maintains that unless the current party structures are changed, reunification will be impossible.

Ayala, for his part, stated that the CFP will maintain its present structure and aims to continue being the strong party it has been and still is.

Nelson Felix Navarrete, former member of the CFP and now a member of the PCD, expressed pessimism as regards the possible reunification and stated that the death of Bucaram will not reunite the former militants of the CFP.

Of course, these preliminary predictions--purely personal expressions of views, as they were--can hardly be expected to be fulfilled, and one must await the decision first by the National Executive Committee of the CFP, and then see who is actually elected as supreme head of the party, if such is to be the proceeding.

Marco Proano said that it is fundamental to the destiny of a party, in a situation such as that now confronting the CFP, to reiterate the conviction that the new Ecuadorean policy must be based upon a strengthening of all political parties.

"For this reason," he said, "I hope the CFP, as a historical political party in our country, will be capable of overcoming the present difficult situation."

"Consequently," he added, "everything that contributes to the strengthening of this or any other political party should be backed by the entire country, since in defending the organization of political parties we defend democracy."

Regarding the future of the CFP, he said the only thing he could assert is that in the hands of the CFP lies his own destiny. "But," he emphasized, "in my opinion, the essential thing in the CFP--as in any other party--is not the vitality of its members but rather the effectiveness of its policy structures and its principles. Hence, a new man at its head will avail the CFP little or nothing if there is no change in its policy structures made up of supreme heads and matador-like dogmaticians."

He recalled that "A nationwide current of public opinion backed our initiative for a process of democratization within the CFP, which will require the institution of a profound reform of its statutes, without which any thought of a reunification is but Utopian."

Julio Ayala stated that the future of any political party, like that of any other institution, depends upon the activism deployed by those who comprise it; if this activism centers upon specific objectives and adheres to appropriate strategies, then its future will be one of self-respect, honor and dignity.

"However," he added, "if this policy is not followed, logically the institution will fall under its own weight, the weight of its errors. We, the members of the CFP, in the wake of the lamentable death of Assad Bucaram, aspire to maintaining the structure of the party, to maintaining its activism, to promoting the party's growth."

He affirmed that the CFP has been a party that has never backed down from a struggle. "I think," he said, "very few parties in our country can claim the honor and pride this brings."

He disclosed that the necessary mechanisms are being sought and the appropriate steps being taken to ensure the maintaining of the party's position, its history and its struggle.

With regard to a possible reunification of the CFP, he indicated that, in his opinion, this will be a very difficult thing to bring about, but that this is simply his personal opinion, since the party has not met yet to decide on this issue.

"We think," he explained, "that those who formed separate groups might be able to return to the CFP as groups." He said that if any person can show that he or she had to leave the party because of a misunderstanding or because of some personal set of circumstances, "We should analyze those circumstances and reconsider within the party."

"But," he added, "under no circumstances should we accept that those who stabbed us in the back, that those who betrayed the party's ideals, that those who did so much damage to the CFP, should now return to the party as if nothing whatever had happened.

"That," he said, "would be a betrayal of Bucaram's ideals, and of our policy of political struggle, and it would set a bizarre precedent in this country, since that betrayal would be being covered up under a mantle of forgive-and-forgetfulness."

Lastly, he affirmed that the CFP would have to keep itself purged, cleansed and proper, so that the Ecuadorean people as a whole "will believe in us." "It would be wrong of us to accept that unpredictable swallows of the past return to again do us damage with their presence in the CFP," he concluded.

Nelson Felix Navarrete pointed out that this situation is quite conflictual "because we human beings stand by our ideals and take shelter under our respective political banners."

"In this case," he added, "I, as a member and militant of that party, will adhere to the discipline and postulates of that party."

In contradiction with the vice president of the National Chamber of Representatives, who is also a former member of the CPF and now a militant of the PCD, Felix Navarrete affirmed that he could not say that the death of Assad Bucaram "could unify those of us who were formerly militants of the CFP."

Previously, Yanchapaxi had said that, following the death of Bucaram, there is now no obstacle to prevent those of us working associates who reached the Chamber via List 4, and who are today divided, from reuniting our views and working together."

Felix Navarrete said he does not believe Bucaram was an obstacle that caused the split within the CFP. "I believe," he stressed, "that we shall have to proceed along parallel lines within the political arena, as different parties having formed our respective groupings, and in this case, the CFP and the PCD each along its own line."

"In my opinion," said Navarrete, "to reunify the CFP will be very difficult, for the reasons cited. Of course, this is only a personal viewpoint."

Lastly, he affirmed that in his opinion the CFP will not disappear in the wake of Bucaram's sudden death, and that on the contrary it will continue its forward course in our national life.

POLITICAL PARTY SYSTEM NOT YET REALITY

Quito EL COMERCIO in Spanish 16 Nov 81 p A 3

[Article by Fernando Proano]

[Text] It is a little sudden and even premature to say that in Ecuador we now have a political party system as laid down in Section 6 of the Constitution. In the view of observers, what we have is a corporative system.

The long period of de facto government the country was compelled to undergo has weakened even more the structures of the political parties, which because of this are having to deal with a process of fragmentation, characterized by personalisms. All of this is hindering their strengthening process and the shaping of a governmental system based on bipartism, with two clearly defined, but strong, parties.

As political observers see it, the country, after a long period of dictatorship, is now going through a transition period between de facto government and a government based on a juridical system.

It must be noted that the Constitution clearly specifies a system of political parties and that the Law on Political Parties is aimed at strengthening them, to which effect the state lends its support and requires that only those political parties recognized by law may present their candidates for a popular election. It requires that anyone intervening as a candidate in any popular election, besides meeting all the other requisites laid down by the Constitution, be associated with a political party.

But despite this backing by the state and despite the juridical norms set forth in the Constitution as well as in the Law on Political Parties, it cannot be said that the governmental system of the Ecuadorean state is a party system.

The minister of government, Galo Garcia, at the conclusion of one of the latest dialogues held with the ID [Democratic Left], spoke of the country as having a political party system of government and said that as a result of this phase the government is now talking and will continue talking with the leaders of these political groupings, forgetting, however, that social forces are also part of the political scene.

The most recent acts of agitation that have taken place in the country have disproved the statements by the minister of political affairs and have compelled the government to realign its policy and to recognize other social forces that comprise the body politic.

The government ended its dialogue with the political parties and found itself having to dialogue with the corporate bodies like the FUT [Single Workers Front] and the teaching profession.

The protests realized by these social forces or the demands put forth by them were not advanced through any political grouping as they should be in a political party system.

This fact reveals clearly that no link exists in this country between its political parties and its social forces. And these social forces, as sociologist Patricio Moncayo says, express themselves through corporativism.

On this theme, this newspaper interviewed two experts on Ecuadorean political parties: Dr Juan Cueva, former undersecretary of government, and lawyer Patricio Moncayo.

Both concur in the view that the [illegible] does not have an operative political party system and that the social fo[illegible] express themselves through their respective organizations--that a constitutional provision proclaims the existence of a party system but that, as Cueva says, "A constitutional proclamation merely states a reality to be, not an actual reality."

"In Ecuador," said Patricio Moncayo, "I would say we are going through a transition phase."

Moncayo, a university professor and author of several books on political parties, recognizes the existence of a Law on Political Parties and that the law is being complied with.

He says that a Law on Elections also exists and that it too is being complied with, but that, for a political party system truly to exist in a given country, the country's political parties must establish links with its operative social forces.

"If the social forces do not express themselves through the political parties, which must also make room for populism, the country does not operate under a party system," said Moncayo.

"What is occurring," he added, "is that production and trade organizations, for example, frequently prefer to express themselves through their own trade associations on political issues rather than through the existing political parties."

He added that the same is true with regard to the labor organizations, in that they are not expressing themselves through existing political parties, but rather through their own unions; the same is true of the teaching profession, which expresses itself through the National Union of Educators, and of the students, who express themselves through the FEUE [Federation of Ecuadorean University Students].

Moncayo argued that "Together with populism on the political scene there exists also this phenomenon we could call corporativism, meaning that system in which the social forces express themselves through their corporative organizations, through their trade unions and associations.." He said that in this situation the political parties must concern themselves with achieving social representativeness in order to attain real existence from the sociological standpoint, since otherwise the political parties will have merely a legal existence, merely a constitutional existence. What is important, he said is that the political party must take firm root within the social groups whose interests it intends to represent.

Juan Cueva Jaramillo, for his part, said: "In accordance with our Constitution, Ecuador has a Law on Political Parties, and our Constitution says we have a party system; but not everything the Constitution says is true. The constitution says, for example that all we Ecuadoreans are equal. I ask myself, 'Are we truly equal?'."

"But we see clearly," he said, "how in the Ecuadorean sociopolitical reality the interested groups make themselves heard not through political parties but rather through other kinds of organizations."

He pointed out that the outcries in Quito are taking place through student and labor movements; when the economically strong groups of the Right want to make themselves heard, they do not go through the political parties but rather through their own organizations such as the production associations, the bulding trade associations, and so forth.

"The conclusion to be drawn from this," he stressed, "is that the constitutional ideal that our system be one of political parties is but a constitutional declaration, that is, a reality to be, but not an existing reality, since it is actually not a party system."

Cueva pointed out that the country has political parties and that these parties are duly constituted; that they even have state backing and receive a subvention from the Supreme Electoral Tribunal. "This is all to the good," he stressed, "because this strengthens the parties and they do not have to resort to other types of financing; this is very important from the democratic standpoint."

Lastly, Cueva said, "The sociological reality, the vital reality, Ecuador's day-to-day reality permit me to state frankly that our party system is nothing more than a legal-type, a constitutional-type, proclamation."

MINISTER INVESTIGATES INCREASED TRADE WITH EASTERN EUROPE

Quito EL COMERCIO in Spanish 19 Nov 81 p A 8

[Text] Possibilities exist for increasing trade with the Eastern European countries, said the minister of Industry, Orlando Alcivar, while at the same time disclosing, however, that Yugoslavia, Czechoslovakia, Romania and the GDR [German Democratic Republic] had proposed a balanced exchange, meaning Ecuadorean products for machinery and services from those nations.

With Romania, he said, trade relations have for some time been down to zero, but it is planned to reactivate them next year. This was proposed by the authorities of that socialist nation.

He reported that the GDR is becoming one of the best buyers of our products, starting with bananas and including other products such as tuna and possibly tropical fruit juices. He announced the possibility that the GDR may buy some 75,000 tons annually of bananas over the next 5 years, which compares significantly with the export figures for each of the countries with which Ecuador presently has trade relations of this kind.

On the other hand, Alcivar Santos said that the ugoslav market for our products has been shrinking during the past 2 years, our exports of bananas to that country having dropped from 110,000 tons in 1979, to 55,000 tons in 1980, and to less than 30,000 tons so far this year.

The minister disclosed that according to information conveyed to him by the vice president of that country its 1982 import budget totals $18 million, of which 27 percent is to be from developing countries. In 1981, this percentage was barely 16 percent.

According to the secretary of state, our banana sales to that country will total 4-5,000 tons by the end of this year.

With Czechoslovakia, our trade deficit has been growing, but Alcivar said we are looking forward to transforming that deficit into a surplus.

As the minister explained, the proposal made by those countries seeks to establish an equal balance, that is, an exchange of products for machinery and services. They are interested, he said, in building infrastructural works in Ecuador.

This proposed trade and technical exchange has as its object the safeguarding of their hard currencies at a time during their current economic difficulties, he explained, adding that Ecuador should accept a balanced trade agreement because otherwise it will be difficult to sell our products.
